Ver. 19. As it is written, &c.] The paſſage referr'd to is in Iſ. xxix. 14. where 'tis read, the wiſdom of their wiſe men ſhall periſh, and the underſtanding of their prudent men ſhall be hid; and is rendered by the Septuagint, I will deſtroy the wiſdom of the wiſe, and will hide the underſtanding of the prudent; which is much the ſame with the Apoſtle's verſion of it: and the ſenſe of the prophecy is, that in the times of the Meſſiah, under the Goſpel-diſpenſation, the myſteries of grace ſhould be hid from the wiſe Rabbins among the Jews, the Scribes and Phariſees, who with all their ſagacity, parts, and learning, would not be able to comprehend the doctrines of the Goſpel; by theſe their wiſdom and underſtanding would be nonpluſſed, ſo that they would reject them as fooliſhneſs, becauſe their carnal reaſon could not reach them; which ſhows what an infatuation they were given up to: and if this ſhould be the caſe, as it was with the wiſe and learned philoſophers among the Gentiles, it need not be wondered at; it was what was foretold in prophecy concerning the Jews, who had the oracles of God, and the advantage of a divine revelation; and therefore it need not be ſtumbling to them that are ſaved, that the Goſpel ſhould meet with ſo much ſcorn and contempt among them that periſh in the Gentile world. Theſe words are very pertinently cited by the Apoſtle, ſince they are acknowledged by the Jews themſelves to ſignify the departure of wiſdom from the wiſe men of Iſrael, in the times of the deſtruction of the temple, as Jarchi on the place obſerves.

Ver. 20. Where is the wiſe? where is the Scribe, &c.] Theſe are the Apoſtle's own words; tho' he may allude to Iſ. xxxiii. 18. where there are ſome phraſes much like theſe, but the meaning is very different. Tho' they are interpreted by the Talmudiſts[g] in a ſenſe pretty near the Apoſtle's; for thus they remark upon them, " where is the " Scribe? he that counts all the letters which are " in the law; where is the receiver, or weigher? who " weighs all the light and heavy things in the law; " where "where is he that counted the towers? he who "counts, or teaches the three hundred traditions:" ſo that they underſtand theſe of their Scribes and Miſnic doctors, and ſuch that are curious ſearchers into the hidden ſenſes of ſcripture. The Apoſtle alſo ſeems to allude to a diſtinction that obtained among the Jews, of wiſe men, Scribes, and myſtical interpreters of the word. They had their חכמי, wiſe men, which was a general name for men of learning and knowledge; and their סופרי, Scribes, who interpreted the law in the literal and grammatical ſenſe; and their דרשני, preachers, or diſputers, who diligently ſearched into the hidden meaning of the ſcriptures, and ſought for, and delivered out the myſtical and allegorical ſenſe of them, and who uſed to diſpute about them in their ſchools. Theſe three are ſometimes to be met with together, and as diſtinct from each other. They ſay [h], that "God "ſhewed to the firſt man every generation, ודורשיו, "and its expounders, or diſputers; and every gene"ration, וחכמיו, and its wiſe men; and every ge"neration, וסופריו, and its Scribes." And the Apoſtle's ſenſe is, where is the wiſe? the man that boaſts of his ſuperior wiſdom and knowledge in the things of nature, whether among the Jews or Gentiles; where is the Scribe? the letter-learned man, who takes upon him to give the literal ſenſe of the law; where is the diſputer of this world? the Jewiſh world, who pretends to the knowledge of the more abſtruſe and ſecret ſenſes of ſcripture; where are theſe men? they are not to be found among thoſe that God employs in the miniſtration of the Goſpel; he has laid them aſide, and choſen others, where are they? what uſe have they been of to men? are men under their inſtructions the better, either in principle or practice? where are the thouſands that have been turned to God by their wiſdom, as can be ſhown by the faithful miniſters of the Goſpel? where are they? let them come and produce their cauſe, and bring forth their ſtrong reaſons againſt the Goſpel they account fooliſhneſs, and try if theſe will ſtand before its ſuperior power and wiſdom; where are they? are they not fools with all their wiſdom and learning? The words may be rendered, where is the ſearcher, or enquirer of this world? and may deſign the ſame ſort of perſons whom the Jews call חכמי המחקר, the wiſe men of ſearch, or enquiry [i], and ſometimes אנשי המחקר, the men of ſearch, or enquiry [k]; by whom they ſeem to intend ſuch who ſearch into the nature of things, who ſtudy natural philoſophy. Hath not God made fooliſh the wiſdom of this world? by bringing in the Goſpel-ſcheme, which the men of the world, the greateſt wits in it, are not able to underſtand; by laying their wiſdom aſide as uſeleſs in the buſineſs of ſalvation; by ſhewing it to be vain and empty, and of no ſervice in things ſpiritual and divine; by detecting, thro' the miniſtration of the Goſpel, the ſophiſms of men, and ſhewing that the ſchemes both Jews and Gentiles give into abound with folly, with ſtupid notions, and are full of groſs errors and fatal miſtakes.

Ver. 21. For after that in the wiſdom of God, &c.] Theſe words contain a reaſon proving the infatuation of men, with reſpect to the wiſdom of God; by which may be meant either Chriſt, who is the wiſdom of God, was in the world, and yet the world of the Jews, and their chief Rabbins among them, with all their wiſdom, neither knew him, nor God his Father; or the Goſpel, which is alſo ſo called, and though this was come, both into the Jewiſh and Gentile world, yet neither of them, by their natural wiſdom, knew the God of grace, ſo manifeſtly revealed in it; or rather the works of creation, in which there is ſuch a viſible diſplay of the wiſdom of God: yet the world by wiſdom knew not God; the author of them: the Gentiles knew him not in any ſpiritual and ſaving manner, as in Chriſt, or the God of all grace; yea, they knew him not as the God of nature to be the one, only, true God; they knew him not ſo as to glorify him as God, or to worſhip him in a right way and manner: wherefore, it pleaſed God by the fooliſhneſs of preaching to ſave them that believe; it was his purpoſe and decree within himſelf; it was his ſovereign good-will and pleaſure; it was what he without any motion from, or merit in the creature, reſolved of himſelf from all eternity that he would ſave, not the wiſe man, the Scribe, the diſputer of this world, the rationaliſt, the talker, nor the worker, but them that believe, in his Son; that look unto him, venture on him, and commit the care and keeping of their ſouls to him, however weak, mean, and deſpicable they may otherwiſe be; or whether they believe with a weak, or a ſtrong faith, ſo be it, it is but true: the Ethiopic verſion reads, that believe in this fooliſh doctrine; and this he determined to do and did, by the fooliſhneſs of preaching; or by that ſort of preaching, which both for the matter of it Chriſt, that itſelf, and the manner of it, the world reckons fooliſhneſs; and which are the things of the Father's grace in election, of the Son's grace in redemption, and the Spirit's in regeneration: ſo the wiſe men of the world, with all their wiſdom, are left ignorant of God, and periſh in their ſins, whilſt the Goſpel they deſpiſe is the power of God unto ſalvation to all that believe in Chriſt; this, thro' efficacious grace, becomes the means of regenerating and quickening men, ſhewing them their need of ſalvation, and where it is, and of working faith in them to look to Chriſt for it.

Ver. 22. For the Jews require a ſign, &c.] The Jews had always been uſed to miracles, in confirmation of the miſſion of the prophets ſent unto them, and therefore inſiſted on a ſign proving Jeſus to be the true Meſſiah; except ſigns and wonders were wrought, they would not believe; and tho' miracles were wrought in great numbers, and ſuch as never man did, they remained incredulous, and perſiſted in demanding a ſign from heaven, and in their own way; and it was told them that no other ſign ſhould be given them, but that of the prophet Jonas, by which was ſignified the reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead; this was given them, and yet they believed not, but went on to require a ſign ſtill; nothing but miracles would do with them, and they muſt be ſuch as they themſelves pleaſed: the Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read ſigns in the plural number: and the Greeks ſeek after wiſdom; the wiſdom of the world, natural wiſdom, philoſophy, the reaſon of things, the flowers of rhetorick, the ornaments of ſpeech, the beauties of oratory, the juſtneſs of ſtile and diction; as for doctrines they regarded none, but ſuch as they could comprehend with, and account for by their carnal reaſon, every thing elſe they deſpiſed and exploded. Hence we often read [l] of חכמת יונית, the Grecian wiſdom, or wiſdom of the Greeks; which the Jews ſay,

Ver. 23. But we preach Chriſt crucified, &c.] Regardleſs of the ſentiments and opinions of Jews and Gentiles, of what the one required and the other ſought after; and in oppoſition to all their ſenſeleſs and groundleſs cavils, the Apoſtle and his fellow-miniſters continued preaching the doctrine of ſalvation by a crucified Chriſt, and him only; tho' it was, unto the Jews a ſtumbling-block; as was propheſied it ſhould be, and as it came to paſs; for they not only ſtumbled at the meanneſs of his birth, parentage and education, at his miniſtry, miracles, company and audience; but eſpecially at his ſufferings and death: it was a ſtumbling to them that he ſhould die at all, for they underſtood out of their law, that Chriſt ſhould abide for ever; and it was more ſo that he ſhould die the death of the croſs, by which, according to their law, he appeared to be accurſed; and moſt of all, this was ſtumbling to them, becauſe they expected a temporal kingdom to be ſet up by him: and unto the Greeks fooliſhneſs; as that the Son of God ſhould be crucified; that riches ſhould come thro' his poverty, and men be brought to a kingdom and glory thro' one ſo mean and abject; that there ſhould be life for men in his death, and ſalvation thro' his crucifixion, or the ſhameful death of the croſs; that bleſſings ſhould come thro' his being made a curſe; and that his death ſhould be an expiatory ſacrifice for the ſins of men; and that juſtification ſhould be by one that was condemned; and peace and pardon ſhould be by his blood; and that he ſhould be raiſed again from the dead. Theſe things were the ſubject of their ridicule and banter, and in their opinion, deſerved rather to be laughed at, than credited. The Alexandrian copy; and others, and the Vulgate, and all the Oriental verſions read, unto the Gentiles.

Ver. 24. But unto them which are called, &c.] Effectually, by the grace of God, not merely externally, but internally; theſe have other ſentiments of Chriſt, and the doctrine of ſalvation by him; for being called out of darkneſs, and ſavingly illuminated by the Spirit of God, they ſee wiſdom, beauty, glory, excellency and ſuitableneſs in Chriſt, and in his Goſpel; and having felt the power of it upon their ſouls, with them, both Jews and Greeks, of whatſover nation they be, and whatſoever their prejudices have been, Chriſt, to them is, the power of God, and the wiſdom of God: he is the power of God; this is oppoſed to the Jews who ſtumbled at his weakneſs, his ſufferings and death, even the death of the croſs; and is to be underſtood of him, not as God, in which ſenſe he is Mighty, yea, the Almighty, and which appears by his works of creation and providence; but as mediator, and of him in his low and mean eſtate, and even when he was crucified thro' weakneſs; in reſpect to that very thing in which he was weakneſs, and ſo ſtumbling to others, he is to them that are called the power of God; as is clear by his bearing all the ſins of his people in his own body, on the tree, the croſs whereon he was crucified, and all the puniſhment due thereunto; and yet he failed not, nor was he diſcouraged, nor did he give out, till he had ſatisfied law and juſtice perfectly, and made a full end of ſin, and an entire reconciliation for iniquity; as alſo by deſtroying by his death, the devil, who had the power of death, and ſpoiling all his principalities and powers, triumphing over them on his croſs; by redeeming his people from all their ſins, and the curſe of the law, and from him that was ſtronger than they; by aboliſhing death, and at laſt raiſing himſelf from the dead; all which ſhew him even when and tho' crucified, to be the power of God, or to be poſſeſſed of Almighty power; for theſe are things which a mere creature could never have done: and he is the wiſdom of God, alſo in the account of theſe perſons; and which likewiſe is to be underſtood, it being oppoſed to the opinions the Greeks had of him, not of him as the eſſential wiſdom of God, as he is the the wiſe creator and governour of the univerſe; but of him as mediator, and in reſpect to that for which the Greeks accounted him fooliſhneſs: for in redemption and ſalvation by a crucified Chriſt, God hath abounded towards us in all wiſdom and prudence: there is in this article a high diſplay of the wiſdom of God; for hereby juſtice was ſatisfied in that nature which ſinned, and ſatan deſtroyed in that nature which he himſelf had been the ruin of; hereby ſin was condemned, and yet the ſinner ſaved; pardon and juſtification came to be in a way of grace, and yet of ſtrict juſtice; all the divine perfections harmonize, and are glorified; and God has hereby executed his wiſe deſigns and counſels of old; yea, even the wiſdom of God is ſeen in Chriſt's dying the death of the croſs, whereby he appeared to be made a curſe for us, that he might redeem us from the curſe of the law, and that the bleſſing of Abraham might come upon us.

Ver. 25. Becauſe the fooliſhneſs of God, &c.] Not that there is any ſuch thing as fooliſhneſs in God, nor the leaſt degree of weakneſs in him; but the Apoſtle means that which the men of the world eſteem ſo, and therefore by an ironical conceſſion, calls it by thoſe names; by which is intended either Chriſt, who as crucified, is counted fooliſhneſs; yet he is wiſer than men; yea, even than Solomon, who was wiſer than all men beſides; Chriſt is greater than he in wiſdom, having all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge in him; yea, in redemption by the blood of his croſs, which is accounted ſuch an egregious inſtance of folly, there is ſuch a diſplay of wiſdom, as ſurpaſſes all the wiſdom of men and angels: and tho' he is as crucified, eſteemed as the weakneſs of God, yet in this reſpect, is ſtronger than men; ſtronger than the ſtrong man armed; and has done that by his own arm, has brought ſalvation for his people, which neither men nor angels could ever have done: or all this may be underſtood of the Goſpel of Chriſt, which is condemned as folly and weakneſs, and yet has infinitely more wiſdom in it, than is to be found in the beſt concerted ſchemes of the wiſeſt philoſophers; and has had a greater influence on the minds and manners of men than theirs ever had; it is the manifold wiſdom of God, and the power of God unto ſalvation. Moreover, theſe words may be applied to the ſaints, called in ver. 27. the fooliſh and weak things of the world; and yet even theſe in the buſineſs of ſalvation, how fooliſh ſoever they may be, in other reſpects, are wiſer than the wiſeſt of men deſtitute of the grace of God; and however weak they are in themſelves, in their own eſteem, and in the account of others, they are able to do and ſuffer ſuch things thro' the ſtrength of Chriſt, that no other men in the world are able to perform or endure. The phraſes here uſed ſeem to be a ſort of proverbial ones; and the ſenſe of them is, that whatever in things divine and ſpiritual, has the appearance of folly and weakneſs, or is judged to be ſo by carnal men, is wiſer and ſtronger not only than the wiſdom and ſtrength of men, but than men themſelves with all their wiſdom and ſtrength. It is very likely, that proverbial expreſſions of this kind, with a little alteration, were uſed by the Jews. The advice the young men gave to Rehoboam, is thus paraphraſed by the Targumiſt[o], חלשותו הקיפא מן גבורתיה דאבא, my weakneſs is ſtronger than the ſtrength of my father; which is very near the ſame with the laſt clauſe of this verſe.

[n] Shalſhelet. Hakabala, fol. 25. 1. Ganz. Tzemach David, par. 1. fol. 31. 2.

Ver. 26. For ye ſee your calling, brethren, &c.] That is, thoſe that were called by the grace of God among them; for as circumciſion and uncircumciſion, ſtand for circumciſed and uncircumciſed perſons, and election for elect perſons, and righteouſneſs for righteous perſons, Rom. iii. 30. and xi. 7. 2 Pet. iii. 13. ſo here calling deſigns men called by grace; the manner of whoſe calling, and what ſort of perſons they were, the Apoſtle ſignifies, they did or might, or ought, to ſee, obſerve, and conſider; for reſpect is here had, not as ſome have thought, to the firſt preachers of the Goſpel, who were mechanicks, fiſhermen, illiterate perſons, very mean and deſpicable; but to the members of the church at Corinth, whether public preachers, or private members. The city of Corinth had in it many noble families, of high birth and quality, abounded with learned philoſophers and rich merchants; and yet it was eaſy to be ſeen, how that not many wiſe men after the fleſh, not many mighty, not many noble are called. The Apoſtle does not ſay that there were none of the wiſe, the mighty and noble called; for there were Criſpus, and Soſthenes, rulers of the ſynagogue, and Gaius a rich hoſpitable man, and Eraſtus the chamberlain of the city, and it may be ſome others of a like or better figure in life; but there were not many of them; inſtances of this kind are but few recorded in the ſcripture; as Joſeph of Arimathea a rich counſellor, Paulus Sergius a Roman deputy, Dionyſius the Areopagite, and ſome in Cæſar's palace; which ſhew that nobility, riches, and learning, as they do not at all contribute towards a man's ſalvation, ſo neither can they hinder it where grace takes place; but generally ſpeaking, God has thought fit, for wiſe reaſons, to chuſe and call perſons of different characters.

Ver. 27. But God hath choſen the fooliſh things of the world, &c.] So the Jews in diſtinction from their wiſe Rabbins and Doctors, call others, טפשין דעלמא, the fools of the world[p]; the perſons whom God made choice of from all eternity, as appears by his calling them in time, are ſuch who with reſpect to the wiſdom of the world are fooliſh; have not thoſe natural parts and abilities, that ſagacity and penetration in things natural and civil, that knowledge and learning which many others have; and are therefore eſteemed fooliſh by the men of the world, in compariſon of whom, who are the wiſe and prudent, they are but babes: and God's end in his choice of them, and calling them is, to confound the wiſe; who ſooner or later will be brought to ſhame and confuſion, to ſee ſuch ideots they took them to be, wiſer than they in the buſineſs of ſalvation; having been directed and influenced by divine grace to chuſe that good part, which ſhall never be taken from them, when they will be ſtript of their nobility, wealth, and wiſdom; to ſee theſe men go into the kingdom of heaven, and they themſelves ſhut out: and God hath choſen the weak things of the world; who cannot boaſt of their birth and pedigree, of their ancient and illuſtrious families; have no titles of honour to aggrandize them, nor eſtates, poſſeſſions, and worldly ſubſtance to ſupport themſelves with; and this he has done, to confound the things which are mighty; as Haman was by the advancement of Mordecai. It will be to the utter confuſion of the rich and mighty, to ſee perſons of the loweſt claſs in life made kings and prieſts by Chriſt, ſet among princes, and upon the throne of glory; and they themſelves fleeing, and calling to the mountains to fall upon them, and cover them from the ſight of him that ſits on the throne, and the lamb.

Ver. 28. And baſe things of the world, &c.] Who are reckoned the filth of the world, and the off-ſcouring of all things; men of mean birth, education and buſineſs of life: and things that are deſpiſed; and ſet at nought, as poor perſons generally are; yet God hath choſen them; even the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of a kingdom: yea, and things which are not; ſome think the Gentiles are here intended, who by the Jews are called, things that are not; as in the apocryphal book of Eſther xiv. 11. 2 Eſdras vi. 56, 57. ſee the note on Rom. iv. 17. for not non-entities, or ſuch who are not in being are meant; but who are not accounted of, or are reckoned as nothing; and theſe the Lord calls by his grace, as a fruit and evidence of electing love: to bring to nought things that are; who on the account of their noble birth, large poſſeſſions, and high attainments in knowledge and learning, thought themſelves ſomething; all which will one day be aboliſhed, and will ſtand them in no ſtead with regard to future happineſs and glory. The Jews[q] have a ſaying quite contrary to all this, that "the Shekinah or preſence of "God does not dwell on any, but upon a wiſe "man, a mighty man, and a rich man."

Ver. 29. That no fleſh ſhould glory in his preſence.] That is, in the preſence of God, as ſome copies, and the Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions read; not in their blood, birth, families, lineage, and natural deſcent; nor in their might, power, and dominion; nor in their riches, wealth, and ſubſtance; nor in their wiſdom, learning and parts: for however theſe may be gloried in before men, yet not before God. Theſe are of no account with him, nor will they be regarded by him, or men on account of them; and he has taken a method in chuſing and calling the reverſe of theſe, to ſtain the glory of all fleſh, that no man may attribute his ſalvation to any thing of the creature, but wholly to the ſoveraign grace and good pleaſure of God.

Ver. 30. But of him are ye in Chriſt Jeſus, &c.] Theſe words, as they direct to the proper object of glorying, Chriſt, ſo they ſhew the high honour the called ones are brought to in and thro' Chriſt, and are oppoſed to their outward meanneſs, folly, weakneſs, poverty, and contempt. They are firſt of God the Father, of his own rich, free grace and goodneſs, without any regard to any motive, merit, or deſert of theirs, put into Chriſt by electing grace, in whom they are preſerved and bleſſed; and which is their original, ſecret being in him; and is made manifeſt by regenerating grace, by their being made new creatures; which alſo is not owing to their blood, or to the will of the fleſh, or to the will of man, but to God and his free favour in Chriſt: and in conſequence of their being in Chriſt, as their head and repreſentative, he becomes all to them, which is here expreſſed; who of God is made unto us wiſdom. Tho' they are fooliſh creatures in their own and the world's eſteem, yet Chriſt is their wiſdom; he is ſo efficiently, the author and cauſe of all that ſpiritual wiſdom and underſtanding in divine things, they are poſſeſſed of; he is ſo objectively, their higheſt wiſdom lying in the knowledge of his perſon, blood, and righteouſneſs, of intereſt in him, and ſalvation by him; with which knowledge eternal life is connected: and he is ſo repreſentatively; he is their head, in whom all their wiſdom lies; he acts for them as their wiſdom to God, he is their counſellor, their advocate, who pleads and intercedes for them; and as their wiſdom to men, and gives them a mouth and wiſdom which their adverſaries are not able to gainſay; and having the tongue of the learned, he ſpeaks a word in ſeaſon to themſelves, when weary, diſtreſſed, and diſconſolate, and for them in the court of heaven; he is their wiſdom, to direct their paths, to guide them with his counſel, in the way they ſhould go, ſafe to his kingdom and glory: and righteouſneſs. He is the author of righteouſneſs; he has wrought out and brought in one for them, which is well-pleaſing to God, ſatisfying to his juſtice, by which his law is magnified and made honourable; which juſtifies from all ſin, and diſcharges from all condemnation, is everlaſting, and will anſwer for them in a time to come; this he has brought in by the holineſs of his nature, the obedience of his life, and by his ſufferings and death: and which is ſubjectively in him, not in themſelves; nor does it lie in any thing wrought in them, or done by them; but in him as their head and repreſentative, who by imputation is made righteouſneſs to them; and they the ſame way are made the righteouſneſs of God in him; or in other words, this righteouſneſs, by an act of the Father's grace, is imputed, reckoned, and accounted to them as their juſtifying righteouſneſs: and ſanctification; Chriſt is the ſanctification of his people, thro' the conſtitution of God, the imputation of the holineſs of his nature, the merits of his blood, and the efficacy of his grace, he is ſo federally and repreſentatively; he is their covenant-head, and has all covenant-grace in his hands for them, and ſo the whole ſtock and fund of holineſs, which is communicated to them in all ages, until the perfection of it in every ſaint: this is ſanctification in Chriſt, which differs from ſanctification in them in theſe things; in him it is as the cauſe, in them as the effect; in him as its fountain, in them as the ſtream; in him it is compleat, in them it is imperfect for the preſent: and they have it by virtue of union to him; ſanctification in Chriſt can be of no avail to any, unleſs it is derived from him to them; ſo that this ſanctification in Chriſt, does not render the ſanctification of the Spirit unneceſſary, but includes it, and ſecures it: likewiſe Chriſt is the ſanctification of his people imputatively, as the holineſs of his human nature is together with his obedience and ſufferings, imputed to them for their juſtification; Chriſt aſſumed an holy human nature, the holineſs of it was not merely a qualification for his office as a Saviour, or what made his actions and ſufferings in that nature ſignificant and uſeful, or is only exemplary to men; but is a branch of the ſaints juſtification before God: the law required an holy nature, theirs is not holy; Chriſt has aſſumed one not for himſelf, but for them, and ſo is the end of the law in all reſpects: and this may be greatly deſigned in the whole of this paſſage; wiſdom may ſtand in general for the wiſe ſcheme of juſtification, as it is laid in Chriſt; ſanctification may intend the holineſs of his nature; righteouſneſs the obedience of his life; and redemption his ſufferings and death, by which it is obtained: but then juſtification and ſanctification are not to be confounded; they are two diſtinct things, and have their proper uſes and effects; ſanctification in the ſaints does not juſtify, or juſtification ſanctify; the one reſpects the power and being of ſin, the other the guilt of it. Moreover, Chriſt is the ſanctification of his people meritoriouſly, thro' the ſhedding of his blood, whereby he has ſanctified them, that is, expiated their ſins, and made full atonement for them; ſee Heb. x. 10, 14. and xiii. 12. Once more, he is their ſanctification efficiently; by his Spirit, as the author, and by his word, as the means; he is the ſource of all holineſs, it all comes from him, and is wrought by his Spirit in the heart; which lies in filling the underſtanding with ſpiritual light and knowledge; the mind with a ſenſe of ſin, and a deteſtation of it; the heart with the fear of God; the affections with love to divine objects and things; the will with ſubmiſſion and reſignation to the will of God in all reſpects; and is exerciſed in living a life of faith on Chriſt, and in living ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly, before God and man: and this, tho' imperfect now, will be perfected from and by Chriſt, without which it is impoſſible to ſee the Lord: and redemption; which he is by the appointment of his Father, being fore-ordained to it before the foundation of the world; and this ſenſe of the word made will agree with every clauſe in the text; and he is ſo efficiently, having obtained eternal redemption from ſin, ſatan, the law, and this preſent evil world, for his people; and ſubjectively, it being in him, and every other bleſſing which is either a part of it, and comes thro' it, or is dependent on it, as juſtification, adoption, and remiſſion of ſins. Moreover, this may have reſpect not only to redemption paſt, which is obtained by Chriſt; but to that which draws near, the ſaints are waiting for, and to which they are ſealed up by the Spirit of God; even their redemption and deliverance from the very being of ſin, from all ſorrow and ſufferings, from death and the grave, and every thing that is afflicting and diſtreſſing.

Ver. 31. That, according as it is written, &c.] Jer. ix. 23, 24. He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord; not in his own wiſdom, riches, and ſtrength; but in Chriſt, as his wiſdom, righteouſneſs, ſanctification and redemption.

CHAP. II.

THE Apoſtle, in this chapter, purſues the ſame argument as before, that the Goſpel needed not the wiſdom and art of men: this he illuſtrates by his own example; and then he extols the Goſpel above all the wiſdom of men; and obſerves how it comes to be made known to men, even by the Spirit of God: hence it follows, that it is to be taught in his words, and not in the words of men; and that it can be only known and judged of by the ſpiritual, and not by the natural man. He inſtances in himſelf, and in his own miniſtry, when at Corinth, where he preached the Goſpel in a plain and ſimple manner, without uſing the ornaments of ſpeech, and human wiſdom, ver. 1.

his reaſon was, becauſe he had determined with himſelf to preach not himſelf, but a crucified Chriſt, ver. 2. His manner of behaviour is more largely declared, ver. 3. that he was ſo far from being elated with his human literature, and priding himſelf with that, and making uſe of it in an oſtentatious way, that he was attended with much weakneſs, fear, and trembling; and his diſcourſes were not adorned with the flowers of rhetoric, but were delivered with the power, evidence, and demonſtration of the Spirit, ver. 4. And his end and view in this method of preaching were, that the faith of his hearers ſhould not be aſcribed to human wiſdom, but to a divine power, ver. 5. but leſt the Goſpel ſhould be thought meanly and contemptibly of, becauſe of the plain dreſs in which it appeared, the Apoſtle affirms it to be the higheſt wiſdom, as thoſe who had the moſt perfect knowledge of it could atteſt; a wiſdom ſuperior to the wiſdom of this world, or of its princes, ſince that comes to nothing, ver. 6. the excellency of which he expreſſes by various epithets, as the wiſdom of God, myſterious wiſdom, hidden wiſdom, ancient wiſdom, ordained before the world began, for the glory of the ſaints, ver. 7. a wiſdom unknown to the princes of the world, who otherwiſe would not have been concerned in the crucifixion of Chriſt, ver. 8. and that this far exceeds the capacity of men, and could never have been found out by them, he proves, ver. 9. by a teſtimony out of Iſ. lxiv. 4. and then proceeds to ſhow how it comes to be known by any of the ſons of men, that it is by the revelation of the Spirit of God, ver. 10. which is illuſtrated by the nature of the ſpirit of man within him, which only knows the things of a man; ſo in like manner only the Spirit of God knows the things of God, and can make them known to others, ver. 11. And in this way he obſerves, that he and others became acquainted with theſe things; namely, by receiving not the ſpirit of the world, which at moſt could only have taught them the wiſdom of the world, but the Spirit of God, whereby they knew their intereſt in the bleſſings of free grace, publiſhed in the Goſpel, ver. 12. And ſeeing the Goſpel is made known by the Spirit of God, it ſhould be delivered, not in the words of mans wiſdom, but in the words of the holy Spirit, as the Apoſtle affirms he and other miniſters did deliver it, returning to his former argument, ver. 13. And alſo it follows from hence, that the things of the Goſpel, which the Spirit reveals, can't be known and received by the natural man, who has no diſcerning of them, and ſo no value for them, ver. 14. and can only be diſcerned, judged, and approved of by ſpiritual men, ver. 15. and who are not to be judged by natural and carnal men, becauſe they have not the mind of Chriſt, and ſo can't inſtruct them; but ſpiritual men have it, ſuch as the Apoſtle, and others, ver. 16.

Ver. 1. And I, brethren, when I came to you, &c.] This account the Apoſtle gives of himſelf is occaſioned, either by what he had ſaid in the latter part of the preceding chapter, concerning the choice God has made of the fooliſh, weak, baſe, and deſpicable things of the world, and of his calling them by his grace both to fellowſhip with the ſaints in common, and therefore he accommodated his miniſtry unto them, and in particular to the miniſtry of the word, of which he himſelf was a like inſtance and an example; or elſe by what he had declared in ver. 17. of the ſame chapter, that he was ſent to preach the Goſpel, not with wiſdom of words; which he here re-aſſumes, and affirms agreeably, that when he firſt came to Corinth, he came not with excellency of ſpeech, or of wiſdom; for tho' he was not only verſed in Jewiſh learning, being brought up at the feet of Gamaliel; but had alſo a good ſhare of Grecian literature, and was capable, upon proper occaſions, to cite the Greek poets, as he does Aratus, Acts xvii. 28. and Menander, Tit. i. 13. and ſo could, had he thought fit, have adorned his diſcourſes with pompous language, with the flowers of rhetoric, and the eloquence of the Grecians; yet he choſe not ſuch a high and florid ſtile, and which ſavoured ſo much of human wiſdom and art; for the ſubject he treated of required no ſuch dreſs, nor any great ſwelling words of vanity, or a bombaſt ſtile to ſet it off, and gain the applauſe and aſſent of men: for what he delivered were plain matters of fact, atteſted by God himſelf, declaring unto you the teſtimony of God; that is, the Goſpel, which bears a teſtimony to the love, grace, and mercy of God, his kindneſs and good-will to the ſons of men, in giving and ſending his only-begotten Son to be the ſaviour and redeemer of them; and in which God bears a teſtimony of his Son, of his Sonſhip, deity, mediation, incarnation, obedience, ſufferings, and death, of his reſurrection, aſcenſion to heaven, ſeſſion at his right-hand, interceſſion for his people, and his ſecond coming to judgment, and of eternal life and ſalvation by him. All which being matter of fact, and depending upon the witneſs of God, which is greater than that of men, needed no art nor oratory of men to recommend it: it was enough in plain words, and eaſy language, to declare it, with the evidence by which it was ſupported. The Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, read, the myſtery of God; and ſo the Syriac verſion, ארזה דאלהא, the myſtery of God; one of Stephens's copies read, the myſtery of Chriſt; and the Vulgate Latin verſion, the teſtimony of Chriſt.

Ver. 2. For I determined not to know any thing among you, &c.] This was a reſolution the Apoſtle entered into before he came among them, that tho' he was well verſed in human literature, and had a large compaſs of knowledge in the things of nature, yet would make known nothing elſe unto them, or make any thing elſe the ſubject of his miniſtry, ſave Chriſt, and him crucified: he had a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of Chriſt himſelf, and which he valued above all things elſe; and this qualified him to make him known to others; and which knowledge he was very willing and ready to communicate by preaching the Goſpel, which is the means of making known Chriſt as God's ſalvation to the ſouls of men; and on this ſubject he chiefly inſiſted, and in which he took great delight and pleaſure: he made known the things reſpecting the perſon of Chriſt, as that he was God, the Son of God, and truly man, God and man in one perſon; the things reſpecting his office, as that he was the Meſſiah, the mediator, prophet, prieſt, and king, the head, huſband, ſaviour, and redeemer of his church and people; and the things reſpecting his work as ſuch, and the bleſſings of grace procured by him; as that juſtification is by his righteouſneſs, pardon by his blood, peace, reconciliation, and atonement by his ſacrifice, and ſalvation alone, and entirely by him. His determination was to preach none but Chriſt; not himſelf, nor man; not the power and purity of human nature, the free will and works of the creature, but to exclude all and every thing from being partners with Chriſt in the buſineſs of ſalvation.

tion. This was the doctrine he choſe in the firſt place, and principally to inſiſt upon, even ſalvation by Chriſt, and him, as crucified: that which was the greateſt offence to others, was the moſt delightful to him, becauſe ſalvation comes thro' and by the croſs of Chriſt; and he dwelt upon this, and determined to do ſo; it being moſt for the glory of Chriſt, and what was owned for the converſion of ſinners, the comfort of diſtreſſed minds, and is ſuitable food for faith, as he knew by his own experience.

Ver. 3. And I was with you in weakneſs, &c.] Meaning either the weakneſs of his bodily preſence, the contemptibleneſs of his voice, and the mean figure he made as a preacher among them, both with reſpect to the matter and manner of his miniſtry in the eyes of many; or his lowly and humble deportment among them, not exerting and uſing the power and authority Chriſt had given him as an Apoſtle; but chuſing rather to work with his own hands, as he did at Corinth, to miniſter to his own neceſſities, and thoſe of others; or the many perſecutions which he endured there for the ſake of preaching a crucified Chriſt; and which he ſometimes calls infirmities; ſee 2 Cor. xii. 9, 10. wherefore 'tis added, and in fear, and in much trembling; not only on account of the greatneſs and awfulneſs of the work in which he was engaged, and leſt the ſouls he miniſtred unto ſhould be drawn aſide from the truth, and into a ſinful compliance; but becauſe of the violence of men againſt him, threatening his life, and lying in wait for it: hence, the Lord, to encourage him, ſpake in a viſion to him, and bid him not be afraid, but boldly preach his Goſpel, and not be ſilent; aſſuring him of his preſence, and that no man ſhould ſet on him to hurt him, for he had many choſen veſſels there to call by his grace thro' his miniſtry, Acts xviii. 9, 10. which no doubt greatly ſerved to remove the fears and tremor that attended him.

Ver. 4. And my ſpeech, and my preaching, &c.] As he determined, ſo he acted. As the ſubject-matter of his miniſtry was not any of the liberal arts and ſciences, or the philoſophy, and dry morality of the Gentiles, but ſalvation by a crucified Chriſt; ſo his ſtile, his diction, his language uſed in preaching, was not with enticing words of mans wiſdom; with technical words, words of art, contrived by human wiſdom to captivate the affections; and with bare probable arguments only, a ſhew of reaſon to perſuade the mind to an aſſent, when nothing ſolid and ſubſtantial is advanced, only a run of words artfully put together, without any ſtrength of argument in them; a method uſed by the falſe teachers, and which the Apoſtle here ſtrikes at, and tacitly condemns: but in demonſtration of the ſpirit, and of power; partly by making uſe of ſolid proofs out of the writings of the Old Teſtament, indited by the Spirit of God, and which amounted to a demonſtration of the truths he delivered; and partly by ſigns, and wonders, and miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, thoſe extraordinary inſtances of divine power, which greatly confirmed the doctrines he preached: and beſides all theſe, the Spirit of God wonderfully aſſiſted him in his work, both as to words and matter; directing him what to ſay, and in what form, in words, not which human wiſdom taught, but which the Holy Ghoſt taught; and accompanying his miniſtry with his power, to the converſion, comfort, edification, and ſalvation of many.

Ver. 5. That your faith ſhould not ſtand, &c.] Or be in the wiſdom of men, but in the power of God. The Spirit of God directed him, and he under his influence choſe, and by his aſſiſtance purſued this way of preaching, with this view, and for this reaſon, that faith in Chriſt, and in the doctrines of his Goſpel, which comes by hearing, might not be attributed to the force of human eloquence and oratory; or ſtand upon ſo ſandy a foundation, as that which might, if that was the caſe, be puffed away by a ſuperior flow and force of words; but that it might be aſcribed, as it ought to be, to almighty power, ſtand in it, be ſupported by it, and at laſt be finiſhed and fulfilled with it.

Ver. 6. Howbeit we ſpeak wiſdom, &c.] Tho' the wiſe philoſophers among the Gentiles accounted the Goſpel fooliſhneſs; and tho' the Apoſtle, by an ironical conceſſion, had called the miniſtry of it the fooliſhneſs of preaching, and the fooliſhneſs of God, and had thought beſt, for wiſe reaſons, to deliver it in a plain and ſimple manner, without the embelliſhments of human wiſdom; yet he vindicates it from the charge of folly: it was not folly but wiſdom, which he and his fellow-miniſters preached, and that of the higheſt kind, as appears from what follows. Tho' it was not eſteemed ſo by all men, yet among, or with them that are perfect; adult, at age, oppoſed to babes and children; ſuch who have their underſtandings enlightened by the ſpirit of wiſdom and revelation; who have their ſenſes exerciſed to diſcern between divine and human wiſdom; and who are perfect in a comparative ſenſe, having more ſpiritual knowledge and underſtanding than others; for none in the preſent ſtate of things, are abſolutely perfect in knowledge, they that know moſt, know but in part: now to ſuch the Goſpel and the doctrines of it, appear to be the higheſt wiſdom; for the Apoſtle's ſenſe is not that he and other Goſpel-miniſters preached the more ſublime doctrines of it, to a ſelect ſett of perſons that had more judgment, and a better underſtanding of things than others: if this could be thought to be the Apoſtle's meaning, he might be ſuppoſed to allude to a cuſtom among the Jews, not to deliver the ſublime things of the law, but to perſons ſo and ſo qualified. "Says R. Ame[r], they don't deliver the "ſecrets of the law, but to him who has the five "things or characters in Iſ. iii. 3." So they did not ſuffer the firſt chapter of Geneſis, and the viſions of Ezekiel to be read until 30 years of age[s]; and from them the Pythagoreans took their notion, of not declaring their myſteries but to τελειοι, perfect ones, the word here uſed[t]; but the Apoſtle's ſenſe is, that to ſuch that were perfect, and even to every one that had the leaſt degree of ſpiritual knowledge, the Goſpel was wiſdom. Some refer this clauſe not to perſons, but things; and ſo the Arabic verſion reads it, we ſpeak wiſdom concerning things that are perfect; as the things of the Goſpel are, ſuch as a plenteous redemption, perfect righteouſneſs, full pardon, plenary ſatisfaction, and compleat ſalvation and happineſs: yet not the wiſdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought; meaning not the idolatry, ſuperſtition, curious and magic arts introduced by demons, which principalities and powers, with all their works, are ſpoiled and deſtroyed by Chriſt; but either the political wiſdom, and crafty ſchemes of the civil governours of the world, againſt Chriſt and his Goſpel, who were by this time moſt, if not all of them dead; or the vain philoſopy of the wiſe and learned among the Gentiles, who every day were leſs and leſs in vogue, thro' the quick and powerful ſpread of the Goſpel; or rather the higheſt pitch of wiſdom and knowledge in divine things, which the Doctors and Rabbins among the Jews attained to in the age before the Meſſiah's coming; called this world in diſtinction from the times of the Meſſiah, which in Jewiſh language was, the world to come, as Dr. Lightfoot obſerves; who with all their wiſdom were confounded and brought to nought by the ſuperior wiſdom of the Goſpel.

Ver. 7. But we ſpeak the wiſdom of God, &c.] Not of men, not of the wiſe politicians, the learned philoſophers and Rabbins; that which human wiſdom has no hand in forming, nor in revealing, nor in propagating, and which is diſliked and diſapproved of by it: the Goſpel is the ſole produce of divine wiſdom, and in which there is a glorious diſplay of it; even in thoſe doctrines which are the moſt charged with folly, as ſalvation by a crucified Chriſt, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, pardon by his blood, ſatiſfaction by his ſacrifice, &c. in a myſtery; 'tis myſterious wiſdom. The Goſpel is full of myſteries; there is the myſtery of God, of a Trinity of perſons in the divine Eſſence; the myſtery of Chriſt, of his perſon, as God manifeſt in the fleſh, of his divine ſonſhip, and incarnation in the womb of a virgin; the myſtery of the Spirit's grace in regeneration, of the ſaints union to Chriſt, and communion with him, the reſurrection of the ſame body, the change of living ſaints at Chriſt's coming, with many others: even the hidden wiſdom; the Goſpel lay hid in God, in the thoughts of his heart, in the deep things of his mind, the counſels of his will, and purpoſes of his grace; it was hid in Chriſt, in whom are hid all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge; it was hid under the types and ſhadows of the ceremonial law; and is hid in the ſcriptures, which muſt be diligently ſearched for it, as for hidden treaſures. It was hid from angels, and from Adam, until revealed; it was in ſome meaſure hid from the Jews under the former diſpenſation, to whom it was made known; and in ſome ſenſe from believers, under the preſent diſpenſation, who as yet know it but in part; and is entirely hid from natural men, even from the moſt wiſe and prudent among them. This epithet expreſſes the preciouſneſs, ſecrecy, and alſo ſecurity of the Goſpel; hidden things being commonly of value, and being kept ſecret, are alſo ſafe; hidden and ſecret wiſdom has been always eſteemed, both by Greeks and Jews: hence that ſaying[u] of the latter, “ he “ that would be rich in learning of the law, “ והחכמה שהיא צפונה, and that wiſdom which is “ hidden, in a hidden and ſecret place, ſhould “ hide and ſecrete himſelf from the children of “ men.” The Apoſtle adds, which God ordained before the world. The Egyptians and Grecians boaſted much of the earlineſs of their wiſdom, but neither of them are to be mentioned with the Goſpel for the antiquity of it; it is the birth of God's counſels of old, the produce of his purpoſes, which he purpoſed in Chriſt before the world was; a ſcheme of things he drew in his eternal mind; 'tis a tranſcript of the council of peace and covenant of grace, which were from everlaſting; what the Jews[w] ſay of the law, is much more true of the Goſpel, “ that it was treaſured up with “ God, (they ſay two “ thouſand years, and ſometimes nine hundred “ and ſeventy-four ages) before the world was “ created;” and often ſpeak of it as one of the ſeven things created before the world was[x]. Moreover, this was to our glory; under the preſent diſpenſation, which by reaſon of the Goſpel has a glory in it ſurpaſſing the former; it is to the glory both of the miniſters of it, whoſe honour it is to be employed in preaching it, and in being by it the inſtruments of converting ſuch who will be their glory another day, and to the glory of all believers who are by it called to the obtaining of the glory of Chriſt Jeſus.

Ver. 8. Which none of the princes of this world knew, &c.] Meaning not the devils, as ſome have thought, who had they known what God deſigned to do by the death of Chriſt, would never have been concerned in bringing it about; nor ſo much the political governors of the Roman empire, particularly in Judea, as Herod and Pontius Pilate, who alſo were entirely ignorant of it; but rather the eccleſiaſtical rulers of the Jewiſh church-ſtate, called עולם הזה, this world, in diſtinction from עולם הבא, the world to come, or times of the Meſſiah; ſee Heb. ii. 5. ſuch as the prieſts, Scribes and Phariſees, the Rabbins and learned Doctors. Theſe knew nothing of the wiſdom of the Goſpel, or the wiſe counſels of God concerning ſalvation by Chriſt; they knew not the Meſſiah when he came, nor the prophecies concerning him; the Jews and their rulers did what they did thro' ignorance, and fulfilled thoſe things they knew nothing of; ſee Acts iii. 17, 18. and xiii. 27. for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. They would have received him, believed in him, and not put him to death: a very great character is here given of Chriſt, the Lord of glory, or the glorious Jehovah; reference ſeems to be had to Pſal. xxiv. 7. where he is called, the King of glory, and is an argument of his true and proper deity: he is ſo called becauſe poſſeſſed of all glorious perfections, and is the brightneſs of his Father's glory; the ſame honour and glory are due to him as to the Father; and the ſame aſcriptions of glory are made to him by angels and men. This is an inſtance of what the ancients call a communication of idioms or properties, whereby that which belongs to one nature in Chriſt, is predicated of his perſon, as denominated from the other: thus here the crucifixion of him, which properly belongs to his human nature, and that to his body only, is ſpoken of his perſon, and that as denominated from his divine nature, the Lord of glory; and he being ſo, this rendered his crucifixion, ſufferings, and death, in human nature, efficacious to anſwer all the purpoſes for which they were endured.

Ver. 9. But as it is written, &c.] Not in an apocryphal book, called the Apocalypſe of Elijah the prophet, as ſome have thought, but in Iſ. lxiv. 4. with ſome variation; and is brought to prove that the Goſpel is myſterious and hidden wiſdom, unknown to the princes of this world, and ordained before the world was, for the glory of the ſaints: for the following words are not to be underſtood of the glories and happineſs of the future ſtate; tho' they are indeed inviſible, unheard of, and inconceivable as to the excellency and fulneſs of them, and are what God has prepared from all eternity, for all thoſe on whom he beſtows his grace here; but of the doctrines of grace, and myſteries of the Goſpel, as the context and the reaſon of their citation abundantly ſhew; and are what eye hath not ſeen, nor ear heard; which could never have been ſeen to be read read by the eye of man, nor the ſound thereof ever heard by the ear of man, had not God been pleaſed to make a revelation of them; and tho' they are to be ſeen and read in the ſacred writings, and to be heard either read or expounded, with the outward hearing of the ear; yet are neither to be ſeen nor heard intellectually, ſpiritually, and ſavingly, unleſs God gives eyes to ſee, and ears to hear; the exterior ſenſes of ſeeing and hearing, are not ſufficient to come at and diſcover the ſenſe of them; fleſh and blood, human nature cannot ſearch them out, nor reveal them, no nor the internal ſenſes, the intellectual capacity of men: neither have entered into the heart of man; this clauſe is not in the original text; but is a phraſe often uſed by the Jews, for that which never came into a man's mind, was never thought of by him, or he ever had any conceptions, or the leaſt notion and idea of; ſo the elders of the city, at the beheading of the heifer, are repreſented not only as ſaying, our hands have not ſhed this blood, neither have our eyes ſeen it; but alſo neither על לבינו עלתה, hath it entered into our hearts, that the Sanhedrim hath ſhed blood[y]; and elſewhere[z] it is ſaid, this matter is like to a king, שעלה בלבו, into whoſe heart it entred, to plant in his garden, &c. The things which God hath prepared for them that love him; in the original text it is, for him that waiteth for him; the ſenſe is the ſame, for ſuch as hope in the Lord and wait for him, are lovers of him; and the meaning is, that God has prepared and laid up in his own breaſt, in his counſels and covenant, in the types, ſhadows and ſacrifices of the old law, in the promiſes and propheſies of the Old Teſtament, ſuch doctrines and myſteries of grace as were not ſo ſeen, heard, known and underſtood by the Old Teſtament prophets and ſaints; and has reſerved for his people under the Goſpel-diſpenſation, the times of the Meſſiah, a more clear diſcovery of them: ſo the Jews themſelves own that theſe words belong to the world to come[a], which with them commonly ſignifies the days of the Meſſiah; though here they think fit to diſtinguiſh them, and interpret the phraſe, eye hath not ſeen, of the eye of the prophets: their words are theſe[b]; "all propheſied not, but of the days of the Meſſiah; but as to the world to come, eye hath not ſeen, O God, beſides thee." The Gloſs on it is, "the eye of the prophets hath not been able to ſee it." Indeed, the myſteries of the Goſpel are more clearly diſcerned now, than by the prophets formerly.

Ver. 10. But God hath revealed them unto us, &c.] Should it be ſaid, that ſince this wiſdom is ſo hidden and myſterious, the doctrines of the Goſpel are ſo unknown, ſo much out of the ſight and underſtanding of men, how come any to be acquainted with them? The anſwer is ready, God has made a revelation of them, not only in his word, which is common to men, nor only to his miniſters, but to private chriſtians and believers, by his Spirit; which deſigns not the external revelation made in the ſcriptures, tho' that alſo is by the Spirit; but the internal revelation and application of the truths of the Goſpel to the ſouls of men, which is ſometimes aſcribed to the Father of Chriſt, Matt. xvi. 17. ſometimes to Chriſt himſelf, Gal. i. 12. and ſometimes to the Spirit of Chriſt, Eph. i. 17. and who guides into all truth, John xvi. 13. and here to the Father by the Spirit: for the Spirit ſearcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God; which does not ſuppoſe any ignorance of theſe things in the Spirit, antecedent to his ſearching of them; but his complete and perfect knowledge of them; even as God's ſearching of the hearts of men expreſſes his omniſcience, and thorough knowledge of all that is in them: the all things the Spirit ſearches into, and has a perfect knowledge of, do not deſign in the utmoſt extent every thing which comes within the compaſs of his infinite underſtanding; but every thing that is in, or belongs to the Goſpel of Chriſt, even the more myſterious and ſublime, as well as the more plain and eaſy doctrines: for the deep things of God intend not the perfections of his nature, which are paſt finding out unto perfection by men; nor the depths of his wiſe and righteous providence; but the myſterious doctrines of the Goſpel, the fellowſhip of the myſtery which was hid in God, his wiſe counſels of old concerning mans ſalvation, the ſcheme of things drawn in his eternal mind, and revealed in the word.

Ver. 11. For what man knoweth the things of a man, &c.] The thoughts of a man's heart, the conceptions of his mind, the ſchemes he is drawing there, his deſigns, purpoſes, and intentions; theſe can never be known by another man, no, nor by angels or devils; not by any creature; by none ſave the ſpirit of a man which is in him? which is only conſcious to, and can only make known the things that are in him: even ſo the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God; and which, as it proves how ſecret, hidden, unknown the myſteries of grace are, until revealed by the Spirit; ſo it gives full evidence to the deity of the Holy Ghoſt, and clearly ſhews he muſt be God, who is in him, knows the thoughts of his heart, the counſels of his mind, his purpoſes and decrees, and what is contained in them.

Ver. 12. Now we have received not the ſpirit of the world, &c.] Meaning either ſatan, the god of the world, the ſpirit that is in it, and rules over it; or the ſinful, carnal diſpoſition of the men of the world, which is a ſpirit of covetouſneſs, uncleanneſs, pride, malice, and error; or rather the carnal wiſdom of the world, which is common to worldly men, lies in the knowledge of worldly things, and is purſued and exerciſed for worldly advantages: but the Spirit which is of God; the Holy Ghoſt, which proceeds from the Father and the Son, is the gift of God to his people, and whom they receive thro' the doctrine of faith into their hearts, as a ſpirit of illumination, faith, comfort, adoption, truth, and as a ſeal and earneſt of future glory: that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God; who has given himſelf, his Son, and all things freely along with him, as a juſtifying righteouſneſs, remiſſion of ſins, adoption, and eternal life; all which were provided for them in the council and covenant of peace, and made up that grace given unto them freely in Chriſt before the world began; for there was not only an eternal purpoſe to beſtow theſe gifts, in the mind of God, and a promiſe of them in covenant, but a real donation of them to them, as conſidered in Chriſt ſo early: beſides, God gave his Son, and Chriſt gave himſelf for them before they knew any thing of the matter; and therefore muſt be unknown, until made known by the Spirit of God, who is ſent unto them, and into their hearts, for this purpoſe, to make them known, known; which he does, by ſhewing all this grace, and by opening and applying the truths of the everlaſting Goſpel: and this knowledge is not a mere notional one, but ſpiritual, experimental, and approbational, joined with affection and admiration; and is a knowledge of intereſt in theſe things, and which makes both humble and obedient.

Ver. 13. Which things alſo we ſpeak, &c.] Namely, the things which have not been ſeen by the eye, heard by the ear, or underſtood by the heart of man; the things God has prepared for his people; the deep things of God; the things of God which are only known to the Spirit; the things that are freely given to them of God, and made known to them by the Spirit of God: theſe things are ſpoken out, preached, and declared to the ſons of men, not in the words which man's wiſdom teacheth; which are learned in the ſchools of the philoſophers, put together by human art, and in the taught words of human wiſdom, as the clauſe may be rendered; ſuch as are taught and acquired by human learning, ſo artificially formed in their order and ſtructure as to work upon the affections of men, captivate the mind, and perſuade to an aſſent. But which the Holy Ghoſt teacheth; or in the taught words of the Holy Ghoſt; in the language of the ſcriptures, endited by the Spirit of God; or ſuch as the holy Spirit taught them, ſuggeſted to them, directed them to the uſe of; for he not only ſupplied them with matter, but furniſhed them with words, with proper and ſpiritual oratory: comparing ſpiritual things with ſpiritual; the things of the Spirit of God, the doctrines of the Goſpel, with the ſpiritual writings of the Old Teſtament, whereby their truth and harmony are demonſtrated; ſpeaking as the oracles of God, and propheſying or preaching according to the analogy of faith; and adapting ſpiritual words to ſpiritual truths, cloathing them with a language ſuitable and convenient to them, not foreign and flouriſhing, but pure, ſimple, and native; or accommodating and communicating ſpiritual things, as to matter and form, to ſpiritual men; which ſenſe the Arabic verſion favours and confirms, ſuch being only capable of them; and with theſe there's no need to uſe the eloquence, oratory, wiſdom, and words of men.

Ver. 14. But the natural man, &c.] Not a babe in Chriſt, one that is newly born again, for though ſuch have but little knowledge of ſpiritual things, yet they have a taſte, and do reliſh and deſire, and receive the ſincere milk of the word, and grow thereby; but an unregenerate man, that has no knowledge at all of ſuch things; not an unregenerate man only, who is openly and notoriouſly profane, abandoned to ſenſual luſts and pleaſures; though ſuch a man being ſenſual, and not having the Spirit, muſt be a natural man; but rather the wiſe philoſopher, the Scribe, the diſputer of this world; the rationaliſt, the man of the higheſt attainments in nature, in whom reaſon is wrought up to its higheſt pitch; the man of the greateſt natural parts and abilities, yet without the Spirit and grace of God, mentioned ch. i. 20. and who all along, both in that chapter and in this, quite down to this paſſage, is had in view: indeed, every man in a ſtate of nature, who is as he was born, whatever may be the inward furniture of his mind, or his outward conduct of life, is but a natural man, and ſuch an one receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; not the things relating to the deity, perſonality, and perfections of the Holy Spirit, though theſe the natural man knows not, nor receives; nor the things done by him, particularly the operations of his grace on the ſouls of men in regeneration, concerning which he ſays as Nicodemus did, how can theſe things be? but the truths of the Goſpel before ſpoken of; ſo called, becauſe they are contained in the ſcriptures endited by the Spirit of God, are the deep things of God, which he ſearches into and reveals; and becauſe they are made known by him, who is given and received for that end and purpoſe, that the ſaints might know them; and becauſe they are delivered by the preachers of the Goſpel, in words which he teacheth; now theſe the natural man receives not in the love of them, ſo as to approve of and like them, truly to believe them, cordially embrace them, and heartily be ſubject to them, profeſs and obey them,, but on the contrary abhors and rejects them: for they are fooliſhneſs unto him; they are looked upon by him as abſurd, and contrary to reaſon; they don't agree with his taſte, he diſreliſhes and rejects them, as things inſipid and diſtaſteful; he regards them as the effects of a crazy brain, and the reveries of a diſtempered head, and are with him the ſubject of banter and ridicule: neither can he know them; as a natural man, and whilſt he is ſuch, nor by the help and mere light of nature only; his underſtanding which is ſhut unto them, muſt be opened by a divine power, and a ſuperior ſpiritual light muſt be thrown into it; at moſt he can only know the literal and grammatical ſenſe of them, or only in the theory, notionally and ſpeculatively, not experimentally, ſpiritually, and ſavingly: becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned; in a ſpiritual manner, by a ſpiritual light, and under the influence, and by the aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God. There muſt be a viſive diſcerning faculty, ſuited to the object; as there muſt be a natural viſive faculty to ſee and diſcern natural things, ſo there muſt be a ſpiritual one, to ſee, diſcern, judge, and approve of ſpiritual things; and which only a ſpiritual, and not a natural man has.

Ver. 15. But he that is ſpiritual, &c.] Meaning not any particular individual perſon, not the pope of Rome, as his adherents vainly imagine, whom they fancy to be a ſupreme and infallible judge in things ſpiritual, from whoſe judgment is no appeal, and who himſelf comes not under the judgment of any; for he's ſo far from being a ſpiritual man, or having judgment in ſpiritual things, that he ſtands deſcribed as the man of ſin, the ſon of perdition, the wicked one, the beaſt, to whom a mouth is given, ſpeaking great things and blaſphemies; but a ſett of men are here meant, and not ſuch who are only outwardly reformed in their lives and converſations, who are at beſt but moral, and not ſpiritual men; nor all that have a form of godlineſs, an appearance of ſpirituality; there may be ſuch who may have this, and yet deny the power of it, in which the principle and eſſence of ſpirituality lies; nor all ſuch who have ſpiritual gifts, which may be where there is no ſpiritual grace; or that have a greater degree of ſpiritual knowledge than others, or that even have a greater degree of real grace than others; for though theſe are certainly ſpiritual men, 1 Cor. iii. 1, 2. Gal. vi. 1. yet they are not the only ones; others that have leſs knowledge and grace, are ſpiritual alſo, and are comprehended in this character; much leſs does it deſign ſuch who have no fleſh or ſin in them, for there are none without ſin in the preſent ſtate; and if this was eſſential to a ſpiritual man, there would be no ſpiritual man in the world; ſuch are only the ſaints in heaven, who are without fault before the throne; and after the reſurrection will have ſpiritual bodies, as well as their ſpirits or ſouls are now made perfect: but here a ſpiritual man, intends every man that is born of the Spirit; ſeeing what is born of the Spirit, is ſpirit, or ſpiritual; from whence the regenerate man is denominated ſpiritual; he is ſuch an one that is quickened by the Spirit of God, and lives ſpiritually by faith on Chriſt; he breaths after ſpiritual things, ſalvation by Chriſt, and an intereſt in him, communion with God, conformity to Chriſt, pardon of ſin, a juſtifying righteouſneſs, and eternal life: he has ſpiritual ſenſes, and theſe in exerciſe; he has a ſpiritual ſight of things, of himſelf, and his loſt ſtate by nature, and of the perſon, grace, and things of Chriſt; he has a ſpiritual hearing of the Goſpel, by which faith comes; he hears ſo as to live, and he lives ſo as that he hears the joyful ſound with underſtanding, approbation, and acceptance; he has a ſpiritual taſte of things, of the grace of God, the fruit of Chriſt, and the truths of the Goſpel; and he ſmells a ſweet ſavour in them; he has a ſpiritual feeling, he feels the weight and burden of ſin, the gracious influences and operations of the Spirit, and handles Chriſt, the word of life: he talks the ſpiritual language of Canaan, and his ſpeech bewrays him to be a ſpiritual man; and he walks ſpiritually by faith on Chriſt, and in the paths of holineſs, righteouſneſs, and truth: he is one that is renewed by the Holy Spirit, in the ſpirit of his mind; has a new heart, and a new ſpirit put within him; and is become a new creature in Chriſt: he has the good work of grace wrought in his ſoul; and in him grace is the reigning principle; in him the Spirit of God himſelf dwells, and he is led by him out of himſelf to Chriſt, and into all truth, and walks after him, and not after the fleſh: his converſation is ſpiritual and heavenly; he is ſpiritually minded, he minds not the things of the fleſh, but the things of the Spirit; and though there is a great deal of carnality in him, in his thoughts, his words, and actions, yet this is matter of grief to him, and is his daily complaint: and ſuch an one judgeth all things; or diſcerneth all things; not all things in nature, or which fall within the compaſs of human knowledge; there are many things he may have no knowledge of, nor judgment in, being for the moſt part not the wiſe and prudent, but the fooliſh things of the world who are ſpiritual; but things divine and ſpiritual, the things of the Spirit of God, the doctrines of the Goſpel before ſpoken of; and theſe not every difficult paſſage of ſcripture, or knotty point of controverſy, but the ſeveral articles of faith, neceſſary and eſſential to ſalvation; theſe are plain and eaſy to him, they ſtand before him in a clear light; as that ſalvation is alone by Chriſt, pardon by his blood, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, &c. theſe he has ſeen and taſted of, and reliſhes, and can diſcern things that differ, and approve thoſe which are more excellent; he can diſtinguiſh truth from error, and the voice of Chriſt from the voice of a ſtranger; and knows when the Goſpel is preached, and when not, of which he judges by the word of God and his own experience: not that every ſpiritual man has a like degree of ſpiritual knowledge and judgment, but every one diſcerns and judges according to the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt: yet he himſelf is judged of no man; or diſcerned of no man; that is, not of any natural man; who is not capable of diſcerning and judging, who and what he is; only a ſpiritual man can diſcern and judge of his ſpiritual light, grace, and ſtate; as the churches of Chriſt do, when perſons propoſe to them for communion; the other knows him not, but takes him to be a weak, or a wicked man, an hypocrite and a deceiver; and it is a ſmall thing with him to be judged of man's judgment; he cares not what judgment the natural man paſſes upon him; nor does his faith in things ſpiritual, ſtand upon the authority and judgment of men; nor will he ſubmit to it; nor can he be reproved, convinced, and refuted by ſuch a perſon: for though a thouſand ſophiſtic arguments may be uſed with him which he cannot anſwer, he has a witneſs within himſelf to the truths of the Goſpel, which oppoſes itſelf, and ſtands its ground againſt all objections; as with reſpect to the impurity of human nature, the impotency of man to do any thing that is ſpiritually good of himſelf, the inſufficiency of his righteouſneſs to juſtify him before God, the proper deity and real excellency of Chriſt, his blood and righteouſneſs, and the internal work of the Spirit of God on the heart; ſooner may a rock be removed out of its place, than a truly ſpiritual man can be convicted by a natural man of the falſhood of theſe things, of which he has had an inward experience, as well as is inſtructed in them by the word of God; nor can he be better taught and inſtructed by the natural man.

Ver. 16. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, &c.] The deep counſels of his heart, the ſcheme of ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt, as drawn in his eternal mind, the ſenſe of the Spirit of God in the writings of the Old Teſtament, the things of the Spirit of God, or the doctrines of grace more clearly revealed under the Goſpel diſpenſation; not any natural man, by the light of nature and ſtrength of reaſon, has known any of theſe things. The Apoſtle either cites or alludes to Iſa. xl. 13. that he may inſtruct him? not the Lord, who needs no inſtruction from any, nor can any teach and inſtruct him, nor would any be ſo bold and inſolent to attempt it; nor does the knowledge of the mind of the Lord, qualify any for ſuch a work; ſince if he knows ever ſo much of it, he can't know more than the Lord himſelf: but the ſpiritual man, whom, a natural man being ignorant of the mind of the Lord, cannot inſtruct; and ſo the words give a very proper and ſufficient reaſon, why the ſpiritual man is not diſcerned, judged, convinced, and inſtructed, by the natural man: but we have the mind of Chriſt; the ſame with the mind of the Lord; which proves that Chriſt is the Lord, or Jehovah, and ſo truly and properly God; and which is to be underſtood, not only of the Apoſtles and miniſters of the Goſpel, but of all true believers; and therefore want no inſtruction, as they can have none from the natural man; though chiefly of the former, whereby they were abundantly qualified for the further inſtruction, even of ſpiritual men.

CHAP. III.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle returns to the charge of ſchiſms and contentions upon the Corinthians, which were the occaſion of the epiſtle; and reproves them for their diviſions, which were about their miniſters; and gives them their juſt and due character, and who though they were uſeful and commendable in their places, were not to be gloried in; and eſpecially it was a great piece of weakneſs and folly, to ſet up one againſt another, when they had an equal intereſt in them all. Having in the latter part of the preceding chapter, made mention of the ſpiritual man, the Apoſtle tells the Corinthians, to whom he writes, that he could not addreſs them as ſpiritual, but as carnal; and not as perfect men, among whom he ſpake the wiſdom of God, but as babes in Chriſt, ver. 1. and this rudeneſs and ignorance of theirs, account for his conduct towards them, in delivering the plain and eaſy, and not the ſublime doctrines of the Goſpel to them, becauſe they were not able to bear them; nor were they yet able, notwithſtanding the length of time, the proficiency they had made, and the many teachers they had had among them, ver. 2. and to prove that they were carnal, and not ſpiritual, he inſtances in their envy, ſtrife, and contentions, which were carnal works, or works of the fleſh, ver. 3. and gives ſome particulars of their contentions about their miniſters, which put it out of all doubt, that they were carnal, ver. 4. and reproves them for ſuch contentions, and argues the folly and ſinfulneſs of them; partly from the character of their preachers, as ſervants and miniſters, who were the inſtruments of their faith and converſion, through the grace of God, and therefore not to be ſet up at the head of them as their Lords and maſters, ver. 5. and partly from the unprofitableneſs of their miniſtry, without a divine bleſſing, ver. 6, 7. and alſo from the unity and equality of the miniſters among themſelves, though their labours and reward were different, ver. 8. and therefore parties and factions were not to be made on their account; and beſides, as they were labourers with God, and the church were his huſbandry and building, in which they were employed, ver. 9. though they might differ in ſome ſuperſtructure points, yet they agreed in the foundation; and the Apoſtle inſtances in himſelf, under the character of a wiſe maſter builder, laying the foundation, and others building on it, ver. 10. and declares what this foundation was, which he and other Goſpel miniſters agreed in laying; nor was there any other that could be laid, to any good purpoſe beſides, which is Jeſus Chriſt, ver. 11. and then diſtinguiſhes between the different ſorts of builders, the one laying on the foundation things of the greateſt worth and value, and others things very trifling and uſeleſs, ver. 12. and intimates that there would be a time, when there would be a revelation and declaration of every man's work, of what ſort it is, ver. 13. ſo that according to their different ſtructures, there will be a different reward, as is ſuggeſted ver. 8. for though both ſorts of preachers are upon the foundation, and ſo their perſons will be ſafe, yet what they have built upon that foundation, according to the nature of it, ſhall either abide or be deſtroyed, ver. 14, 15. wherefore inaſmuch then as the church of Chriſt is a temple, a building laid on ſuch a foundation as Chriſt, it ought not to be defiled by factions and diviſions, by errors and hereſies; eſpecially ſince it is holy, and the Spirit of God dwells in it; and whoever does defile it, ſhall ſurely be deſtroyed; and therefore the Apoſtle diſſuades from it, both from the turpitude of the action, and the danger of it, ver. 16, 17. he cautions againſt the wiſdom of this world, which was the cauſe of their diviſions; as being ſelf-deceiving, and contrary to true wiſdom, ver. 18. and as being fooliſhneſs in the account of God, which he proves by ſome paſſages of ſcripture, ver. 19, 20. and concludes therefore, that no man ought to glory in men, in the beſt of men, not even in miniſters, ver. 21. ſo as to ſeparate and divide them, one from another, and ſet up one above another, ſince they and all things elſe, were theirs, ver. 22. the ground and evidence of which their right and property in them are given, they being Chriſt's, and Chriſt's God's, ver. 23.

Ver. 1. And I, brethren, could not ſpeak unto you, &c.] Though the Apoſtle was a ſpiritual man himſelf, had ſpiritual gifts, even the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, could judge all things, had the mind of Chriſt, and was able to ſpeak the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, yet could not ſpeak it to them, as unto ſpiritual: not but that they had the Spirit of God in them, and a work of grace upon them; for they were, as the Apoſtle afterwards ſays, the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelt in them; they were waſhed, ſanctified, and juſtified, in the name of the Lord Jeſus, and by the Spirit of our God; but had not that ſpiritual diſcerning, or judgment in ſpiritual things, which ſome believers had, at leaſt when the Apoſtle was firſt with them; and now they were under great ſpiritual declenſions, and had not thoſe ſpiritual frames, nor that ſpiritual experience and converſation, which ſome other chriſtians had: but as unto carnal; not that they were in a carnal ſtate, as unregenerate men are; but had carnal conceptions of things, were in carnal frames of ſoul, and walked in a carnal converſation with each other; though they were not in the fleſh, in a ſtate of nature, yet the fleſh was in them, and not only luſted againſt the Spirit, but was very predominant in them, and carried them captive, ſo that they are denominated from it: even as unto babes in Chriſt; they were in Chriſt, and ſo were new creatures; they were, as the Arabic verſion reads it, in the faith of Chriſt; though babes and weaklings in it, they were believers in Chriſt, converted perſons, yet children in underſtanding, knowledge, and experience; had but little judgment in ſpiritual things, and were unſkilful in the word of righteouſneſs; at leaſt this was the caſe of many of them, though others were inriched in all utterance and knowledge, and in no gift came behind members of other churches.

Ver. 2. I have fed you with milk, &c.] It is uſual with the Jews to compare the law to milk, and they ſay [c], that "as milk ſtrengthens and "nouriſhes an infant, ſo the law ſtrengthens and "nouriſhes the ſoul:" but the Apoſtle does not here mean, חלב של תורה, the milk of the law, as they [d] call it, but the Goſpel; comparable to milk, for its purity and wholeſomeneſs, for the nouriſhing virtue there is in it, and becauſe eaſy of digeſtion; for he deſigns by it, the more plain and eaſy doctrines of the Goſpel, ſuch as babes in Chriſt were capable of underſtanding and receiving: and not with meat; the more ſolid doctrines of the Goſpel, and ſublime myſteries of grace; the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, the hidden wiſdom; ſuch truths as were attended with difficulties, to which the carnal reaſon of men made many objections, and ſo were only fit to be brought before ſuch who are of full age, young men, or rather fathers in Chriſt; who have had a large experience, and a long time of improvement in ſpiritual knowledge, and have their ſenſes exerciſed to diſtinguiſh between truth and error. The reaſon he gives for this his conduct is, for hitherto ye were not able to bear it; they could not receive, reliſh, and digeſt it; it was too ſtrong meat for them, they being weak in faith, and but babes in Chriſt; wherefore he prudently adapted things to their capacities, and that in perfect conſiſtence with that faithfulneſs and integrity, for which he was ſo remarkable: for the Goſpel he preached to them, which he calls milk, was not another Goſpel, or contrary to that which goes by the name of meat; only the one conſiſted of truths more eaſy to be underſtood, and was delivered in a manner more ſuited to their capacities than the other: he adds, neither yet now are ye able; which carries in it a charge of dulneſs and negligence, that they had been ſo long learning, and were improved no more in the knowledge of the truth; were as yet only in the alphabet of the Goſpel, and needed to be afreſh inſtructed in the firſt principles of the oracles of God; for any thing beyond theſe was too high for them. The Apoſtle ſeems to allude to the manner and cuſtom of the Jews, in training up their children to learning; as to their age when they admit them ſcholars, their rule is this[e], "they introduce children (into the "ſchool) to be taught when ſix or ſeven years of "age, לפי כח חבן ובנין גופו, according to the "child's ſtrength, and the make of his body, and leſs "than ſix years of age they don't take any in." But ſooner than this, a father is obliged to teach his child at home, concerning which they ſay[f], "from "what time is his father obliged to teach him the "law? as ſoon as he begins to ſpeak, he teaches "him the law Moſes commanded us, and hear "O Iſrael, and after that he inſtructs him, "מעט מעט פסוקים פסוקים, by little and little, "here and there a verſe, till he is ſix or ſeven years "of age, and, חכל לפי בוריו, all this according to "the clearneſs of his underſtanding;" i. e. as he is able to take things in; and even till twelve years he was to be uſed with a great deal of tenderneſs: "ſays R. Iſaac[g], at Uſha they made an order, "that a man ſhould uſe his ſon gently, until he "is twelve years of age;" the Gloſs upon it is, "if his ſon refuſes to learn, he ſhall uſe him, "בנחת ובדברים רכים, with mildneſs and tender "language."

Ver. 3. For ye are yet carnal, &c.] The Syriac reads it, בבסר אנתון, ye are in the fleſh; a phraſe the Apoſtle elſewhere uſes, of men in an unregenerate ſtate; but this is not his meaning here, as before explained, but that carnality ſtill prevailed among them, of which he gives proof and evidence: for whereas there is among you envying, and ſtrife, and diviſions, are ye not carnal, and walk as men? They envied each others gifts and knowledge, ſtrove about words to no profit, entered into warm debates and contentions about their miniſters, and went into factions and parties, which were diſtinguiſhed by the names they were moſt affected to; in all which they gave too clear evidence of their prevailing carnality, that they too much walked as other men, who make no profeſſion of religion; that they were led by the judgment of men, and were carried away with human paſſions and affections; and in their conduct, could ſcarcely be diſtinguiſhed from the reſt of the world. The things that are here mentioned, and with which they are charged, are reckoned by the Apoſtle among the works of the fleſh, Gal. v. 19, 20. the phraſe, and diviſions, is omitted in the Alexandrian copy, and in ſome others, and in the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions.

Ver. 4. For while one ſaith, I am of Paul, &c.] This ſhews what their envying and ſtrife, and diviſions were about, and from whence they ſprung; and which ſerves to ſtrengthen the proof, and ſupport the charge of carnality brought againſt them; for when one ſort made a party for Paul, and ſet up him as their miniſter above all others; and ſaid another, I am of Apollos, preferring him for his eloquence above Paul, or any other preacher, as appears from ch. i. 12. there was a third ſort for Cephas, whom they cried up as ſuperior to the other two, or any other man; and a fourth were for Chriſt, and deſpiſed all miniſters whatever: are ye not carnal? all this was a demonſtration of it; they could never clear themſelves from it, they muſt be convicted in their own conſciences of it; to which the Apoſtle appeals: the Alexandrian copy and the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions read, are ye not men?

Ver. 5. Who then is Paul? and who is Apollos? &c.] The Apoſtle's name being uſed, and he a party concerned, could ſpeak the more freely upon this head, and aſk what they thought of himſelf, and other preachers, whether they were more than men? what authority and power they had, whether they looked upon them as the authors of a new religion, or the founders of a new ſect, that were to go by their names? and directs them what light to conſider them in, how that they were but miniſters by whom ye believed; they were ſervants to Chriſt and to his churches, and not lords; they did not aſſume any dominion over men, or pretend to lord it over God's heritage; there is but one Lord and maſter, and that is Chriſt, whom they ſerved, and taught others to obey; they were only inſtrumental in the hand of God, by whom ſouls were directed, encouraged, and brought to believe in Chriſt; as for faith itſelf, that is the gift of God, the operation of his power, and of which Chriſt is the author and finiſher; they laid no claim to this as their work, or imagined they had any dominion over it; that they could either implant it, or increaſe it of themſelves; but thought it honour enough done them, that it came by their miniſtry; and that that, and the joy of it, were helped and furthered by their means: the Vulgate Latin verſion reads, his miniſters whom ye believed; that is, the miniſters of Chriſt, whom they believed in; not in the miniſters, but Chriſt; the Arabic verſion renders it, but two miniſters, by whom ye believed; referring to Paul and Apollos, who are meant: even as the Lord gave to every man; gifts to miniſter with, and ſucceſs to his miniſtry; making him uſeful to this and the other man, to bring him to the faith of Chriſt; all which is owing to the free grace and ſovereign good-will and pleaſure of God.

Ver. 6. I have planted, &c.] That is, miniſterially; otherwiſe the planting of ſouls in Chriſt, and the implanting of grace in them, are things purely divine, and peculiar to God, and the power of his grace; but his meaning is, that he was at Corinth, as in other places, the firſt that preached the Goſpel to them; and was an inſtrument of the converſion of many ſouls, and of laying the foundation, and of raiſing and forming a Goſpel churchſtate, and of planting them in it: Apollos watered; he followed after, and his miniſtry was bleſſed for edification; he was a means of carrying on the ſuperſtructure, and of building up ſouls in faith and holineſs, and of making them fruitful in every good word and work: each miniſter of the Goſpel has his proper gifts, work, and uſefulneſs; ſome are planters, others waterers; ſome are employed in hewing down the ſturdy oaks, and others in ſquaring and fitting, and laying them in the building; ſome are Boanergeſes, ſons of thunder, and are moſtly uſeful in conviction and converſion; and others are Barnabaſes, ſons of conſolation, who are chiefly made uſe of in comforting and edifying the ſaints: but God gave the increaſe; for as the gardener may put his plants into the earth, and water them when he has ſo done, but cannot cauſe them to grow, this is owing to a divine bleſſing; and as the huſbandman tills his ground, caſts the ſeed into it, and waits for the former and latter rain, but can't cauſe it to ſpring up, or increaſe to perfection, this is done by a ſuperior influence; ſo miniſters of the Goſpel plant and water, caſt in the ſeed of the word, preach the Goſpel, but all the ſucceſs is from the Lord; God only cauſes it to ſpring up and grow; 'tis he that gives it its increaſing, ſpreading, fructifying virtue and efficacy.

[g] T. Bab. Cetubot, fol. 50. 1.

Ver. 7. So then, neither is he that planteth any thing, &c.] Not he that is the happy inſtrument of beginning the good work: neither he that watereth; who is the means of the carrying of it on: not that they are ſimply and abſolutely nothing, without any reſtriction and limitation; they are men, they are chriſtians, they are miniſters, and uſeful ones, by whom others believe; they are labourers together with God, miniſters of Chriſt, and ſtewards of the myſteries of God, and ſo to be accounted of; but they are nothing in themſelves, nor in their own account, or with reſpect to God: they are nothing of themſelves as miniſters; they have nothing but what they have received; all their gifts are from God, nor can they exerciſe them aright without the grace of God, not being able to think a good thought as of themſelves; nor are they any thing in making their planting and watering effectual; and ſo no glory belongs to them; nothing is to be aſcribed to them, they have no part nor lot in theſe things: but God that giveth the increaſe; he gives them their abilities, aſſiſts them in the exerciſe of their gifts, makes their miniſtrations uſeful, and he has, as he ought to have, all the glory.

Ver. 8. Now he that planteth, and he that watereth are one, &c.] Not in every reſpect ſo; they were different as men, they were not the ſame individual perſons, nor in the ſame office; Paul was an Apoſtle, Apollos only a preacher of the Goſpel; nor had they the ſame meaſure of gifts, nor did they labour alike, or were of the ſame uſefulneſs; but they had one and the ſame commiſſion to preach the Goſpel; and the Goſpel they preached was the ſame; and ſo were their views, aims, and ends, which were the glory of God, and the good of immortal ſouls; and they had the ſame love and affection for one another; they were one in their work, judgment, and affection; and which carries in it a ſtrong reaſon and argument, why the members of this church ſhould not contend and divide about them: and every man ſhall receive his own reward; either from men, that double honour he is worthy of, maintenance and reſpect; or rather from God, not a reward of debt, for his labours are by no means meritorious of any thing at the hands of God, from whom he has all the grace, ſtrength, and abilities, he labours with; but of grace, even the reward of the inheritance, becauſe he ſerves the Lord Chriſt; which is by bequeſt, through the death of the teſtator, and common to all the children of God, and heirs of glory: according to his own labour; and not another's; and not according to the ſucceſs of it, but according to that itſelf; not that that is the meaſure of the reward, for the reward infinitely exceeds it; but is that to which God has graciouſly annexed the promiſe of the reward, as an encouragement to it.

Ver. 9. For we are labourers together with God, &c.] The miniſters of the Goſpel are labourers in the Lord's vineyard, and not loiterers; their work is a laborious work, both to body and mind; which lies in cloſe ſtudy and meditation, in diligent reading and conſtant prayer, in frequent miniſtration of the word, and adminiſtration of ordinances; beſides reproofs, admonitions, and exhortations, counſels, and inſtructions, which are often neceſſary: 'tis a work, which no man is ſufficient for of himſelf; what requires diligence, induſtry, and faithfulneſs; is honourable, and when rightly performed, deſerves reſpect: nor do they labour alone, but with God; not as co-ordinate, but as ſubordinate workers; for though they labour in planting and watering, yet they bear no part with him in giving the increaſe; he is the huſbandman, the chief maſter builder, they are labourers under him; however he works with them; hence their labours are not in vain, and they have great encouragement to go on in their work; and they are God's labourers with one another, which is a ſenſe of the phraſe not to be overlooked. The Apoſtle often in his epiſtles, ſpeaks of his fellow-workmen, and fellow-labourers, who wrought together with him under God: ye are God's huſbandry; or tillage; he is the proprietor of the field, the occupier of it, the huſbandman who breaks up the fallow ground of the hearts of his people; he caſts in the ſeed of grace, he makes the ground good, and cauſes it to bring forth fruit; the churches of Chriſt are his property, land of his manuring, and all the fruit belongs unto him; they are gardens of his planting, and vineyards of his watering, and which he keeps night and day, leſt any hurt: ye are God's building; as the former metaphor is taken from agriculture, this is from architecture: believers in a church-ſtate, are God's houſe, in which he dwells, and which he himſelf has built; he has laid the foundation, which is Jeſus Chriſt; he makes his people lively ſtones, and lays them on it; he raiſes up the ſuperſtructure and will compleat the building, and ought to bear all the glory, and in all which he makes uſe of his miniſters as inſtruments.

Ver. 10. According to the grace of God which is given unto me, &c.] Leſt the Apoſtle ſhould be thought to be too much elated with the characters he had given of himſelf, and other miniſters, or to aſſume too much to himſelf, in what he was about to ſay of himſelf, he aſcribes all the gifts he had, and the uſefulneſs he was of, as a labourer and builder in the church of God, to rich grace; by which he was called unto, and qualified for ſuch work: as a wiſe maſter-builder. This ſame phraſe, σοφος αρχιτεκτων, a wiſe maſter-builder, is uſed by the Septuagint interpreters, in Iſa. iii. 3. by which they render, חכם חרשים, the cunning artificer, or the wiſe man of the carpenters, or artificers. The architect of all is God the Father, Son, and Spirit; God the Father is the builder of all things; Chriſt builds his church on himſelf the rock; and the ſaints are built up an habitation for God, through the Spirit; miniſters are builders under God, inſtruments he makes uſe of, and who would labour in vain, unleſs the Lord build the city: ſuch an one was the Apoſtle, though he calls himſelf a maſter-builder with reſpect to inferior miniſters; he being in the higheſt office in the church, as an Apoſtle, and not a whit behind the chief of them; and was the chief Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and was principally concerned in preaching the Goſpel to them, and in raiſing churches among them. The alluſion is to the Jews, who uſe to call the Rabbins and doctors, and the diſciples of the wiſe men, builders: they aſk in a certain place [h], "מאי בנאין, who are " the builders? ſays R. Jochanan, theſe are the " diſciples of the wiſe men, who employ them- " ſelves in the building of the world all their days [i]." That is, the law, as one [k] of their writers explains this building; hence they are ſometimes called builders of the law, and which was looked upon to be an high character: it is ſaid [l] of a certain perſon, that "R. Zeira praiſed him, and called him, " בנייה דאורייתא, a builder of the law." But the Apoſtle was a Goſpel builder, a builder of Goſpel churches in Goſpel truths, and in faith and holineſs; theſe were fooliſh builders, but he a wiſe one; and his wiſdom lay in the knowledge of Chriſt, in preaching him, and in winning ſouls unto him; and particularly in that he took care in his miniſtry, to lay a good foundation: I have laid the foundation; meaning not only that as at other places, ſo at Corinth, he firſt preached the Goſpel to them, and was the firſt inſtrument of their converſion, and laying the foundation of a Goſpel church-ſtate; but that in his preaching he laid Chriſt as the one and only foundation, for men to build their faith and hope upon, for everlaſting life and happineſs, mentioned in the following verſe: and another buildeth thereupon; which deſigns not a private chriſtian, who was directed in the Apoſtle's miniſtry to build his ſoul upon the rock of ages, Chriſt the ſure foundation laid in Zion; though there is a truth in this, the Apoſtle laid Chriſt as a foundation, and encouraged others to build their faith and hope upon him, as to eternal ſalvation; and many were enabled to do ſo, which was the happy fruit of his miniſtry, and what gave him pleaſure; and in this ſenſe he alſo himſelf built upon this foundation, for this can't be ſaid of another, to the excluſion of himſelf; he would never lay a foundation, and direct others to build on it, and not build upon it himſelf; but another miniſter of the Goſpel is meant, as Apollos, or any other who might follow him, and be a means of carrying on the building upon the foundation he had laid, and of edifying and eſtabliſhing ſouls upon it; and of rearing up ſuperſtructure truths, upon the foundation one: but let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon; that he builds by line, evenly, according to the analogy of faith; that he builds in proportion to the foundation; and lays ſuch things upon it as are becoming it, and ſuitable to it.

Ver. 11. For other foundation can no man lay, &c.] Men may attempt to lay other foundations than Chriſt, and build upon them, but to no purpoſe; they will be of no avail; all beſides him are ſandy foundations; ſuch as fleſhly privileges, a carnal deſcent, a religious education, an external profeſſion of religion, a man's own righteouſneſs, and the abſolute mercy of God; but men ought to lay no other, nor can they, that will be of any advantage to themſelves or others: than that which is laid; by Jehovah the Father, both in his eternal counſels and covenant, when he ſet forth and appointed Chriſt to be the Saviour and Redeemer of his people; and in the fulneſs of time, when he ſent him forth under the ſame characters; and by the Spirit of God, when he reveals Chriſt to them, and forms him in them; and by the miniſters of the Goſpel, who jointly agree to lay him miniſterially, as the foundation for ſouls to build their hope upon: hence he is called the foundation of the Apoſtles and Prophets, as here, which is Jeſus Chriſt; he is the foundation perſonally conſidered, as God-man and mediator, on which the church, and every believer is built; he is the foundation of the covenant of grace, and of eternal ſalvation; of the faith and hope, peace, joy, and comfort of all the ſaints; and of the building of God, that houſe not made with hands, that city which has foundations, eternal glory in the other world: and he is the foundation doctrinally conſidered; or the doctrines of his proper deity, of his divine and eternal Sonſhip, of his incarnation, of his Meſſiahſhip, of his obedience, ſufferings, death, and reſurrection from the dead, of juſtification by his righteouſneſs, pardon by his blood, and atonement by his ſacrifice, &c. are fundamental ones: the Jews were wont to call the principal articles of their religion, יסודי, foundations: Maimonides has entituled one of his tracts, יסודי התורה, the foundations of the law; but the doctrines reſpecting the perſon, offices, and grace of Chriſt, are the only foundation of the Goſpel.

Ver. 12. Now if any man build upon this foundation, &c.] The different materials laid by one and the ſame man, on this foundation, or the different doctrines advanced upon it, are ſome of them comparable to gold, ſilver, precious ſtones; for their intrinſic worth and value; for the purity and ſincerity of them; for their weight, importance, ſolidity, and ſubſtantiality; for their durableneſs; for the great eſteem they are had in by thoſe, who know the worth of them; and for the great uſefulneſs they are of unto them, being rich in themſelves, and enriching to them; and theſe are the great, momentous, and valuable truths of the Goſpel, which agree with, and are ſuitable to the foundation they are built upon: ſo the Jews [m] compare their oral and written law, the former to gold, and the latter to precious ſtones, but the metaphors much better ſuit the doctrines of the Goſpel: others are like to wood, hay, ſtubble; by which are meant, not heretical doctrines, damnable hereſies, ſuch as are diametrically oppoſite to, and overturn the foundation; for one and the ſame man builds the former, as theſe, and is himſelf ſaved at laſt; neither of which is true, of ſuch that deliver doctrines of devils: but empty, trifling, uſeleſs things are meant; ſuch as fables, endleſs genealogies, human traditions, Jewiſh rites and ceremonies; which through the prejudice of education, and through ignorance and inadvertency, without any bad deſign, might by ſome be introduced into their miniſtry, who had been brought up in the Jewiſh religion; as alſo the wiſdom of the world, the philoſophy of the Gentiles, oppoſitions of ſcience falſly ſo called, curious ſpeculations, vain and idle notions, which ſuch who had their education among the Greeks, might ſtill retain, and be fond of; and through an itch of vain-glory, mix with their evangelic miniſtrations; and in a word, every thing that may now be advanced in the Goſpel miniſtry, not ſo honourable to the grace of God, or ſo becoming the perſon, blood, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, nor ſo conſiſtent with the Spirit's work of grace, may be meant hereby: the ſame miniſter at different times, and ſometimes at one and the ſame time in his miniſtry, lays the foundation, Chriſt, and builds on it for a while, excellent, valuable truths, raiſes a ſuperſtructure of gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, and then covers the edifice with trifling, impertinent, and inconſiſtent things, with wood, hay, and ſtubble; and ſo at laſt of this promiſing fine ſtately building, makes a thatched houſe.

Ver. 13. Every man's work ſhall be made manifeſt, &c.] The doctrine he preaches, ſhall be ſooner or later made manifeſt to himſelf, and to his hearers; who ſhall ſee the inconſiſtency, irregularity, and deformity of ſuch a building; at firſt ſo well laid, then piled up with ſuch excellent materials, and at laſt covered in with ſuch trifling or incoherent ſtuff: for the day ſhall declare it; meaning not the day of judgment, though that is often called the day, or that day, and will be attended with fire, and in it all ſecrets ſhall be made manifeſt; but the Apoſtle intends a diſcovery that will be made of doctrines in this world, before that time comes: wherefore this day rather deſigns a day of tribulation; as of perſecution, which tries mens principles, whether they are ſolid or no; and of error and hereſy, when men are put upon a re-examination of their doctrines, whereby perſons and truths that are approved, are made manifeſt; or of ſome great calamity, ſuch as the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, whereby many wrong notions the Jews yet retained, were diſcovered: but it is beſt of all to underſtand this day of the Goſpel day, and of the progreſs of Goſpel light, eſpecially in ſome particular periods of it; as in the primitive times, at the reformation from popery, and the more remarkable Goſpel day-light, which will be in the latter times, when the impertinence and inconſiſtency of many things which now obtain in the miniſtry, will be ſeen; ſee Epheſ. v. 13. Becauſe it ſhall be revealed by fire; not that day, but the man's work, or doctrine: and the fire ſhall try every man's work of what ſort it is; by the fire is meant, not the general conflagration of the world, when that and all that is therein, will be burnt up; much leſs the fire of purgatory, the Papiſts dream of, for the puniſhment of evil actions; for the Apoſtle is not ſpeaking of the actions of men, good or bad, but of the doctrines of miniſters; rather the fire of tribulation and affliction, which as it is for the trial of the grace of faith, ſo of the doctrine of faith, whereby it becomes much more precious than of gold that periſheth; or of ſome fiery diſpenſation of God's vengeance, as on Jeruſalem: though the word of God, which is as fire, ſeems to be intended; which in ſome certain times ſo blazes forth, and will more eſpecially in the latter day, that by the light of it, both miniſters and churches will be able to ſee clearly the bright ſhining luſtre of the gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones; and with ſo much heat, as to burn up the wood, hay, and ſtubble; when the difference between theſe things, will be moſt eaſily diſcerned.

Ver. 14. If any man's work abide, &c.] That is, if any miniſter's doctrine will bear the teſt of day-light, to be looked into, and abide the fire of the word; as gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones will, or ſuch doctrines as are comparable to them, which will ſhine the brighter, for being tried by this fire: which he hath built thereupon; upon the foundation Chriſt, in entire conſiſtence with, and proportion to it, and highly becoming it: he ſhall receive a reward; either from the churches of Chriſt here, who ſhall honour and reſpect him for his faithful labours in the miniſtry; or from Chriſt hereafter, who will ſay, well done, good and faithful ſervant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.

Ver. 15. If any man's work ſhall be burnt, &c.] If any miniſter's doctrine he has preached, ſhall be deſtroyed and diſappear, ſhall be diſapproved of, and rejected by the churches, not being able to bear the light and heat of the fire of God's word: he ſhall ſuffer loſs; of all his labour and pains he has been at, in collecting together ſuch trifling, uſeleſs, and inconſiſtent things; and of all that glory and popular applauſe he might expect from men, on account of them, and which was the ſnare that drew him into ſuch a way of preaching: but he himſelf ſhall be ſaved; with an everlaſting ſalvation; not by his miniſterial labours, much leſs by his wood, hay, and ſtubble, which will be all burnt up; but through his being, notwithſtanding all the imperfections of his miniſtry, upon the foundation Chriſt: yet ſo as by fire; with much difficulty, and will be ſcarcely ſaved; ſee 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18. Zech. xiii. 9. with great danger, loſs, and ſhame; as a man that is burnt out of houſe and home, he eſcapes himſelf with his own life, but loſes all about him: ſo the Syriac verſion reads it, איך דמן נורא, as out of the fire; ſee Zech. iii. 2. Jude 23. Or the ſenſe is, that he ſhall be tried by the fire of the word, and convinced by the light of it, of the errors, irregularities, and inconſiſtencies of his miniſtry; either in his time of life and health, or on a death-bed; and ſhall have all his wood, hay, and ſtubble burnt up, for nothing of this kind ſhall he carry with him in his judgment to heaven; only the gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones; and will find that the latter doctrines, and not the former, will only ſupport him in the views of death and eternity.

Ver. 16. Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, &c.] The Apoſtle having ſpoken of the ſaints as God's building, of himſelf as a wiſe maſter-builder, of Chriſt as the only foundation, and of various doctrines as the materials laid thereon, proceeds to obſerve to this church, and the members of it, that they being incorporated together in a Goſpel church-ſtate, were the temple of God; and which was what they could not, or at leaſt ought not, to be ignorant of: and they are ſo called, in alluſion to Solomon's temple; which as it was a type of the natural, ſo of the myſtical body of Chriſt. There's an agreement between that and the church of Chriſt, in its maker, matter, ſituation, magnificence, and holineſs; and the church is ſaid to be the temple of God, becauſe it is of his building, and in which he dwells: what the Apoſtle here ſays of the ſaints at Corinth, the Jewiſh doctors ſay of the Iſraelites [n], היכל יהוה אותם, the temple of the Lord are ye; and which being uſually ſaid of them in the Apoſtle's time, he may refer unto; and much better apply to the perſons he does, of which the indwelling of the Spirit was the evidence: and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you; in particular members, as a Spirit of regeneration, ſanctification, faith, and adoption, and as the earneſt and pledge, of their future glory; in their miniſters to fit, and qualify them for their work, and carry them through it; and in the whole church, to bleſs the word and ordinances, for their growth, comfort, and eſtabliſhment. This furniſhes out a conſiderable proof of the deity and diſtinct perſonality of the Spirit, ſince this is mentioned as an evidence of the ſaints being the temple of God, which would not be one, if the Spirit was not God, who dwells therein; and ſince a temple is ſacred to deity, and therefore if he dwells here as in a temple, he muſt dwell here as God; and ſince he is mentioned as diſtinct from God, whoſe Spirit he is, and dwelling, a perſonal action is aſcribed to him, he muſt be a diſtinct divine perſon.

---

[n] R. Alſhech in Hag. ii. 5.

Ver. 17. If any man defile the temple of God, &c.] By the wiſdom of the world, through philoſophy, and vain deceit; by bringing in falſe doctrines, errors, and hereſies, and thereby corrupt their minds from the ſimplicity that is in Chriſt; and make rents, factions, and diviſions among them: him ſhall God deſtroy; body and ſoul in hell; for as their wicked principles, and heretical notions, are pernicious to others, they are damnable to themſelves, and will bring upon them that judgment which lingreth not, and that damnation which ſlumbereth not. The falſe prophet, as well as the beaſt, and the devil, ſhall be caſt into the lake of fire and brimſtone. God is not only an avenger of all immoralities committed againſt his righteous law, but of all falſe doctrine and falſe worſhip, and of every thing that is contrary to the Goſpel, and to the order and ordinances of it. The reaſon of this is, for the temple of God is holy; alluding to the holineſs of Solomon's temple, "into which a man might not go with his ſtaff, nor with his ſhoes on, nor with his purſe, nor with duſt upon his feet, nor might he make it a thorough-fare, and much leſs ſpit in it[o]." And yet, how was it polluted in our Lord's time by the Jews, who made it a den of thieves, inſtead of an houſe of prayer? which temple ye are. This is added for further confirmation, and to aſſert their holineſs in doctrine, worſhip and converſation, and to deter the falſe teachers from making any uſe of any means to corrupt them in either.

Ver. 18. Let no man deceive himſelf, &c.] With vain notions of ſerving God and religion, and of doing the churches good by his carnal and worldly wiſdom, and with falſe hopes of eſcaping the vengeance of God for ſowing the tares of error, hereſy, and diſcord among his people. If any man among you ſeemeth to be wiſe in this world; either a member of them, or a preacher among them, who thought himſelf wiſe in worldly wiſdom; or was deſirous to be thought ſo by others; or would be a truly wiſe man in this world, whilſt he lives in it, and before he goes out of it: let him become a fool that he may be wiſe; not that, properly ſpeaking, folly is the way to wiſdom; but that that man that would be wiſe in a ſpiritual ſenſe, muſt firſt learn to know himſelf; muſt be convinced of, and acknowledge his own folly, embrace the Goſpel of Chriſt, which is eſteemed fooliſhneſs by the world; ſubmit to the ordinances of Chriſt, which are deſpiſed by men; and take up the croſs of Chriſt, and follow him, bear reproach and perſecution for his ſake, than which nothing is more ridiculous with carnal men: he muſt deny his worldly wiſdom, his carnal and righteous ſelf, and wholly reſt, and rely on Chriſt, and his righteouſneſs, for eternal life and happineſs, and ſo will he become truly wiſe unto ſalvation. The Jews[p] have a ſaying, "that every one, המנבל עצמו, that makes himſelf a fool, for the words of the law, at the end, ſhall be exalted."

Ver. 19. For the wiſdom of this world is fooliſhneſs with God, &c.] The wiſdom of the Jewiſh, or Gentile world. It is had in no account with him; it is deſpiſed and neglected by him; he makes it fooliſh, deſtroys it, and brings it to nothing; he lays it aſide as uſeleſs, to make men wiſe unto ſalvation, and by the fooliſhneſs of preaching ſaves them that believe; he paſſes by the wiſe and prudent, and hides the things of the Goſpel from them; ſo that with all their learning and wiſdom, they can neither apprehend nor comprehend the myſteries of grace, whilſt he reveals them unto babes, and chuſes the fooliſh things of this world to ſpread the knowledge of himſelf, his Son, his Goſpel, and the truths of it, and whom he makes ſucceſsful to the confuſion of the wiſe and learned. For it is written, כדכתיב, an uſual form of citing ſcriptures with the Jews; it is in Job v. 13. he taketh the wiſe in their own craftineſs, or by it. What Eliphaz ſays of the wiſe politicians of the world, who are often diſappointed of their crafty devices, and cannot perform the enterprizes they have took in hand, but their ſchemes are broken, and the ſnares they laid for others, they are taken in themſelves, is applied by the Apoſtle to the Jewiſh doctors, or the Gentile philoſophers, or rather to the falſe teachers among the chriſtians; whoſe ſchemes they have formed, to corrupt the churches, and demoliſh the Goſpel, prove their own deſtruction; nor will they, with all their cunning, be able to get out of the hand of God, and eſcape his awful vengeance. The alluſion is either to the taking of wild beaſts and birds, in ſnares and nets, or to the taking of men in flight, laying hold of them with the hand, and graſping them hard, that they cannot get looſe. The Targum interprets the words of the wiſe men of Pharaoh, and of the Egyptian aſtrologers.

Ver. 20. And again, &c.] Not in the ſame place, nor in the ſame book, but in the pſalms, in Pſ. xciv. 11. This form of citing ſcriptures anſwers to ועוד, and moreover, uſed by the Jewiſh doctors when the matter does not ſo clearly appear from the firſt proof, and therefore they produce another[q]: and ſo here the Apoſtle, for the further confirmation and illuſtration of this point, that the wiſdom of this world is fooliſhneſs with God, to the teſtimony of Eliphaz, adds this of David, the Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wiſe, that they are vain; in the pſalms it is, the Lord knoweth the thoughts of men, that they are vanity; which the Apoſtle not only cites, but explains and teaches; as that by men is meant men of wiſdom and knowledge, of the greateſt capacities, whoſe thoughts, reaſonings, ſchemes, and devices, the omniſcient God not only knows, but makes known, and diſcovers them, ſooner or later, to be vain and fruitleſs, yea, vanity itſelf; and notwithſtanding all their machinations and contrivances, his counſel ſhall ſtand, his Goſpel ſhall be maintained, his truths ſhall prevail, and his ordinances ſhall be continued, and his work go on.

Ver. 21. Therefore let no man glory in men, &c.] The Apoſtle means miniſters, who are but men, even the beſt of them, and therefore not to be gloried in; and has chiefly reſpect to the falſe teachers, whoſe wiſdom, learning, and eloquence, the Corinthians were greatly taken with, and boaſted of; it was ſo enſnaring to them, that they even idolized them for it, called them their maſters, pinn'd their faith on their ſleeve, gave up themſelves to them, and were greatly under their authority, influence, and direction, which is here condemned; and which was ſo far from being right, that they ought not to behave in ſuch manner to the beſt of miniſters, nor to glory in any one above another; no, not in Paul, nor Apollos, nor Cephas; for all things are yours: all the miniſters, and all they are endowed with; theſe were all for their uſe and ſervice, for their benefit and advantage; wherefore it was very wrong to ſet up one above, or againſt another, or for any party to engroſs any one miniſter, when he belong'd to them all; and great weakneſs to reject others, when they had a common right and property in them.

[q] Vid. Surenhuſii Biblos Katallages, p. 11, 531.

Ver. 22. Whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, &c.] Theſe are particularly named, becauſe their diſputes were chiefly about them; but what is ſaid of them is true of all other, and all the miniſters of Chriſt's, that they are the churches. The gifts which Chriſt received for them, and has beſtowed on them, are not their own, but the churches, and are given to them, not ſo much for their own uſe, as for the good and benefit of others. They are made able miniſters of the New Teſtament, not by themſelves, nor by man, but by God; who diſpoſes of them, as bleſſings to his churches, and gives them to be paſtors and teachers of them, to feed them with knowledge, and with underſtanding; they are qualified by the Spirit of God for the ſervice of the ſaints, and are ſeparated by him to it, and are conſtituted overſeers of the flock by his direction; they are placed as ſtewards of the myſteries and manifold grace of God, to diſpenſe them with wiſdom and faithfulneſs to all in his family, and are the ſervants of the churches for Jeſus's ſake, and therefore not to be gloried in; though to be reſpected in their place and ſtation: or the world: this, with what follows, is an amplification of the account, and is, as if the Apoſtle ſhould ſay, you ſhould be ſo far from glorying in man, in a few poor, weak inſtruments, and eſpecially in that in them, which with God is fooliſhneſs and vanity, that not only all the miniſters of the word are yours, but even the whole world is yours; tho' called out of it, eſteemed the filth of it, and have ſo little a ſhare of it. The world was made for the ſake of the ſaints, and is continued on their account; when they are called by grace, it will ſoon be at an end. It is their Lord's, and ſo theirs, both as creator and mediator; the good things of the world are enjoyed by the ſaints in a peculiar way, as covenant mercies and bleſſings, ſo as they are not by others. The evil things of it, as the ſins and luſts of it, are eſcaped by them; and the afflictions they meet with in it are made to work for their good; and as they are heirs of the world, as Abraham was, ſo they ſhall inherit it in a much better form than it now is: the preſent heavens will paſs away, the earth, and all therein will be burnt up, and new heavens, and a new earth ariſe, in which will dwell none but righteous perſons: the world, in its preſent ſtate, is an inn, ſuited to the condition of the ſaints, as pilgrims and ſtrangers; but then it will be as a palace, fit for the ſpouſe and bride of Chriſt. Or life; in every view of it: the life of Chriſt, which he lived here on earth, in obedience to his Father's will, and which he now lives in heaven, where he ever lives to make interceſſion for his people, and for their good; that fulneſs of life that is in him, and that eternal life which is through him, are all theirs. The lives of the miniſters of the Goſpel are for their profit and advantage; and they are ſpared and continued on their account; their own lives are theirs, though not to live to themſelves, nor to the luſts of men, but by faith on Chriſt, and to the glory of God, and which is what they deſire. Or death; the death of Chriſt was for them, in their room and ſtead, for their ſins, to make ſatisfaction to divine juſtice for them; and the benefits of it are enjoyed by them. The death of good men, miniſters, martyrs, and confeſſors is theirs, ſerves to confirm their faith, animate their zeal, and encourage them to hold faſt the profeſſion of their faith without wavering. Their own death is a bleſſing to them; the ſting is taken away by Chriſt; the curſe is removed; 'tis no penal evil to them; 'tis a deliverance of them from all the ſorrows and troubles of this life, and is their paſſage into endleſs glory and happineſs. Or things preſent; whether proſperous or adverſe; and theſe, whether they be their own or others, all work together for their good. Or things to come; future troubles and exerciſes; or future good things, either in this world, or in the world to come; the inviſible glories of a future ſtate: all are yours; which is repeated for confirmation ſake, and to obſerve, that if there was any thing that was omitted, or could not be thought to be included in any of the above expreſſions, that alſo was theirs.

Ver. 23. And ye are Chriſt's, &c.] This is the ground and foundation of all things being theirs, and ſhews in what way they come by them, and what gives them their claim and property: they are Chriſt's, he has an intereſt in them, and they in him; they are his, not only by creation, as all men are, but by the Father's ſpecial gift of them to him, as his ſpouſe and bride, his children, his ſheep, his portion, and his jewels; they are his thro' the purchaſe of his own blood, and by a voluntary ſurrender of themſelves unto him, under the influence of his Spirit and grace; they are his by their profeſſion of him; they avouch themſelves to be the Lord's, and call themſelves by his name; and they are his by his poſſeſſion of them, and dwelling in their hearts by faith; and all they have are his. Their worſt things are his; their ſins are accounted to him, and laid on him by imputation, and have been bore and done away by him: their griefs and ſorrows are his, their reproaches his, and their afflictions and ſufferings his. Their beſt things are his; their temporal mercies come from him, and thro' him; and all their ſpiritual bleſſings, they are bleſſed with in him; and all the good things done by them are done in his ſtrength, by the aſſiſtance of his Spirit, and in virtue of his grace. And Chriſt is God's; he is his Son, his own, his only-begotten and well-beloved Son, as he is a divine perſon; and as man he is his creature, made by him, and inferior to him; he is the head of him, as the man is of the woman; and as mediator, he is his righteous ſervant, whom he has choſen, called, brought forth, upheld, and in whom he is glorified: ſo that, upon the whole, the ſaints ſhould not glory in men, tho' ever ſo great and good, but in God, and in Chriſt, as of God, made unto them wiſdom, righteouſneſs, ſanctification, and redemption.

CHAP. IV.

THE chief heads of this chapter are the account that ought to be had of the miniſters of the Goſpel; cautions againſt cenſoriouſneſs, raſh judgment, pride, and ſelf-conceit; the uncomfortable circumſtances and ſituation of the miniſters of the Goſpel for the ſake of preaching it; the Apoſtle's fatherly affection to the Corinthians, and his authority over them; his reſolution in ſubmiſſion to the will of God of coming to them, and the manner in which it might be expected he would come. The Apoſtle exhorts to have in proper eſteem, the preachers of the Goſpel, and that becauſe they are Chriſt's miniſters and ſtewards of his grace, and faithful in the diſcharge of their duty, ver. 1, 2. And as for himſelf, whom he includes in the number of the faithful diſpenſers of the word, he cared not what judgment was paſſed upon him; nor ſhould he think fit to be ſet down by it, partly becauſe it was human, and aroſe from an ill ſpirit; and partly becauſe he judged himſelf; as alſo becauſe his conſcience teſtified that he faithfully diſcharged his office; and beſides, the Lord was his judge, ver. 3, 4. who in his own time would judge him; and he, as every other faithful miniſter, ſhall have praiſe of God, and therefore before that time judgment was not to be paſſed by men, ver. 5. and then gives a reaſon why he had mentioned his own name, and the name of Apollos, under ſuch figurative expreſſions he had done in the preceding chapter, that they might be examples of modeſty and humility for others to follow, ver. 6. and expoſtulates with thoſe who were vainly puffed up in their fleſhly minds; that ſeeing they were no better than others, and what gifts they had were not of themſelves, but of God, they had no reaſon to glory and vaunt it over others, ver. 7. and in an ironical way expreſſes the exalted and flouriſhing condition they were in, and which he rather wiſhes than aſſerts, and which carries in it a ſort of a denial of it, ver. 8. and goes on to repreſent the miſerable condition that the faithful preachers and followers of Chriſt were in, and that in order to abate the pride and ſwelling vanity of theſe men, ver. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13. ſhewing, that it was far from being a reigning time in the churches of Chriſt; his end in mentioning which, as well as the ſharpneſs he had uſed in reproving, were not in order to expoſe them to ſhame, but for their admonition, ver. 14. and that he did not take too much upon him in dealing thus freely and roundly with them, appears from the ſpiritual relation he ſtood in to them, as a Father, ver. 15. and therefore it became them as children to ſubmit to him, and imitate him, ver. 16. and an inſtance of his paternal care of them, and love to them, was his ſending Timothy among them, whoſe character he gives, and whoſe work and uſefulneſs he points out to them, ver. 17. and cloſes the chapter with a promiſe of coming to them, if it was agreeable to the will of God; and the rather he was bent upon it, becauſe ſome had given out he would not come, and rejoiced at it; wherefore, in order to try them, whether they were only verbal or powerful profeſſors, he was deſirous of coming to them, ver. 18, 19. ſince religion did not lie in talking, but in an inward powerful experience of things, ver. 20. which he feared was wanting in ſome by their outward converſation; and therefore puts a queſtion in what way they would chuſe he ſhould come unto them, and hence ſhould accordingly order their converſation and behaviour, ver. 21.

Ver. 1. Let a man ſo account of us, &c.] Tho' the Apoſtle had before ſaid that he, and other miniſters of the Goſpel, were not any thing with reſpect to God, and with regard to the churches, were theirs, for their uſe and advantage; yet they were not to be trampled upon, and treated with contempt, but to be known, eſteemed, and honoured for their works ſake, and in their reſpective places, ſtations, and characters; and though they were but men, yet were not to be conſidered as private men, and in a private capacity, but as in public office, and as public preachers of the word; and tho' they were not to be regarded as lords and maſters over God's heritage, but as ſervants, yet not as every one's, or as any ſort of ſervants, but as the miniſters, or ſervants, of Chriſt; as qualified, called, and ſent forth by him to preach his Goſpel; as ambaſſadors in his name, ſtanding in his place and ſtead, and repreſenting him, and therefore for his ſake to be reſpected and eſteemed; and as ſuch who make him the ſubject of their miniſtry, preach him, and him only, exalt him in his perſon, offices, blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice, and direct ſouls to him alone for life and ſalvation: and ſtewards of the myſteries of God; tho' they are not to be looked upon as maſters of the houſhold, that have power to diſpoſe of things in the family at their own pleaſure; yet they are to be regarded as ſtewards, the higheſt officers in the houſe of God; to whoſe care are committed the ſecret and hidden things of God; whoſe buſineſs it is to diſpenſe, and make known, the myſteries of divine grace; ſuch as reſpect the doctrine of the Trinity, the incarnation of Chriſt, the union of the two natures, divine and human, in his perſon, the church's union to him, and communion with him, with many other things contained in the Goſpel they are entruſted with.

Ver. 2. Moreover, it is required in ſtewards, &c.] Upon mentioning that part of the character of Goſpel-preachers, as ſtewards, the Apoſtle is put in mind of, and ſo points out that which is principally neceſſary in ſuch perſons: as, that a man be found faithful; to the truſt repoſed in him; to his lord and maſter that has appointed him to this office; and to the ſouls that are under his care: and then may a miniſter be ſaid to be ſo, and which is his greateſt glory, when he preaches the pure Goſpel of Chriſt without any human mixtures, the doctrines and inventions of men; and the whole Goſpel, declaring all the counſel of God, keeping back nothing which may be profitable to ſouls; when he ſeeks not to pleaſe men, but God; and not his own glory, and the applauſe of men, but the honour of Chriſt, and the good of ſouls: and ſuch a faithful ſteward was the Apoſtle himſelf.

Ver. 3. But with me it is a very ſmall thing, &c.] It ſtood for little or nothing, was of no account with him, what judgment and cenſures were paſs'd on him by men with regard to his faithfulneſs in the miniſtry, not even by the Corinthians themſelves: that I ſhould be judged of you; not that the Apoſtle declined, or deſpiſed the judgment of a church of Chriſt, rightly diſpoſed, and met together in the fear of God, to try, prove, and judge of his miniſtry, and his fidelity in it; but he made no account of theirs, and ſlighted it, as being under bad influence, the influence of the falſe teachers, who had inſinuated many things among them to the prejudice of the Apoſtle's character; wherefore he ſet it at nought and rejected it, and rightly refuſed to ſubmit to it, and indeed, to any mere human judgment: or of man's judgment; 'tis in the Greek text, or of man's day; in diſtinction from the day of the Lord, or the day of judgment; and becauſe that men have their ſtated days for judgment; and becauſe of the clearneſs of evidence, according to which judgment ſhould proceed. This is not a Ciliciſm, as Jerom thought, but an Hebraiſm; ſo the Septuagint render, יום אנוש, in Jer. xvii. 16. ημεραν ανθρωπου, man's day; and very frequently in the Talmud[r], is the diſtinction of דיני שמים, the judgments of God, and דיני אדם, the judgments of men; the former the Apoſtle was willing to be ſubject to, but not to the latter; he appealed from men to God; he cared not what any man thought, or ſaid, or judged of him; he not only was indifferent to the judgment of the Corinthians concerning him, whether they praiſed or diſpraiſed him, but of any other perſon; and ſo the Syriac verſion renders it, או מן כל בר אנש, or of any man: he adds, yea, I judge not mine own ſelf; for tho' as a ſpiritual man he judged all things, and ſo himſelf, his conduct, ſtate, and condition; examined his own heart and ways, and was able to form a judgment of what he was and did; yet he choſe not to ſtand and fall by his own judgment; and ſince he would not abide by his own judgment, who beſt knew himſelf, much leſs would he be ſubject to theirs, or any human judgment, who muſt be greater ſtrangers to him; and this he ſaid, not as conſcious to himſelf of any unfaithfulneſs in his miniſterial work.

Ver. 4. For I know nothing by myſelf, &c.] Which muſt be underſtood with a reſtriction to the ſubject he is upon, faithfulneſs in the miniſtry; otherwiſe he knew much by himſelf, of indwelling ſin, and the corruption of his nature, which he ſometimes found very ſtrong, and prevalent in him, and of the daily infirmities of life; but as to his miniſterial ſervice, he was pure from the blood of all men; he honeſtly declared what he knew to be the mind of God, and concealed nothing that might be uſeful to men; in this he had a clear conſcience, void of offence both towards God and men. Yet am I not hereby juſtified; from all fault and blame, which might poſſibly eſcape his knowledge and obſervation; for in many things all offend, and no man can underſtand all his errors; and there might be ſome miſtakes which the Apoſtle was not privy to, and conſcious of; and were he even free from all, he declares, that ſuch an unſtained integrity, in the diſcharge of his miniſterial work, was not the matter of his juſtification before God, nor did he depend upon it: but he that judgeth me is the Lord; either who adjudges me to eternal life, juſtifying me through the righteouſneſs of his Son, in which alone I deſire to be found, living and dying; or he that knows my heart, and all my ways, will be my judge at the laſt day; and to his judgment I appeal and ſubmit, and ſit eaſy in the mean while under all the cenſures and calumnies of men. The Apoſtle did, as his Lord and Saviour had done before him, who, when he was reviled and reproached by men, conſcious of his own innocence and integrity, committed himſelf to him that judgeth righteouſly.

Ver. 5. Therefore judge nothing before the time, &c.] This is ſaid to prevent raſh and precipitant judgment, and agrees with that well-known Jewiſh maxim, הוו מתונין בדין, be ſlow in judgment[s]; not haſty to paſs ſentence; 'tis beſt to leave things to the great day of account, than to be free in cenſuring one another. There is a time fixed for the awful judgment, tho' of that day and hour knows no man: judge nothing until the Lord come; who at the fixed time will certainly come to judgment, and that ſuddenly, at unawares, in an hour no man knows of: who will bring to light the hidden things of darkneſs; meaning not ſo much vices, immoralities, wickedneſs of all ſorts committed in the dark, and which it is a ſhame to ſpeak of; but thoſe hidden things of diſhoneſty, thoſe ſecret arts and private methods which falſe teachers have made uſe of to conceal themſelves, and carry on their baſe deſigns to the injury of truth, the ſouls of men, and the cauſe of Chriſt: and will make manifeſt the counſels of the heart; what were the views and intentions, the aims and ends of theſe men in taking upon them to be preachers of the word; when it will appear that theſe were not the glory of God, and the good of the ſouls of men, but filthy lucre, popular applauſe, or ſome ſuch mercenary view, and ſiniſter end. And then ſhall every man have praiſe of God. Every regenerated ſoul; every one that is a Jew inwardly; every one that has the circumciſion of the Spirit; and particularly every faithful miniſter, who is more eſpecially deſigned; to whom it will be ſaid, well done good and faithful ſervant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. The Apoſtle, in theſe words, has reſpect to the falſe teachers who ſought the praiſe of men, and not the honour which comes from God; and which the true miniſters of the word will have another day, however deſpiſed and diſpraiſed by men now.

Ver. 6. And theſe things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred, &c.] Not what he had ſaid concerning the different factions at Corinth, one being for Paul, and another for Apollos, and another for Cephas, as if theſe ſeveral parties did not really go by thoſe names, but by thoſe of others, the falſe teachers; only the Apoſtle, to decline every thing that looked like reflection, put theſe, as the Syriac verſion renders it, upon his own perſon, and Apollos's, the ſooner and better to put an end to ſuch diviſions; for it is certain, from his way of arguing and reaſoning, that theſe are not fictitious names, but they were really divided, and were quarrelling among themſelves about himſelf, Apollos, and Cephas: but his meaning is, when he ſays, I have in a figure transferred to myſelf and Apollos theſe things; that he had brought theſe compariſons, as the Arabic verſion reads it, concerning himſelf and Apollos; namely, that one was a planter, and another a waterer; that they were both labourers and builders, miniſters or ſervants, and ſtewards: and theſe ſimilies, and ſuch a figurative way of ſpeaking he had made uſe of, as he ſays, for your ſakes; for the ſake of the members of this church, that they might have right notions of them, and accordingly account of them, and behave towards them: or, as he adds, that ye might learn in us not to think of men above that which is written; meaning, either in the word of God in general; or in ſome particular paſſages of ſcripture, he might have reſpect to; or rather in the above places in this, and the foregoing chapter, where he gives the fore-mentioned characters of miniſters; where, in the Apoſtles themſelves, in their own words, from their own account, they might learn, on the one hand, not to aſcribe too much to them, nor, on the other hand, to detract from their juſt character and uſefulneſs: and alſo, that no one of you be puffed up for one againſt the other; ſpeak great ſwelling words of vanity, and envy, for one miniſter againſt another; when they are all one, bear the ſame character, are in the ſame office, and are jointly concerned in the ſame common cauſe of Chriſt, and the good of immortal ſouls.

Ver. 7. For who maketh thee to differ from another, &c.] This queſtion, and the following, are put to the members of this church, who were glorying in, and boaſting of the miniſters under whom they were converted, and by whom they were baptized, to the neglect and contempt of others; when the Apoſtle would have them conſider, that whatever difference was made between them and others, was made, not by man, but God; that whatever good and benefit they had enjoyed under their reſpective miniſters, were in a way of receiving, and from God; and therefore they ought not to glory in themſelves, nor in their miniſters, but in God, who had diſtinguiſhed them by his favours: whatever difference is made among men, is of God; it is he that makes them to differ from the reſt of the creation; from angels, to whom they are inferior; and from beaſts, to whom they are ſuperior; and from one another in their perſon, ſize, ſhape, and countenance, which is a phyſical, or natural difference. It is God that makes them to differ from one another in things of a civil nature; as kings and ſubjects, maſters and ſervants, high and low, rich and poor, bond and free, which may be called a political, or civil difference: and there is an eccleſiaſtical difference which God makes in his own people, who have gifts differing one from another; there are diverſities of gifts, adminiſtrations, and operations among them, and all from the ſame ſpirit: but the grand diſtinction God has made among men, lies in his ſpecial, diſtinguiſhing, and everlaſting love to ſome, and not others; in his choice of them in Chriſt unto everlaſting ſalvation; in the gift of them to Chriſt in the eternal covenant; in the redemption of them by his blood; in his powerful and prevalent interceſſion for them; in God's effectual calling of them by his grace; in his reſurrection of them from the dead to everlaſting life, placing them at Chriſt's right hand, and their entrance into everlaſting glory; when the diſtinction will be kept up, as in the above inſtances, throughout the endleſs ages of eternity; all which is owing, not to any thing of man's, but to the free grace, ſovereign will, and good pleaſure of God. And what haſt thou that thou didſt not receive? whatever mercies and bleſſings men enjoy, they have in a way of receiving, and from God the Father of all mercies; all natural and temporal mercies are received from him; even ſuch as reſpect the body, the make, form, and ſhape of it, perfection of limbs, health, ſtrength, food, raiment, preſervation of life, continuance in being, with all the comforts of it; and ſuch as relate to the ſoul, its formation, which is by the Father of Spirits, its powers and faculties, natural light, reaſon, and underſtanding, all its endowments, abilities, all natural parts, and ſharpneſs of wit; ſo that no man ought to glory in his wiſdom, as if it was owing to himſelf, when it is all of God. All ſupernatural and ſpiritual bleſſings are received from God; ſuch as a juſtifying righteouſneſs, ſanctifying grace, remiſſion of ſin, the new name of adoption, ſtrength to perform good works, to bear and ſuffer reproach and perſecution for Chriſt, and to perſevere to the end, with a right and title to eternal glory. Now if thou didſt receive it, why doſt thou glory as if thou hadſt not received it? To glory in any mercy, favour, or bleſſing received from God, as if it was not received from him, but as owing to human power, care, and induſtry, betrays wretched vanity, ſtupid and more than brutiſh ignorance, horrid ingratitude, abominable pride and wickedneſs; and is contrary to the grace of God, which teaches men humility and thankfulneſs. To God alone ſhould all the bleſſings of nature, providence, and grace be aſcribed; he ought to have all the glory of them; and to him, and him only, praiſe is due for them. That proud Arminian, Grevinchovius[f], in anſwer to this text, ſaid, "I make myſelf to differ; ſince I could reſiſt God, and divine predetermination, but have not reſiſted, why may not I glory in it as of my own?"

Ver. 8. Now ye are full, &c.] That is, in their own opinion: theſe words, and ſome following expreſſions, are an ironical conceſſion. They were not full of God, and divine things; nor of Chriſt, and of grace out of his fulneſs; nor of the Holy Ghoſt, and of faith, as Stephen and Barnabas are ſaid to be; nor of joy and peace in believing; nor of goodneſs and ſpiritual knowledge; but they were full of themſelves, and were puffed up in their fleſhly minds with an opinion of their abilities, learning, oratory, and eloquence, of their miniſters, and of their own great improvements in knowledge under their miniſtrations. They fancied they had got to a perfection in knowledge, and were brimful of it; and as the full ſtomach, from which the metaphor is taken, loaths the honey-comb, ſo theſe perſons loathed the Apoſtle's miniſtry, and the pure preaching of the Goſpel; imagining, that they had attained to ſomething above it, and ſtood in no need of it; when, alas! they were but babes, children in underſtanding, and needed milk inſtead of ſtrong meat; ſo far were they from being what they thought themſelves to be. Now ye are rich; not in faith; nor in good works; nor in ſpiritual gifts and knowledge, tho' ſome among them were; but that is not here intended: the meaning is, they were rich, and abounded in knowledge in their own account. Like the Laodiceans, they conceited themſelves to be rich, and increaſed with goods, when they were poor, and wretched, and miſerable. Ye have reigned as kings without us. The ſaints, in the beſt ſenſe, are kings, made ſo by Chriſt; and have not only the name, and the enſigns of royalty, as crowns and thrones prepared for them, but kingdoms alſo: they have a kingdom of grace, which they enjoy now, and ſhall never be removed; in which they reign as kings under the influence of the Spirit of God, over the corruptions of their own hearts, which are laid under the reſtraints of mighty grace; and over the world, which they have under their feet; and over ſatan, who is dethroned and caſt out of them; and they ſhall inherit the kingdom of glory hereafter; but nothing of this kind is here intended. The ſenſe of the words is, that theſe perſons imagined that they had arrived to ſuch a pitch of knowledge, as to be independent of the Apoſtles; needed no inſtructions and directions from them, them; and were in great tranquillity and eaſe of mind, and attended with outward proſperity, ſo that they lived as kings the moſt happy life that could be deſired; upon which the Apoſtle expreſſes his hearty wiſh for them: and I would to God ye did reign; not in carnal ſecurity, and in affluence of worldly enjoyments, which the Apoſtle was not deſirous of for himſelf, and other his fellow-miniſters; nor in a ſpiritual ſenſe, merely as believers in common, and as he then did; but with Chriſt in his kingdom-ſtate here on earth: that we alſo might reign with you; for all the ſaints will be together when Chriſt takes to himſelf his great power, and reigns; they'll all reign with him on earth a thouſand years; this is a faithful ſaying, nothing more true, or to be depended on, that thoſe that ſuffer with him, ſhall alſo reign with him; and not a part of his people only, but the whole body: hence the Apoſtle wiſhes, that this reigning-time for the church of Chriſt was come, then he, and the reſt of the Apoſtles would reign alſo: but, alas! it was a plain caſe, from the condition they were in, of which the following words give a narrative, that this time was not yet.

Ver. 9. For I think that God hath ſet forth us the Apoſtles laſt, &c.] Meaning either in time, in reſpect to the prophets and patriarchs under the former diſpenſation; and to the Apoſtles, who were ſent forth by Chriſt when on earth; when he, and Barnabas, and others, had received their miſſion ſince his aſcenſion; or in ſtate and condition, who, tho' they were ſet in the firſt place in the church, yet were the leaſt in the eſteem of men; and were treated as the moſt mean, vile, and abject of creatures; were ſet or ſhewed forth to public view, and made a gazing ſtock by reproaches and afflictions. And as it were appointed to death; were continually expoſed unto it; were in death oft, always carrying about with them the dying of the Lord Jeſus; and were all the day long killed for his ſake; all which the Apoſtle not only thought, but believed, were not caſual things, fortuitous events, but the determinations and appointments of God; and were brought about in his wiſe providence to anſwer ſome valuable ends, which made him the more eaſy under them, and reconciled unto them. For we are made a ſpectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men. The word tranſlated ſpectacle ſignifies a theatre; and the alluſion is to the Roman theatres, in which various exerciſes were performed, for the gratification of the numerous ſpectators, who were placed around in a proper diſtance to behold; and not ſo much to the gladiators who fought, in ſuch places, for the diverſion of the multitude, as to thoſe unhappy perſons who were caſt to the wild beaſts, let looſe upon them to devour them; which horrid barbarities were beheld by the ſurrounding company with great pleaſure and ſatisfaction; and ſuch a ſpectacle were the Apoſtles in their ſufferings and perſecutions to the whole world, diſtinguiſhed into angels and men. By angels may be meant the devils, who ſtirred up the princes of this world againſt the Apoſtles, to perſecute and afflict them; than which nothing was a greater pleaſure to theſe envious and malicious ſpirits: tho' good angels may be alſo included, as witneſſes of the faith, courage, and conſtancy of the ſaints, and as comforters of them in all their tribulations; but evil angels ſeem chiefly deſigned: and by men are meant wicked men, who are as much pleaſed to behold the barbarities and butcheries committed upon the people of God, as the Romans in their theatres were to ſee the tragical ſcenes that were acted there.

Ver. 10. We are fools for Chriſt's ſake, &c.] They were ſo in the eſteem of men, for their cloſe attachment to a crucified Chriſt; and for preaching the doctrine of ſalvation by him; and for enduring ſo much reproach, affliction, and perſecution for his ſake, and the Goſpel's: but ye are wiſe in Chriſt. This is ironically ſaid; for his meaning is not that they were truly wiſe in Chriſt, in the knowledge and faith of him, in preaching his Goſpel, or profeſſing his name; but they were ſo in their own eyes, and made uſe of much worldly wiſdom, and carnal policy in their profeſſion of religion. Their miniſters took care to preach, and they to profeſs Chriſt, in ſuch a manner as to retain the favour of the world, and to eſcape reproach and perſecution. We are weak; in your account; our bodily preſence is weak, and ſpeech contemptible; we are men of mean capacities and abilities; nor are we able to expreſs ourſelves in that ſtrong and maſculine way, with thoſe maſterly ſtrokes of eloquence and oratory your miniſters do; or we are preſſed down with infirmities, and afflictions, and perſecutions. But ye are ſtrong; your miniſters are men of great parts, ſtrong voice, maſculine language, and powerful oratory; and you abound in outward proſperity, and are free from perſecution for the croſs of Chriſt. Ye are honourable; high in the favour and eſteem of men for your wiſdom and learning, your riches and wealth, power and grandeur. But we are deſpiſed; are in diſhonour and diſgrace, for the mean appearance we make, the Goſpel we preach, and the croſs we bear.

Ver. 11. Even unto this preſent hour, &c.] What is about to be related was not what befel the Apoſtles now and then, and a great while ago; but what for a conſiderable time, and unto the preſent time, was more or leſs the common, conſtant ſeries and courſe of life they were inured to: we both hunger, and thirſt, and are naked; wanted the common neceſſaries of life, food to eat, and raiment to put on, and gold and ſilver to purchaſe any with; which might be, when, as it was ſometimes their caſe, they were in deſert places, or on the ſeas; or when they fell among thieves; or had given all away, as they ſometimes did, for the relief of others; or when they were not, as ſometimes, taken notice of, and provided for, where they miniſtred, as they ought to have been. And are buffeted; not only by ſatan, as the Apoſtle was, but by men; ſcourged, whipped, and beaten by them; ſcourged in the ſynagogues by the Jews with forty ſtripes ſave one; and beaten with rods by the Romans, and other Gentiles. And have no certain dwelling-place; were in an unſettled ſtate, always moving from one place to another, and had no place they could call their own; like their Lord and Maſter, who had not where to lay his head; and like ſome of the Old Teſtament ſaints, who wandered about in ſheep-ſkins and goat-ſkins, in deſerts, and in mountains, in dens and caves of the earth.

Ver. 12. And labour, working with our own hands, &c.] As the Apoſtle did at Corinth, Acts xviii. 3. and elſewhere; partly to miniſter to his own neceſſities, and thoſe of others; and partly, that he might not be burdenſome to the churches; and alſo to ſet an example of diligence and induſtry to others; though he had a right and power to claim a maintenance of thoſe to whom he miniſtred. Being reviled, we bleſs; as Chriſt commanded, Matt. v. 44. and the Apoſtle himſelf directed and exhorted to, Rom. xii. 14. being perſecuted, we ſuffer it; that is, patiently; neither reſiſting our perſecutors; nor murmuring and repining at our unhappy circumſtances; but taking all in good part, as what is the will of God, and will make for his glory.

Ver. 13. Being defamed, we intreat, &c.] Being blaſphemed, as the word ſignifies, being evil ſpoken of, our good name taken away, and characters hurt; we intreat or pray to God for them, that he would convince them of their evil, give them repentance unto life, and remiſſion of their ſins, according to Chriſt's direction, Matt. v. 44. and in imitation of his example, Luke xxiii. 34. or we intreat them; ſo the Syriac verſion reads it, בעען מנהון, we beſeech them; not to blaſpheme and ſpeak evil of us, ſince it will be to their own hurt; we give them ſmooth words, and ſoft language, not rendering railing for railing, or reviling for reviling: we are made as the filth of the world, and the offſcouring of all things unto this day; referring, as ſome think, to Lam. iii. 45. or to the luſtrations and expiations among the heathens, who when any calamity was upon them, particularly a plague among them, uſed to take one of the refuſe of the people and ſacrifice him by way of expiation; or any living creature, as a ſheep, which with imprecations they caſt into a river, or into the ſea, fancying it carried away all the contagion along with it; hence by way of reproach, ſuch that were under diſgrace, and were ejected, and exiled, were called καθαρματα, purgations; the refuſe of the people, by which the reſt were purged [u]: or the reference is to any dirt, or filth in common, ſwept out of houſes, and trodden under foot; and ſo expreſſes the mean and abject condition of the Apoſtles, and with what diſdain and contempt they were treated in the world: all which ſhews that they were far from reigning as kings; and whilſt this was their caſe, who were at the head of the intereſt of Chriſt, it muſt be a vain conceit of the Corinthians, that they reigned as kings without them.

Ver. 14. I write not theſe things to ſhame you, &c.] Tho' they had a great deal of reaſon to be aſhamed of the vain opinion they had of themſelves, and that they ſuffered the faithful miniſters of Chriſt to want the neceſſaries of life, when they abounded ſo much with the good things of it; and tho' the Apoſtle's view in giving this narrative, was to bring them under a ſenſe of their faults, and to a conviction of them, and ſo to ſhame for them, in order to their future reformation and amendment; yet it was not merely to put them to the bluſh, but to admoniſh and inſtruct them, that he enlarged on theſe things: but as my beloved ſons I warn you; they being his children in a ſpiritual ſenſe, for whom he had the ſtrongeſt love and affection, as their ſpiritual father; and as it was his place, and became him ſtanding in ſuch a relation to them, he warn'd, admoniſhed, and put them in mind of their obligations and duty to him.

Ver. 15. For tho' ye have ten thouſand inſtructors in Chriſt, &c.] Or School-maſters; by whom he means the falſe teachers, whom for argument ſake, he admits to be inſtructors in Chriſt, or miniſters of his, as in 2 Cor. xi. 23. and who were many, and of whoſe number the Corinthians boaſted; tho' they were not ſo numerous as here ſuppoſed; for the expreſſion is hyperbolical: perhaps ſome reference may be had to the multitude of Schoolmaſters, tutors and governours, and who alſo were called, אבות, fathers, which thoſe that were Jews of this church at Corinth, had before they believed in Chriſt; as the members of the great Sanhedrim, the great number of doctors, wiſe men, Scribes and Phariſees, who pretended to inſtruct them: now tho' it ſhould be allowed, that the preſent teachers among them were inſtrumental in inſtructing them further in the knowledge of Chriſt; or as the Arabic verſion reads it, in the love of Chriſt; yet they had no hand in their converſion; the Apoſtle firſt preached the Goſpel to them, and miniſterially laid Chriſt the foundation among them, and directed them unto him, and was the miniſter by whom they believed; theſe teachers at moſt and beſt built on his foundation, and that only wood, hay, and ſtubble; and whereas they were only a ſort of ſchool-maſters, and not fathers, they taught with mercenary views, and for lucre's ſake, and with ſeverity, as ſuch men do; and not with ſuch a ſingle eye to their good, and with that tenderneſs and affection a parent has, and in which relation he ſtood in to them: yet have ye not many fathers; as it is in nature, ſo it is in grace; how many maſters and inſtructors ſoever a child may have, whether together or ſucceſſively, he has but one father; and ſo how many after inſtructors, either nominally or really, believers may have to lead them on, or who pretend to lead them on to a further knowledge of Chriſt; yet have but one ſpiritual father, who has been the happy inſtrument and means of their converſion, as the Apoſtle Paul was to the Corinthians: for in Chriſt Jeſus have I begotten you thro' the Goſpel; which is to be underſtood of regeneration, a being born again, and from above; of being quickned when dead in treſpaſſes and ſins; of having Chriſt formed in the ſoul; of being made a partaker of the divine nature, and a new creature; which the Apoſtle aſcribes to himſelf, not as the efficient cauſe thereof, for regeneration is not of men but of God; not of the will of the fleſh, of a man's own free-will and power, nor of the will of any other man, or miniſter; but of the ſoveraign will, grace, and mercy of God, Father, Son, and Spirit. The Father of Chriſt begets us again according to his abundant mercy; and the Son quickens whom he will; and we are born again of water and of the Spirit, of the grace of the Spirit; hence the waſhing of regeneration, and renewing work are aſcribed to him: but the Apoſtle ſpeaks this of himſelf, only as the inſtrument or means, which God made uſe of in doing this work upon the hearts of his people; and which the other phraſes ſhew: for he is ſaid to do it in Chriſt; he preached Chriſt unto them, and ſalvation by him, and the neceſſity of faith in him; he directed them to him to believe in him, and was the means of bringing of them to the faith of Chriſt; and it was the power and grace of Chriſt accompanying his miniſtry, which made it an effectual means of their regeneration and converſion: and which were brought about thro' the Goſpel; not thro' the preaching of the law; for tho' by that is the knowledge of ſin, and convictions may be wrought by ſuch means; yet theſe leave nothing but a ſenſe of wrath and damnation; nor is the law any other than a killing letter; no regeneration, no quickning grace, no faith, nor holineſs come this way, but thro' the preaching of the Goſpel; in and thro' which, as a vehicle, the Spirit of God conveys himſelf into the heart, as a Spirit of regeneration and faith; and God of his own will and rich mercy, by the word of truth, by the Goſpel of grace and truth, which came by Chriſt, ſo called in diſtinction from the law which came by Moſes, begets us again as his new creatures; which ſhews the uſefulneſs of the Goſpel-miniſtry, and in what account Goſpel-miniſters are to be had, who are ſpiritual fathers, or the inſtruments of the converſion of men.

[u] Vid. Turnebi Adverſaria, l. 19. c. 22. & 26. 7. & 27. 16.

Ver. 16. Wherefore, I beſeech you, &c.] Tho' he might have uſed the power and authority of a father, yet he choſe rather to intreat and beſeech them; ſaying, be ye followers of me; for who ſhould children follow, but their parents? The Vulgate Latin, adds, as I am of Chriſt; ſo Chryſoſtom in his time read it; and Beza ſays, he found it ſo written in one Greek exemplar; and ſo it is in one of Stephens's; it ſeems to have crept in from chap. xi. 1. However, tho' it might not be now expreſſed by the Apoſtle, it is to be ſuppoſed; for he never deſired any to follow him any more, or further than he followed Chriſt; particularly he was deſirous that theſe his ſpiritual children would follow him, and abide by him in the doctrine of a crucified Chriſt, he had preached among them, and not the falſe Apoſtles who had repreſented his miniſtry as weak and fooliſh; and in his life and converſation, eſpecially in his humble carriage and deportment among them, and in his tender love and affection for them; obſerving their growing pride, haughtineſs, and vain opinion of themſelves, and thoſe unnatural diviſions and animoſities which were fomented among them; and alſo in bearing reproach and perſecution chearfully and patiently, for the Goſpel of Chriſt; a detail of which he had given them in ſome preceding verſes.

Ver. 17. For this cauſe have I ſent unto you Timotheus, &c.] This is an inſtance of his care of them, concern for them and reſpect unto them; that he not only writes unto them, giving his beſt advice and counſel, promiſing to come unto them; but in the mean while ſends Timothy to them, whoſe character is here given as one dear to him, and in all things truſty and faithful: who is my beloved ſon; ſo in his epiſtles to him, he often ſtiles him his Son, his own Son in the faith, his dearly beloved Son; not that he was the inſtrument of his converſion, for he was a diſciple of Chriſt before the Apoſtle was acquainted with him; ſee Acts xvi. 1. but either becauſe of his age, he being younger than he; or becauſe of his great affection for him; and chiefly becauſe, as a ſon with a father, he ſerved him in the Goſpel, Phil. ii. 22. and ſince he was ſo familiar with him, and ſo much loved by him, it might reaſonably be thought he full well knew his ways and methods of doctrine and practice. And faithful in the Lord; a faithful ſteward of the myſteries of grace; faithful in the Goſpel of Chriſt, and to the ſouls of men; a faithful miniſter of theLord's; one who had been tried, proved, and found faithful, and therefore might be truſted to, and depended upon: who ſhall bring you into remembrance of my ways; his way of preaching, and the doctrines he taught; and what ſhould be the manner of life and converſation agreeable thereunto, and to his own; and all thoſe rules and orders, he gave for the diſcipline and management of the affairs of churches; all which he had formerly delivered to them, tho' they, thro' length of time, and the miniſtry of the falſe teachers among them, had greatly forgotten them: wherefore Timothy is ſent, not to teach them new ways, nor indeed, to teach at all, whoſe youth they might be tempted to deſpiſe; but only to put them in mind of what the Apoſtle had formerly taught them: and which are recommended by their being ſuch ways, which be in Chriſt; the doctrines he had preached among them, the ſum and ſubſtance of them were Chriſt, and him crucified; the ordinances he had delivered to them were what he had received from Chriſt; and all the rules and methods he had propoſed to them for the regulation of their conduct, and the management of their eccleſiaſtical affairs, were ſuch as were agreeable to the mind of Chriſt, and tended to his glory; he took no ſtep, nor propoſed any to be taken but in Chriſt, and for the good of his intereſt: and he adds, as I teach every where, in every church; the faith he delivered every where was one and the ſame; the Son of God preached by him, was not yea and nay; the trumpet he blew always gave a certain ſound; the rules preſcribed by him, and orders he laid down, for the conduct of life, and government of churches, were exactly alike in all places; he taught no doctrines at Corinth, nor enjoined the obſervance of any rule, but what all other churches were taught and directed to; his plan of doctrine and diſcipline was the ſame every where.

Ver. 18. Now ſome are puffed up, &c.] Some with their gifts, learning, and eloquence, and with the high ſtation they were in, in the church; believing they ſhould continue therein undiſturbed, thinking themſelves ſafe and ſecure thro' the abſence of the Apoſtle, and which they flattered themſelves would always be the caſe: as though I would not come to you; and others that were for Apollos and Cephas againſt Paul, were puffed up againſt their fellow members on the ſame account; hoping they ſhould never ſee him more, to put them in any other ſituation than what they were in, by demoliſhing their factions and parties; and others, as the inceſtuous perſon, and thoſe that took encouragement to ſin by his example, were alſo puffed up upon this ſcore, and mourned not over, nor repented of their iniquities, but remained ſecure and hardened; believing the Apoſtle would never more come among them, to call them to an account for their male-practices.

Ver. 19. But I will come to you ſhortly, &c.] This he ſaid as threatening them, but not by way of prophecy; for it is not certain that he ever did come to them after this; but by way of promiſe, as it was then the real intention, inclination, and reſolution of his mind, tho' with this condition, if the Lord will; which is rightly put, and what the Apoſtle had a continual regard unto, in all things he was concerned; ſee Rom. i. 10. Heb. vi. 3. and tho' it is not abſolutely neceſſary that this ſhould be expreſſed by us always in ſo many words; tho' ſhould it, as the ſentence is ſhort and full, there would be no impropriety in it; yet this ſhould always be the ſenſe of our minds and conduct in all the affairs of life; ſee Jam. iv. 13, 14, 15. and will know not the ſpeech of them that are puffed up, but the power; meaning chiefly the falſe teachers; and that his concern would be, not ſo much to obſerve their maſterly language, the eloquence of their ſpeech, the quaintneſs of their expreſſions, the cadency of their words, how nicely they were put together, and how fitly pronounced; but what life there was in their miniſtry, what power went forth with their words, and how effectual their preaching was to the converſion of ſinners, and the edifying of the church of God.

Ver. 20. For the kingdom of God, &c.] By the kingdom of God is not meant the kingdom of heaven, or the ultimate glory and happineſs of the ſaints; tho' that is a kingdom prepared by God, which he gives to his children, calls them to by his grace, and will give them an abundant entrance into, when time ſhall be no more with them; and tho' that is not attained to in, or by word, by mere talk and profeſſion; not every one that ſays Lord, Lord, ſhall enter into it, or that profeſſes the name of Chriſt, and propheſies in it; but in or by power; thro' the power of God, beginning, carrying on, and finiſhing a work of grace upon the ſoul, and keeping it, through faith, unto ſalvation: nor the kingdom of grace, or that internal principle of grace in the ſoul, which reigns, and by which Chriſt reigns there, and by which the ſaints appear to be kings, as well as prieſts, unto God; tho' this alſo does not lie in word, in a profeſſion of faith, in talking about love, and in making pretenſions to the knowledge of divine things; nor merely in deeds, and outward actions, in bodily exerciſe, in a form of godlineſs, and a round of religion, and a ſhew of righteouſneſs: but in power; in internal, powerful godlineſs; for true godlineſs is a powerful thing; faith is powerful, and ſo is love; and ſo is prayer, and preaching; and ſo is all religion, internal and external, where there is the life and truth of grace, and that in exerciſe. But I rather think the Goſpel is here meant, often in ſcripture called the kingdom of God, and the doctrines of it, the myſteries of the kingdom; becauſe it is a meſſage from the king of kings; the means of ſetting up the kingdom of grace in the heart; its ſubjects are things concerning the kingdom of God; it is what has brought life and immortality, or an immortal life to light; and gives the beſt account of the inviſible glories of the heavenly ſtate, and points out the ſaints meetneſs for it, and title to it; declaring that except a man is born again, and has a better righteouſneſs than his own, even that of Chriſt's, he ſhall neither ſee nor enter into the kingdom of heaven. Now the Goſpel is not in word; tho' it lies in the word of God, the ſcriptures of truth; and treats of the eſſential word of God, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and cannot be preached without words, even the words of men; yet is not to be preached with wiſdom of words, with enticing words of man's wiſdom, or in the words which man's wiſdom teacheth; nor does the efficacy of it lie in, or depend upon the words of the preacher, or on mere moral ſuaſion; for whenever it is effectual, it comes not in word only, but alſo in power, 1 Theſſ. i. 5. and by power is meant, not a power of working miracles the firſt preachers of the Goſpel had, and by which it was greatly confirmed; nor a godly life and converſation which that enforced upon, and engaged both miniſters and people to; but the powerful efficacy of the Spirit, attending the preaching of the Goſpel to the quickning of dead ſinners, the enlightning of blind eyes, and unſtopping of deaf ears; the ſoftening of hard hearts, the delivering of perſons from the ſlavery of ſin and ſatan, the transforming and renewing of them both inwardly and outwardly; and to the comforting, enlivening, ſtrengthening and eſtabliſhing of the ſaints; all which can never be aſcribed to the perſuaſive language of men, but to the power of God: and which is the more apparent when 'tis obſerved what mean and deſpicable inſtruments in the eyes of men are made uſe of; what the doctrines are that are preached, not being of man, nor agreeable to his carnal reaſon, but eſteemed fooliſhneſs by him; and the manner in which they are propagated, not in a carnal way, by outward force, but by the fooliſhneſs of preaching; and the oppoſition made to it both by the enmity of man's heart unto it, by the men of the world, and by ſatan and his principalities and powers.

Ver. 21. What will ye, &c.] Or how will ye, that I ſhould come unto you? as the Arabic and Ethiopic verſions read it: ſince the Apoſtle had determined upon his coming to them: and had made mention of it, he puts it to them, in what manner they themſelves would chuſe he ſhould come unto them; ſhall I come unto you with a rod? either as a ſchool-maſter, as were their falſe teachers, with a ferula; or as a father with a rod of correction and chaſtiſement, aſſuming his paternal authority, putting on ſevere looks, and uſing roughneſs; or rather as an Apoſtle with the Apoſtolical rod; by which is meant not excommunication, which is what belongs to a whole community, and not any ſingle perſon; but a power of inflicting puniſhment on the bodies of delinquents, by ſmiting with diſeaſes, and even with death itſelf; for as the prophets of the Old Teſtament had a power from God of inflicting diſeaſes and death upon offenders; ſo had the Apoſtles of the New, as appears from the inſtances of Ananias, and Sapphira, and Elymas the ſorcerer: or in love, and in the ſpirit of meekneſs; with the affection of a father, with a pleaſant countenance, and a meek ſpirit; in oppoſition to that roughneſs and ſharpneſs, he had an authority, as an Apoſtle of Chriſt, to uſe in proper caſes; and therefore as the latter would be moſt eligible by them, his ſuggeſtion is, that they would behave accordingly, that there might be no occaſion to come to them in the former manner, which was not deſirable by him. There ſeems to be an alluſion to a practice among the Jews, in the puniſhing of a drunkard or gluttonous perſon; the rule for which was this[y], "they firſt correct him בדברים או בשבט, with "words, or with a rod, as it is written, Deut. xxi. 18. "and have chaſtened him; but if he adds and re-"peats, (i. e. goes on in his ſin) then they ſtone "him." Or rather the alluſion is to the judges in the Sanhedrim, one of the inſtruments or enſigns of whoſe office, was a rod or ſtaff to ſmite with; it is ſaid[x] of R. Hona, when he went to the Sanhedrim, he uſed to ſay, bring me the inſtruments of the Tabernæ (the place where the Sanhedrim ſat) what are they? the ſtaff (in Cocceius's edition it is חוטרי, the rods, and the ſandals, the trumpets, and the thongs) the Gloſs is, the thong for ſcourging, the ſtaff, (or rods) for beating the rebellious until they return, the trumpets for excommunication, and the ſandals for plucking off the ſhoe; things in which the judges of the court were concerned, and here the Apoſtle propoſes to come as a judge; ſee chap. v. 3, 12.

CHAP. V.

In this chapter the Apoſtle blames the Corinthians for conniving at a ſin committed by one of their members; declares what he was determined to do, and what ſhould be done by them in this caſe; and in general adviſes to ſhun converſation with wicked men: in ver. 1. mention is made of the ſin committed by one among themſelves, and which was publickly known, and commonly talked of; and which in general was fornication, and particularly inceſt, a man lying with his Father's wife; and which is aggravated by its being what was not named, or could not be named among any virtuous perſons among the Gentiles without offence: and yet the members of this church, at leaſt the majority of them, were unconcerned at it, and were ſo far from mourning over it, and taking any ſtep to remove the perſon from them that had done it, that they were ſwelled with pride, and gloried on account of their gifts, and perhaps on account of this man, who had committed the iniquity, ver. 2. This affair being related to the Apoſtle, tho' at a diſtance; and he well knowing all things concerning it, as tho' he was preſent, reſolved what ſhould be done in this caſe by himſelf, ver. 3. and that was to deliver the man to ſatan, in the name, and with the power and authority of Chriſt, when the members of this church were gathered together, and his Spirit with them; the end of which was for the deſtruction of the man's body, and the ſalvation of his ſoul, ver. 4, 5. and then the Apoſtle returns to blame them for their glorying in men, and in external gifts, and pleading theſe as a reaſon why the man ſhould be continued, and not removed from them; not conſidering the danger they were expoſed to, and which he illuſtrates by the ſimile of leaven, a little of which affects the whole lump; ſuggeſting thereby the danger they were in by continuing ſuch a wicked perſon among them, ver. 6. wherefore purſuing the ſame metaphor, taken from the Jewiſh paſſover, he exhorts to remove from them the man that had ſinned, as the Jews at the paſſover removed the leaven out of their houſes; that ſo they might appear to be a church renewed, and purged, and clear of leaven, keeping the true and ſpiritual paſſover, which they were under obligation to do, ſince Chriſt, the antitype of the paſſover, was ſacrificed for them, ver. 7. wherefore it became them to keep the feaſt of the Lord's ſupper; and indeed, to have the whole courſe of their converſation ſo ordered, as to avoid ſin and ſinners, and to behave in truth and uprightneſs, ver. 8. when the Apoſtle goes on to put them in mind of what he had formerly written unto them, as ſuitable to the preſent caſe, which was, that they ſhould not keep company with wicked men, particularly with fornicators, ſuch as this man, tho' in a more heinous manner, ver. 9. and explains what was his meaning; not that they were to have no manner of converſation with perſons of ſuch a character, and of ſuch like evil characters, in things of a civil nature, for then there would be no living in the world, ver. 10. But his ſenſe was, that they ſhould keep no company with perſons guilty of the ſins mentioned, who bore the name of chriſtian brethren, and were members of the ſame churchſtate with them, from whoſe communion they ought to be removed; and indeed, ſo much familiarity with them ſhould not be indulged, as even to eat with them, ver. 11. The reaſon of this difference, which he made between wicked men, who were not members of the church, and thoſe that were, is becauſe he had nothing to do, nor they neither, with them that were without the church, as it was their buſineſs only to take cognizance of them that were within, ver. 12. but neither of them had any thing to do, to judge and cenſure thoſe that did not belong to the church, but ſhould leave them to God, the righteous judge; and then cloſes all, ver. 13. with what he had chiefly in view throughout the whole chapter, and that is, that they would remove from their communion the wicked perſon who had been guilty of the ſin firſt mentioned.

[x] T. Bab, Sanhedrin, fol. 7. 2.

Ver. 1. It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, &c.] The Apoſtle having reproved the Corinthians for their ſchiſms and diviſions about their miniſters, proceeds to charge them with immoralities committed among them, and which were connived at, and took no notice of by them; and particularly a very notorious one, which he here mentions, with its aggravated circumſtances. It was done among them; not only by one of their citizens, nor merely by one of their hearers, but by one of their members, and ſo was cognizable by them as a church; for tho' they had nothing to do with them that were without, yet they were concerned with them that were within: this was a public offence; it was known by every one, and it was in every body's mouth; it was heard in all companies; it was commonly, ολως, univerſally talked of, and reported; it was generally known at Corinth, and in all Achaia, ſo that the church could not plead ignorance, nor could they be excuſed from blame in not as publickly declaring their abhorrence of the fact, as it was committed, which was fornication: fornication, ολως, generally taken, might be committed among them in all the branches of it, as that may include ſimple fornication, adultery, inceſt, and all acts of uncleanneſs; wherefore the Apoſtle proceeds to deſcribe that particular inſtance of fornication, that one of their members was guilty of: and ſuch fornication, as is not ſo much as named among the Gentiles, that one ſhould have his father's wife; not but that ſuch unnatural copulations were practiſed, as among the Indians, Moors, Bactrians, Ethiopians, Medes, and Perſians, as reported by ſundry writers[y]; and among the Arabians, before prohibited by Mahomet[z]; but then ſuch marriages and mixtures were not allowed of among the more civil and cultivated nations, as the Grecians and Romans, and never mentioned but with deteſtation and abhorrence: and if this man was a Jew, it was an aggravation of his ſin, that he ſhould be guilty of a crime decry'd by the Gentiles, as well as it was a violation of a known law of God given to the Jews, Lev. xviii. 7. and, according to the Jewiſh writers[a], ſuch a man was doubly guilty: their canon is, "הבא על אשת אב, he that lies with his father's "wife is guilty, on account of her being his fa"ther's wife, and on account of her being another "man's wife, whether in his father's life-time, or "after his death, and whether eſpouſed or mar"ried;" and ſuch an one was to be ſtoned. Of this kind was this man's crime; he had his father's wife, not his own mother, but his ſtep-mother; for there's a diſtinction between a mother, and a father's wife, as in the above canon. "Theſe are "to be ſtoned, he that lies with his mother, or "with his father's wife." Whether this man had married his father's wife, or kept her as his concubine, continuing in an inceſtuous cohabitation with her, is not certain, and whether his father was dead or living; which latter ſeems to be the caſe from 2 Cor. vii. 12. his iniquity was abominable and intolerable, and by no means to be winked at in a church of Chriſt.

Ver. 2. And ye are puffed up, &c.] Either with the gifts, learning, and eloquence of their preachers, and particularly of this man, who, by ſome, is thought to be one of their teachers; and tho' he was guilty of ſo foul a crime, yet they ſtill applauded him, and cried him up for a wonderful preacher: or one party was puffed up againſt another; that which was oppoſite to the party this man belonged to, boaſting over the other as free from the ſcandal that was expoſed unto; or the other were puffed up with their lenity and forbearance, boaſting of it as an act of humanity and good nature, and an inſtance of charity, ſhewing that they were not ſevere upon one another, for miſtakes in life: or elſe were puffed up and gloried in the thing itſelf, as an inſtance of chriſtian liberty, and their freedom from the law, thro' a ſad miſtake of it; and in which they might be ſtrengthened by a notion of the Jews, that it was lawful for proſelyted Gentiles to do ſuch things, for ſo ſays Maimonides[b]. “ The ſentence of the law is, “ that it is free for a Gentile שישא אמו to marry “ his mother, or his ſiſter that are made proſelytes; “ but the wiſe men forbid this thing, that they “ may not ſay we are come from a holineſs that is “ heavy, to one that is light.” But this writer concludes, that a proſelyte might marry his father's brother's wife, and his father's wife; and ſo ſays his commentator[c], and obſerves, that it was the opinion of R. Akiba, which Rabbi was cotemporary with the Apoſtle Paul: ſo that this notion prevailed in his days, and does in ſome meaſure account for the commiſſion of ſuch a ſin by a church-member, and the church's negligence about it: and have not rather mourned; not only perſonally, and ſeparately, but as a body; they ought to have met together as a church, and humbled themſelves before God for this ſcandalous iniquity done in the midſt of them, and pray unto him, that he that hath done this deed might be taken away from among you; not by excommunication, for that they could, and ought to have done themſelves; but by the immediate hand of God, inflicting ſome viſible puniſhment, and taking him away by an untimely death, which the Jews call כריה, cutting off, by the hand of God; and ſuch a puniſhment, they ſay, this crime deſerved; according to them, there were ſix and thirty cuttings off in the law, or ſo many things which deſerved death by the hand of God; and the two firſt that are mentioned are theſe, he that lies with his mother, or with his father's wife[d].

Ver. 3. For I verily as abſent in body, &c.] As he really was, being now at Philippi, if any dependance is to be had upon the ſubſcription of this epiſtle; or rather at Epheſus; however, wherever he was, 'tis certain he was not at Corinth: but preſent in ſpirit; in his affection to them, care of them, and concern for their good, and the glory of God: have judged already; he had conſidered of the matter, thought very deliberately about it, and was now come to a point, to a determination concerning it, what to do in it: as tho' I were preſent; upon the ſpot, in perſon, to do what he had reſolved upon: to him that hath ſo done this deed; this infamous one, and in ſo ſcandalous a manner, and which was continued in: what that was which the Apoſtle upon mature deliberation and judgment, determined to do with this wicked man, is expreſſed in ver. 5. which is to be connected with this, the whole 4^th^ verſe being to be read in a parentheſis, and that was to deliver him to ſatan.

Ver. 4. In the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] Theſe words contain an account of the ſeveral things and circumſtances, that ſhould attend the awful act of the Apoſtle, in delivering this man to ſatan; it would be done in the name of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; by his command, power, and authority, and for his glory; in whoſe name all miraculous actions, as this was one, were performed: when ye are gathered together; as a church, in a publick manner, in one place; not to do this buſineſs, for this was purely apoſtolical; but to be witneſs of this wonderful operation, to acknowledge the juſtice of God in it, and that they might fear and take warning by it: and my ſpirit; meaning that tho' he was abſent in body, he ſhould be preſent in ſpirit; and that the extraordinary gift of the Spirit of God beſtowed on him, would be viſibly exerciſed upon this man before them all, as if he himſelf was in the midſt of them; and this not by any power of his own, but with the power of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; to which all ſuch miraculous effects, as this hereafter related, are to be aſcribed.

Ver. 5. To deliver ſuch an one unto ſatan, &c.] This, as before obſerved, is to be read in connexion with ver. 3. and is what the Apoſtle there determined to do with this inceſtuous perſon; namely, to deliver him unto ſatan; by which is meant, not the act of excommunication, or the removing of him from the communion of the church, which is an act of the whole church, and not of any ſingle perſon; whereas this was what the church had nothing to do with; it was not what they were to do, or ought to do, but what the Apoſtle had reſolved to do; and which was an act of his own, and peculiar to him as an Apoſtle, ſee 1 Tim. i. 20. Nor is this a form of excommunication; nor was this phraſe ever uſed in excommunicating perſons by the primitive churches; nor ought it ever to be uſed; it is what no man, or ſett of men, have power to do now, ſince the ceaſing of the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, which the Apoſtles were endowed with; who, as they had a power over ſatan to diſpoſſeſs him from the bodies of men, ſo to deliver up the bodies of men into his hands, as the Apoſtle did this man's: for the deſtruction of the fleſh; that is, that his body might be ſhook, buffeted, afflicted, and tortured in a terrible manner; that by this means he might be brought to a ſenſe of his ſin, to repentance for it, and make an humble acknowledgment of it: that the ſpirit may be ſaved in the day of the Lord Jeſus; that he might be renewed in the ſpirit of his mind, be reſtored by repentance, and his ſoul be ſaved in the day of Chriſt; either at death, when ſoul and body would be ſeparated, or at the day of the reſurrection, when both ſhould be re-united; for the fleſh here means, not the corruption of nature, in oppoſition to the Spirit, as a principle of grace, but the body, in diſtinction from the ſoul: nor was the ſoul of this man, only his body, delivered for a time unto ſatan; the end of which was, that his ſoul might be ſaved, which could never be done by delivering it up to ſatan: and very wrongly is this applied to excommunication; when it is no part of excommunication, nor the end of it, to deliver ſouls to ſatan, but rather to deliver them from him. The phraſe ſeems to be Jewiſh, and to expreſs that extraordinary power the Apoſtles had in thoſe days, as well in giving up the bodies of men to ſatan, for a temporal chaſtiſement, as in delivering them from him. The Jews ſay, that Solomon had ſuch a power; of whom they tell the following ſtory[e]: “ one day he ſaw the angel of death “ grieving; he ſaid to him, why grieveſt thou? he “ replied, theſe two Cuſhites have deſired of me, to “ ſit here, he delivered them to the devil; the Gloſs is,

"these ſeek of me to aſcend, for their time to die "was come; but he could not take away their "ſouls, becauſe it was decreed concerning them, "that they ſhould not die but in the gate of Luz, "מסרינהו שלמה לשעירים, Solomon delivered them "to the devils, for he was king over them, as it is "written, 1 Chron. xxix. 13. for he reigned over them, "that are above, and them that are below." The phraſe is much the ſame as here, and the power which they, without any foundation, aſcribe to Solomon, the Apoſtles had: this is their rod which they uſed, ſometimes in ſtriking perſons dead, ſometimes by inflicting diſeaſes on them themſelves, and at other times by delivering them up into the hands of ſatan to be afflicted and terrified by him, which is the caſe here. And it may be obſerved, that the giving up of Job into the hands of ſatan, by the Lord, is expreſſed in the Septuagint verſion by the ſame word as here; for where it is ſaid, Job ii. 10. behold, he is in thine hand; that verſion renders it, behold, ϖαραδιδωμι σοι αυτον, I deliver him to thee, that is, to ſatan; and which was done, that his body might be ſmote with ſore boils by him, as it was; only his life was to be preſerved, that he was not ſuffered to touch.

Ver. 6. Your glorying is not good, &c.] Their glorying in their outward flouriſhing condition, in their riches and wealth, and in their miniſters, in their wiſdom and parts, when under ſuch an humbling diſpenſation; and eſpecially if their glorying was in the ſin itſelf, and their connivance at it, it was far from being good, it was very criminal, as the conſequence of it was dangerous: know ye not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? This, in nature, is what every body knows; and the proverb, which is much uſed by the Jews [f], was common in the mouths of all, and the meaning of it eaſy to be underſtood: thus, whether applied to the leaven of falſe doctrine, nothing is more manifeſt, than when this is let alone, and a ſtop is not put to it, it increaſes to more ungodlineſs; or to vice and immorality, as here; which if not taken notice of by a church, is not faithfully reproved and ſeverely cenſured, as the caſe requires, will endanger the whole community; it may ſpread by example, and under the connivance of the church, to the corrupting of good manners, and infecting of many.

Ver. 7. Purge out therefore the old leaven, &c.] Meaning either the inceſtuous perſon, whoſe crime might well be compared to ſour leaven, and be called old, becauſe of his long continuance in it; whom the Apoſtle would have removed from them; this is properly the act of excommunication, which that church was to perform, as a quite diſtinct thing from what the Apoſtle himſelf determined to do. The alluſion is to the ſtrict ſearch the Jews made [g], juſt before their paſſover, after leaven, to purge their houſes of it, that none of it might remain when their feaſt began; which they made by the light of a lamp, on the night of the fourteenth of the month Niſan, in every ſecret place, hole, and corner of the houſe; or this may be an exhortation to the church in general with reſpect to themſelves, as well as this man, to relinquiſh their old courſe of ſinning, to put off concerning the former converſation the old man, Epheſ. iv. 22. the ſame with the old leaven here; it being uſual with the Jews [h] to call the vitioſity and corruption of nature, שאור שבעסה, leaven in the lump; of which they ſay [i], "the evil imagination of a man, as "leaven in the lump, enters into his bowels little, "little, (very little at firſt) but afterwards it increaſes "in him, until his whole body is mixed with it." That ye may be a new lump; that they might appear to be what they profeſſed to be, new men, new creatures in Chriſt, by their walking in newneſs of life; and by removing that wicked perſon, they would be as the Apoſtles were, when Judas was gone from them, all clean through the word of Chriſt: as ye are unleavened; at leaſt profeſſed to be. They were without the leaven of ſin; not without the being of ſin in their hearts, nor without the commiſſion of it, more or leſs in their lives; but were juſtified from it by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and had the new creature formed in their ſouls, or that which was born of God in them, that ſinned not. The Apoſtle compares the true believers of this church to the unleavened bread eaten at the paſſover, for the grace of their hearts, and the ſimplicity of their lives; as he does the inceſtuous man to the old leaven, that was to be ſearched for, and caſt out at the feaſt: for even Chriſt our paſſover is ſacrificed for us. This is obſerved, to ſhew the pertinency of the ſimilies of leaven and unleavened, the Apoſtle had made uſe of; and to make ſome further improvement of them, for the uſe, comfort, and inſtruction of this church; ſaying, that Chriſt is our paſſover, the chriſtians paſſover; the Jewiſh paſſover was a type of Chriſt; wherefore Moſes kept it by faith, in the faith of the Meſſiah that was to come; ſee Heb. xi. 28. as it was inſtituted in commemoration of the deliverance of the Iſraelites from Egypt, ſo likewiſe to prefigure Chriſt, and the redemption of his people by him. The Jews have a ſaying [k], "that in the "month Niſan they were redeemed, and in the "month Niſan they will be redeemed;" which was the month in which the paſſover was kept; and for the confirmation of which, they mention the following texts, Mic. vii. 15. Iſa. liv. 8. Exod. xii. 42. There is an agreement between the paſſover, and Chriſt, in the ſacrifice itſelf, and the qualities of it; it was a lamb, as Chriſt is the Lamb of God, of his appointing and providing, and fitly ſo called, for his innocence and harmleſſneſs, his meekneſs, humility, and patience; it was a lamb without blemiſh, as Chriſt is, without ſpot and blemiſh, without the ſpot of original ſin, or blemiſh of any actual tranſgreſſion; it was a male, as Chriſt is the Son of man, the head of the body, and the firſtborn among many brethren; it was a male of the firſt year, in which it might prefigure Chriſt in the flower of his age, arrived at man's eſtate, and having had an experience of a variety of ſorrows and afflictions. There is alſo ſome likeneſs between them in the ſeparation and ſlaying of it. The paſſover lamb was to be taken out from the ſheep, or from the goats; as Chriſt's human nature was choſen out from among the people, and in God's eternal counſel and covenant, ſeparated from the reſt of the individuals of human nature, and taken into a federal union with the Son of God, and preordained before the foundation of the world, to be the Lamb ſlain; it was alſo wonderfully formed by the Holy Ghoſt in the virgin's womb, and ſeparated and preſerved from the infection of ſin; and in his life and converſation here on earth, he was ſeparated from ſinners, from being like them, and is now made higher than the heavens. This lamb was kept up from the tenth of the month, to the fourteenth, before it was killed; which might typify the preſervation of Chriſt in his infancy, from the malice of Herod, and in his riper years, from the deſigns of the Jews upon him, until his time was come; and 'tis to be obſerved, that there was much ſuch a ſpace of time between his entrance into Jeruſalem, and his ſufferings and death; ſee John xii. 1, 12. The lamb was ſlain, ſo the prince of life was killed; and between the two evenings, as Chriſt was in the end of the world, in the laſt days, in the decline of time, of the age of the world, and even of the time of the day, about the ninth hour, or three o'clock in the afternoon, the time between the two evenings; the firſt evening beginning at noon as ſoon as the ſun began to decline, the other upon the ſetting of it. There is likewiſe a compariſon of theſe together to be obſerved, in the dreſſing and eating of it. The paſſover lamb was not to be eaten raw nor ſodden; ſo Chriſt is to be eaten not in a carnal, but in a ſpiritual way, by faith; it was to be roaſt with fire, denoting the painful ſufferings of Chriſt on the croſs, and the fire of divine wrath that fell upon him; it was to be eaten whole, as a whole Chriſt is to be received by faith, in his perſon, and in all his offices, grace, and righteouſneſs; not a bone of it was to be broken, which was fulfilled in Chriſt, John xix. 36. it was to be eaten with unleavened bread, which is ſpiritualized by the Apoſtle in the next verſe; and alſo with bitter herbs, expreſſive of the hard bondage and ſevere afflictions, with which the lives of the Iſraelites were made bitter in Egypt; and ſignificative of the perſecutions and trials that ſuch muſt expect, who live godly and by faith in Chriſt Jeſus: it was eaten only by Iſraelites, and ſuch as became proſelytes, as Chriſt, only by true believers; and if the houſhold was too little, they were to join with their neighbours; which might typify the calling and bringing in of the Gentiles, when the middle wall of partition was broken down, Chriſt, his fleſh and blood being common to both. The firſt paſſover was eaten in haſte, with their loins girt, their ſhoes on, and ſtaves in their hands, ready to depart from Egypt to Canaan's land; denoting the readineſs of believers to every good work; having their feet ſhod with the preparation of the Goſpel of peace; their loins girt about with truth, their lights burning, and they, like men waiting for their Lord's coming; haſting unto the day of the Lord, being earneſtly deſirous of being abſent from the body, that they might be preſent with him: in a word, the receiving of the blood of the paſſover lamb into a baſon, ſprinkling it on the lintel, and two ſide-poſts of the doors of the houſes, in which they eat it, which the Lord ſeeing paſſed over thoſe houſes, when he paſſed through Egypt to deſtroy the firſt-born, whence it has its name of the paſſover, were very ſignificative of the blood of ſprinkling, even the blood of Chriſt upon the hearts and conſciences of believers; whereby they are ſecured from avenging juſtice, from the curſe and condemnation of the law, and from wrath to come, and ſhall never be hurt of the ſecond death. Thus Chriſt is our antitypical paſſover, who was ſacrificed, whoſe body and ſoul were offered as an offering and ſacrifice unto God for us, that he might be proper food for our faith; and alſo in our room and ſtead, to make ſatisfaction to divine juſtice for all our ſins and tranſgreſſions.

Ver. 8. Therefore let us keep the feaſt, &c.] Not the feaſt of the paſſover, which was now ceaſed, though this is ſaid in alluſion to it; when the maſter of the houſe uſed to ſay [1], "every one that is "hungry, let him come and eat; he that hath "need, let him come ויפסח, and paſchatize, or "keep the feaſt of the paſſover:" but rather the feaſt of the Lord's ſupper is here meant, that feaſt of fat things Iſaiah propheſied of; in which are the richeſt entertainments, even the fleſh and blood of Chriſt; though it ſeems beſt to underſtand it, of the whole courſe of a chriſtian's life, ſpent in the exerciſe of ſpiritual joy and faith in Chriſt; he that is of a merry heart, as the believer of all men in the world has reaſon to be of, hath a continual feaſt, Prov. xv. 15. of ſpiritual mirth and pleaſure, rejoicing always in Chriſt, as he ought to do: which feaſt, or courſe of life, is to be kept not with old leaven; in the old, vain, ſinful manner of converſation, as before: neither with the leaven of malice and wickedneſs; not in malice to any man, or one another, nor in any ſort of wickedneſs, living in no known ſin, and allowing of it: but with the unleavened bread of ſincerity; as oppoſed to malice, of ſincere love to God and Chriſt, and to his people: and of truth; of Goſpel doctrine, diſcipline, and converſation.

Ver. 9. I wrote unto you in an epiſtle, &c.] Not in this ſame epiſtle, and in this chapter, ver. 2, 7. as ſome think; for what is here obſerved, is not written in either of thoſe verſes, but in ſome other epiſtle he had ſent them before, as is clear from ver. 11. which either came not to hand, or elſe was neglected by them; and ſo what he here ſays, may be conſidered as a reproof to them, for taking no notice of his advice; but continuing to ſhew reſpect to the inceſtuous perſon, though he in a former epiſtle had adviſed them to the contrary: no doubt the Apoſtle wrote other epiſtles to the Corinthians, beſides thoſe that are in being; ſee 2 Cor. x. 10, 11. nor does ſuch a ſuppoſition at all detract from the perfection of ſcripture; for not all that were written by him, were by divine inſpiration; and as many as were ſo, and were neceſſary for the perfection of the canon of ſcripture, and to inſtruct us in the whole counſel of God, have been preſerved; nor is this any contradiction to this epiſtle's being his firſt to this church; for though it might not be his firſt to them, yet it is the firſt to them extant with us, and therefore ſo called: what he had written to them in another epiſtle, was not to company with fornicators; which he had not ſo fully explained, neither what fornicators he meant, nor what by keeping company with them; he therefore in this diſtinguiſhes upon the former, and enlarges his ſenſe of the latter; declaring, that they were not ſo much as to eat with ſuch perſons; which ſhews, that this prohibition does not regard unclean copulation, or a joining with them in the ſin of fornication, they had been uſed to in a ſtate of unregeneracy; for ſome ſort of companying with fornicators, is allowed of in the next verſe; whereas no degree of a ſinful mixture with them would ever be tolerated; but that it is to be underſtood of a civil ſociety and familiar converſation with them; which might bring a reproach upon religion, be a ſtumbling to weak chriſtians, and be of dangerous conſequence to themſelves and others; who hereby might be allured and drawn by their example, into the commiſſion of the ſame ſinful practices. The Apoſtle ſeems to allude to the cuſtoms and uſages of the Jews, who abſtained from all civil commerce and familiar acquaintance with unbelievers. They ſay, "that every one that does not ſtudy in the law, "אסיר למקרב לגביה ולמעבד ביה סחורתא וכ״ש "למהך עמיה באורחא, it is forbidden to come near "him, and to exerciſe merchandize with him, and "much leſs to walk with him in the way, becauſe "there is no faith in him [m]."

Ver. 10. Yet not altogether with the fornicators of this world, &c.] By the fornicators of this world are meant, ſuch as were guilty of this ſin, who were the men of the world, mere worldly carnal men, who were never called out of it, or ever profeſſed to be; in diſtinction from thoſe that were in the church, that had committed this iniquity; and the Apoſtle's ſenſe is, that his former prohibition of keeping company with fornicators, was not to be underſtood as referring to ſuch perſons as were out of the church, as if no ſort of civil converſation and commerce were to be had with men of ſuch, and the like infamous characters: or with the covetous, or extortioners, or with idolaters; that is, of this world; for this clauſe is to be underſtood of each of theſe; ſo we read [n] of, בצעין דעלמא, the covetous of the world: by the covetous are meant, either ſuch who are given up to inordinate luſts, who work all uncleanneſs with greedineſs, and can never be ſatisfied with their filthy enjoyments; or ſuch who are greedily deſirous of riches and wealth, and of increaſing their worldly ſubſtance by any method, right or wrong; and who not only withhold that which is meet from others, but will not allow themſelves what is proper and neceſſary: extortioners are either raviſhers, as the word may be rendered; ſuch who by force violate the chaſtity of others, youths or virgins; or robbers, who by violence and rapine, take away that which is the right and property of others; or ſuch who oppreſs the poor, detain their wages by fraud, or leſſen them, and extort that by unlawful gain, which is unreaſonable: idolaters are thoſe, who worſhip the falſe deities of the heathens, or any idol, graven image, or picture of God, or men, or any creature whatſoever, or any but the one Lord God. The Apoſtle under theſe characters, comprizes all manner of ſin againſt a man's ſelf, againſt his neighbour, and againſt God; againſt himſelf, as fornication; againſt his neighbour, as covetouſneſs and extortion; and againſt God, as idolatry: and ſince the world abounded with men guilty of theſe ſeveral vices, all kind of civil correſpondence with them could not be avoided, for then muſt you needs go out of the world; meaning not out of Greece, or of any of the cities thereof, into other parts, but out of the world itſelf; they muſt even deſtroy themſelves, or ſeek out for a new world: 'tis an hyperbolical way of ſpeaking, ſhewing that the thing is impracticable and impoſſible, ſince men of this ſort are every where; and were all trade and converſation with them to be forbidden, the families of God's people could never be ſupported, nor the intereſt of religion maintained; a ſtop would ſoon be put to worldly buſineſs, and ſaints would have little or nothing to do in the world; wherefore as the Arabic verſion reads it, buſineſs would compel you to go out of the world.

Ver. 11. But now have I written unto you, &c.] Which ſhews, that what he had writen before, was at another time, and in another epiſtle; but not that what he was now writing was different from the former, only he explains the perſons of whom, and the thing about which he had before written: not to keep company, if any man that is called a brother, be a fornicator; or if any man that is a brother is called, or named a fornicator; or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner, with ſuch an one, no, not to eat. The Apoſtle's meaning is, that in his prohibition of keeping company with men of the above character, he would be underſtood of ſuch perſons as were called brethren; who had been received into the church, and had been looked upon, and had profeſſed themſelves to be ſuch; and who might be mentioned by name, as notoriouſly guilty of fornication, covetouſneſs, idolatry, and extortion, mentioned in the former verſe; to which are added two other ſins any of them might be addicted to, as railing either at their fellow brethren and chriſtians, or others, giving reproachful language to them, and fixing invidious characters on them: and drunkenneſs; living in the frequent commiſſion of that ſin, and others before ſpoken of; and that ſuch perſons remaining impenitent and incorrigible, ſtill perſiſting in ſuch a vicious courſe of life, after due admonition given them, were not only to be removed from their religious ſociety, from the communion of the church, and be debarred ſitting down, and eating with them at the Lord's table, or at their love-feaſts, but alſo were to be denied civil converſation and familiarity with them, and even not ſuffered to eat common food at the ſame table with them; which though lawful to be uſed with the men of the world, yet for ſome reaſons were not adviſeable to be uſed with ſuch; partly for vindicating the honour of religion, and preventing the ſtumbling of the weak; and partly to make ſuch offenders aſhamed, and bring them to repentance. The Apoſtle alludes to the behaviour of the Jews, either to perſons that were under any pollution, as a woman in the days of her ſeparation, when her huſband, לא יאכל עמה, might not eat with her off of the ſame plate, nor at the ſame table, nor on the ſame cloth; nor might ſhe drink with him, nor mix his cup for him; and the ſame was obſerved to perſons that had iſſues on them [o]: or rather to ſuch as were under, נדוי, the ſentence of excommunication, and ſuch an one was obliged to ſit the diſtance of four cubits from others, and who might not eat nor drink with him; nor was he allowed to waſh and ſhave himſelf, nor a ſufficiency of food, nor any to ſit with him within the ſpace of four cubits, except thoſe of his houſe [p].

Ver. 12. For what have I to do to judge, &c.] To admoniſh, reprove, cenſure, and condemn: them alſo that are without? without the church, who never were in it, or members of it; to whom eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction does not reach; and with whom the Apoſtle had no more concern, than the magiſtrates of one city, or the heads of one family have with another: do not ye judge them that are within? and them only? The Apoſtle appeals to their own conduct, that they only reproved, cenſured, and puniſhed with excommunication, ſuch as were within the pale of the church, were members of it, and belonged unto it; nor did they pretend to exerciſe a power over others; and it would have been well if they had made uſe of the power they had over their own members, by admoniſhing and reproving ſuch as had ſinned; by cenſuring delinquents, and removing from their communion ſcandalous and impenitent offenders; and therefore they need not wonder that the Apoſtle only meant fornicators, &c. among them, and not thoſe that were in the world, by his forbidding to company with ſuch: reference ſeems to be had to ways of ſpeaking among the Jews, who uſed not only to call themſelves the church, and the Gentiles the world, and ſo them that were without, both their land and church; but even thoſe among themſelves that were profane, in diſtinction from their wiſe and good men. They ſay[q], "if a man puts his phylacteries on his forehead, or upon the palm of his hand, this is the way of hereſy (or as in the Talmud[r], the way of the Karaites;) if he covered them with gold, and put them upon his glove (or on his garments without, ſo Bartenora, or as Maimonides interprets it, his arm, ſhoulder, or breaſt) lo, this is, דרך החיצונים, the way of them that are without; on which the commentators[s] ſay, theſe are the children of men, who walk after their own judgment, and not the judgment of the wiſe men:" and Maimonides[t] ſays, they are ſuch who deny the whole law, and neither believe any thing, either of the written or the oral law.

Ver. 13. But them that are without God judgeth, &c.] Or will judge, in the great day of judgment; wherefore though ſuch perſons did not fall under the cenſures and puniſhment of the Apoſtle, nor of a church of Chriſt, yet they ſhall not go unpuniſhed; God will call them to an account for their fornication, covetouſneſs, idolatry, extortion, &c. and will judge, condemn, and puniſh them, according to their works; and therefore ſince they don't fall under the cognizance of the churches of Chriſt, they are to be left to the tribunal of God; and all that the ſaints have to do, is to watch over one another, and reprove, rebuke, and cenſure, as caſes require, and as the caſe of this church did. Therefore put away from among yourſelves that wicked perſon; not that wicked thing, as ſome read it, but that wicked one; meaning not the devil, who is ſometimes ſo called; a ſenſe of the words propoſed by Calvin, not aſſerted; but that wicked man, that inceſtuous perſon, whom the Apoſtle would have removed from among them, by excommunication; which was what became them as a church to do, and which lay in their power to do, and could only be done by them, and was to be their own pure act and deed: reference ſeems to be had to thoſe paſſages in Deut. xvii. 7. and xxi. 21. and xxii. 21. and xxiv. 7. where the Septuagint render the phraſe, εξαρεις τον πονερον εξ υμων αυτων, thou ſhalt put away that wicked one from among yourſelves.

CHAP. VI.

THE principal view of this chapter, is to diſſuade chriſtians from going to law with one another before heathens, and alſo from fornication: the Apoſtle begins with the firſt of theſe, and argues againſt it, from its being a daring, dangerous, and ſcandalous practice; and from the different characters of the perſons, before whom controverſies about civil things among chriſtians, ſhould and ſhould not be brought; the one being ſaints, and ſo conſcientious perſons, and would do the right thing; the other unjuſt, and ſo juſtice could not be expected to be done by them, ver. 1. and that the former, and not the latter, ſhould be appointed judges in ſuch caſes, is argued from the greater to the leſſer; that ſeeing theſe will judge the world, much more then ſhould they be employed in matters of leſs conſequence, ver. 2. and by the ſame ſort of argument it is further urged, that even angels themſelves ſhall be judged by the ſaints; then much more might affairs appertaining to this life, be brought before them, and be decided by them, ver. 3. yea, even the things that were litigated by them, and which they had power of judging in, were ſuch as might be determined by men of the leaſt capacity among them, and therefore had no need to bring them before heathen magiſtrates, ver. 4. beſides, it could not be ſpoken of, but to their ſhame, that after all their boaſt of their gifts, learning, and eloquence, there was not one man of wiſdom and ability among them, to judge in matters of civil property, ver. 5. and this evil of commencing law-ſuits in heathen courts of judicature, is aggravated by its being done, not between chriſtians and heathens, but between one chriſtian brother and another, and that before men that were infidels, ver. 6. and which to do, ſhewed a great deficiency of love, wiſdom, and care; and much better it was to take and ſuffer wrong, than to be guilty of ſuch criminal conduct, ver. 7. yea, thoſe that drew their brethren before ſuch judgment-ſeats, did them wrong, both by bringing them thither, and by getting their cauſe in an unjuſt manner, ver. 8. wherefore to deter from ſuch unrighteous procedures, the Apoſtle declares, that all injurious perſons, and wicked men in any way, and of any ſort, ſhould not inherit the kingdom of God, ver. 9, 10. and whereas ſome of thoſe the Apoſtle writes to had been ſuch, but now through the grace of God were otherwiſe, this ſhould be conſidered as an argument, why they ſhould not contend with one another before perſons deſtitute of the grace they were partakers of, ver. 11. and now the Apoſtle having mentioned fornication as a ſin which excluded from the kingdom of God, and this being reckoned by the Gentiles an indifferent thing; he firſt obſerves of indifferent things in general, that are really ſo, that though they are lawful to be uſed, it is not expedient to uſe them at all times, and under all circumſtances; and eſpecially care ſhould be taken, that by the uſe of them, we don't become ſlaves unto them, ver. 12. and then particularly inſtances in meats, which without diſtinction might be lawfully eaten, they being made for the belly, and the belly for them; which was anſwering the original deſign of them, though hereafter both will be deſtroyed; yet fornication muſt not be put upon a level with them, and reckoned indifferent as they are; ſince the body was not made to be abuſed and defiled, or for fornication; but to be redeemed and ſanctified by the Lord, and to ſerve him, and who was appointed for the redemption and ſanctification of that, ver. 13. moreover, the ſin of fornication is diſſuaded from, by the conſideration of the reſurrection of the body as a glorious one, by the power of God, of which Chriſt's reſurrection is a pledge; and therefore ſhould not be defiled with this ſin, ver. 14. as alſo from the bodies of the ſaints being the members of Chriſt; and therefore ſhould not be made the members of an harlot by fornication, theſe things being utterly abſurd and inconſiſtent, ver. 15. which is illuſtrated by obſerving, that he that is joined in unlawful copulation with an harlot, becomes one fleſh with her, ver. 16. which is confirmed by a paſſage cited out of Gen. ii. 24. which regards carnal copulation in general; but one that is in union with Chriſt, and is become a member of him, is one ſpirit with him; and therefore ſince there is ſuch a ſpiritual union between them, fornication which joins, unites, and makes a man one with an harlot, ſhould be carefully avoided, ver. 17. and in order the more to deter from this ſin, the Apoſtle obſerves, that it is not like ſome other ſins, which are without the body, but this is by it, and with it, and againſt it; it is diſhonourable, and may be hurtful to it, ver. 18. to which he adds, that the bodies of the ſaints are the temples of the Holy Ghoſt, where he dwells, and therefore ſhould not be polluted with fornication, ver. 19. and cloſes all with an argument, taken from their bodies not being their own property, to uſe and abuſe at pleaſure, but the purchaſe of Chriſt's blood; and therefore it was incumbent upon them to glorify him with them, as well as with their ſpirits, and not defile them with fornication.

Ver. 1. Dare any of you, having a matter againſt another, &c.] Any thing in difference, an action, cauſe, or ſuit. The Apoſtle having diſpatched the affair of the inceſtuous perſon, and blamed this church for their conduct therein; and having given them inſtructions what they ſhould do, proceeds to lay before them another evil among them he had to complain of; which was, when any difference aroſe among them about their worldly concerns, they would go to law before the unjuſt, and not before the ſaints; a method of proceeding condemned by the Jews, who would not ſuffer any cauſes of theirs to be tried before Gentiles, only before Iſraelites; their canon runs thus [u], "he that tries a cauſe before the judges "of the Gentiles, and before their tribunals, al"though their judgments are as the judgments of "the Iſraelites, lo, this is an ungodly man; and it "is as if he blaſphemed and reproached, and lift "up his hand againſt the law of Moſes our maſter, "as it is ſaid, Exod. xxi. 1. now theſe are the judg"ments which thou ſhalt ſet before them; before "them, ולא לפני גוים, and not before the Gentiles; "before them, ולא לפני הדיוטות, and not before "idiots, private or illiterate men." They looked upon ſuch an action, as bad as profaning the name of God; hence they ſay [w], "we muſt not try a "cauſe in the courts of the Gentiles, for they come "from the ſtrength of judgment; this is Eſau, "an hairy man, for they have no concord nor "mercy——and he that comes before them "מחלל הש״י, profanes the name of God, who "is gracious and merciful, and honours the name "of an idol—wherefore he that brings a cauſe be"fore the Gentiles, is the occaſion of ſpreading the "property of judgment in the world——there"fore let a cauſe be tried before the Iſraelites, for "they are the ſecret of mercy, and not before the "Gentiles, nor before idiots:" they affirm [x] it to be a greater ſin than murder, and that not only profanation of the name of God, but rapine and violence are comprehended in it; and that to give evidence in an heathen court againſt an Iſraelite, deſerves excommunication; for ſo it is ſaid [y], "he that bears witneſs againſt an Iſraelite, "בערכאות של גוים, in the courts of the Gentiles, "and by his teſtimony gets money from him, "which is not according to the judgment of the "Iſraelites, they excommunicate him until he re"pays it." Again [z], "it is forbidden to order "cauſes in the courts of (the reſt of the nations) "idolaters, for they have no part in the ſide of "our faith." The Apoſtle here diſſuades from this practice, of going to law before heathen magiſtrates, not only from its being an imprudent, but an impudent, daring, raſh, and adventurous action; and ſeems ſurprized that any ſhould attempt it, when it muſt unavoidably expoſe their weakneſſes and faults to their enemies; nor could they expect juſtice to be done them by men of ſuch a character, as unjuſt, who neither feared God, nor regarded men; were not only deſtitute of righteouſneſs, but filled with all unrighteouſneſs, and had not ſo much as the principles of common juſtice and equity in them; when on the contrary, from the ſaints, men who have the principles of grace and holineſs wrought in them, and live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly, who have the fear of God before their eyes, and upon their hearts; they might reaſonably conclude, were matters brought before them, they would be adjuſted according to judgment and truth, without expoſing the ſin and weakneſs of any party to the world.

Ver. 2. Do ye not know that the ſaints ſhall judge the world, &c.] The Apoſtle appeals to them concerning this matter, as a thing well known unto them, or might eaſily be known by them; for this was either a traditional notion among the Jews, many of whom were in this church, that good men ſhould judge the world; as is ſaid of the righteous in the apocryphal book of Wiſdom, chap. iii. ver. 8. They ſhall judge the nations, and have dominion over the people, and their Lord ſhall reign for ever; and ſo the Jews ſay [a], that "the firſt day of the month "is the beginning of judgment in the whole world, "and Iſaac ſat on a throne, למידן עלמא, to judge "the world:" or this might be collected, as Dr. Lightfoot obſerves, out of Dan. vii. 18, 27. but the difficulty is, in what ſenſe the Apoſtle means the ſaints ſhall judge the world; not merely in a comparative ſenſe, for ſo even will the heathens, the men of Niniveh, and the queen of Sheba, judge and condemn the Jews; nor as aſſeſſors on the throne with Chriſt, for though they ſhall ſit on the ſame throne with him as reigning, yet not as judging with him, all judgment is ſolely committed to him: nor merely as approving that judiciary ſentence, that will be pronounced by him on the world; for even wicked men themſelves and devils, will be obliged to own the juſtice of it; but his meaning is, that in a little time the ſaints, chriſtian men, men under a profeſſion of chriſtianity at leaſt, ſhould be governours in the world, and bear the office of civil magiſtracy in it; which came to paſs in a few centuries after the writing of this, and has been more or leſs the caſe ever ſince; and will be more ſo in the latter day, when kings ſhall be nurſing fathers, and queens nurſing mothers to the church; and when the kingdom and dominion, and the greatneſs of the kingdom under the whole heaven, ſhall be given to the people of the ſaints of the moſt High: upon which the Apoſtle ſtrongly argues, and if the world ſhall be judged by you; if ſuch ſuch men as you ſhall bear ſway in it, fill up all civil offices in it, even the higheſt; ſhall ſit upon the benches of judges, and on the thrones of kings, and at laſt have the government of the whole world; ſince ſuch honour the ſaints ſhall have, and be abundantly capable of it, are ye unworthy to judge the ſmalleſt matters? is it too high a poſt, and can you be thought to be unqualified for, and unfit to have ſuch trivial things, of little or no moment and importance, things relating to the common affairs of life, brought before you, and be tried, and judged by you?

Ver. 3. Know ye not that we ſhall judge angels, &c.] Meaning not the miniſters of the Goſpel, and paſtors of churches, called angels, Rev. i. 20. whoſe doctrines are examined, tried, and judged by the ſaints, according to the word of God; nor the good angels, who, were it poſſible that they could, or ſhould publiſh a Goſpel contrary to what has been preached by the Apoſtle, would be contradicted, condemned, and accurſed by him, ſee Gal. i. 8, 9. but the evil angels, the devil and his angels: and this is to be underſtood not of their future, final judgment and condemnation at the laſt day, when ſaints will ſubſcribe unto, and approve of the ſentence pronounced upon them, and will triumph over them in their deſtruction; but of the judgment of them, and of their ejection out of the Gentile world, out of their oracles, idols, and idol temples, to which Chriſt refers, John xii. 31. and calls the judgment of this world, and the caſting out of the prince of it by the miniſtry of his Apoſtles; and which was now already begun, and ere long would be fully accompliſhed: accordingly the Syriac verſion renders it, know ye not, דלמלאכא דינינן, that we are about to judge angels? and the Arabic, know ye not that we judge angels? from whence the Apoſtle infers very juſtly, how much more things that pertain to this life; this animal life; to the trade and buſineſs of life; to pecuniary matters, to eſtates and poſſeſſions in this world, about which differences may ariſe between one ſaint and another.

Ver. 4. If then ye have judgments of things pertaining to this life, &c.] Not judgments relating to life and death, for theſe were not in the power of a Jewiſh Sanhedrim now, and much leſs of a chriſtian community, but were wholly in the power of the Roman magiſtrates; but judgments relating to the common affairs of life, or what the Jews call דיני ממונות, pecuniary judgments [b], in diſtinction from דיני נפשות, judgments of ſouls, or capital ones. The Jews ſay [c], "that forty years before the deſtruction of the temple capital judgments were taken from Iſrael; and in the days of R. Simeon ben Jochai, pecuniary judgments were taken away from Iſrael." Now this Rabbi lived many years after the times of the Apoſtles, ſo that as yet the Jews had a power of exerciſing ſuch judgments; and no doubt the Chriſtians alſo, who as yet were very little, if at all diſtinguiſhed from the Jews by the Romans: and therefore ſince ſuch judgments were within the compaſs of their authority, the Apoſtle adviſes to ſet them to judge who are leaſt eſteemed in the church; meaning, not thoſe of the loweſt circumſtances of life, and of the meaneſt abilities and capacities; for in the next verſe he requires a wiſe man for ſuch a buſineſs; but private perſons, laymen, who were not in any office and authority in the church, in diſtinction from paſtors, elders, and rulers, that were in office-power, and high eſteem, whom he would not have troubled with caſes of this nature; but ſhould rather chuſe out from among the laity, perſons of the beſt judgment and capacity, to be umpires and arbitrators in ſuch worldly matters, which do not ſo properly come under the notice and cognizance of ſpiritual guides. The phraſe, to judge, is not in the original text, where it is only καθίζετε, ſet, or put in the chair; but is added in the Vulgate Latin verſion; and to which agree both the Syriac and Arabic verſions; the former reading the words, they that are deſpiſed in the church, ſet for you in judgment; and the latter make them to ſit judges. The Jews, as Dr. Lightfoot obſerves, beſides their great Sanhedrim of ſeventy-one perſons, and that other of twenty-three in their cities of note, and their triumvirate in every ſynagogue, had alſo two ſorts of benches, who judged of leſſer matters; the one was called בית דין של מומחין, the bench of authorized perſons, experienced men, that were approved of, and had their authority from the Sanhedrim; and the other was called בית דין של הדיוטות, the bench of idiots [d], or private perſons, or בית דין שאינן מומחין, the bench of thoſe who were not authorized [e], or had not their authority from the higher courts; but being judged proper perſons, were choſen by the people to arbitrate matters in difference between them; and theſe are the men the Apoſtle means, at leaſt alludes to, before whom he would have theſe cauſes brought.

Ver. 5. I ſpeak to your ſhame, &c.] Not that they did ſet ſuch perſons to judge, but that they did not; and inſtead of ſo doing went to law with their brethren before the unjuſt: is it ſo that there is not a wiſe man among you? this alſo the Apoſtle ſpeaks to their ſhame, who had ſo much gloried in their wiſdom, and boaſted of their parts and abilities to the contempt of others, and even of the Apoſtle himſelf; and yet acted as if there was not a wiſe man among them capable of judging and determining trivial matters, but they muſt carry them before unconverted perſons: no not one that ſhall be able to judge between his brethren? for tho' the above mentioned benches conſiſted of three perſons, yet the contending parties might chuſe one man to be an arbitrator and judge between them. The rule with the Jews was this [f]; "pecuniary judgments are by three, but if he is authorized or approved by the majority, דן אפילו יחידי, he may judge alone. Says R. Nachman, as I judge pecuniary judgments alone; and ſo ſays R. Chaijah, as I judge pecuniary judgments alone."

Ver. 6. But brother goeth to law with brother, &c.] The relation meant is ſpiritual; it was uſual for members of churches to be called brethren, they profeſſing to be born again of the ſame father, and belonging to the ſame family under Chriſt, the Son, firſt-born, and maſter of it; and a very wicked and ſhameful thing it was, that perſons in ſuch a relation, being of ſuch a family, ſhould go to law with one another at all: and that before the unbelievers; which is an aggravation of their ſin and folly. The Apoſtle before calls them unjuſt, now infidels, ſuch as had no faith in Chriſt, diſbelieved the Meſſiah, and denied the whole Goſpel, and therefore no faith or confidence ſhould be put in them; for, generally ſpeaking, ſuch as have no faith, are not only wicked, but unreaſonable men, men of no reaſon, conſcience, juſtice, and equity; and therefore very improper perſons for believers to bring their cauſes before.

Ver. 7. Now therefore there is utterly a fault among you, &c.] Or a defect; a want of brotherly love, or there would be no occaſion to go to law at all; a want of wiſdom and conduct, or proper perſons would be pitched upon, and choſen out from among themſelves to be arbitrators and judge between them; and a want of care among their leaders, who elſe would have pointed out to them ſuch a method of accommodation, and not have ſuffered them to go the lengths they did: becauſe ye go to law one with another; which would never be, was there not a declenſion among you, a decay of your firſt love, and of the power of religion and true godlineſs: why do ye not rather take wrong? why do ye not rather ſuffer yourſelves to be defrauded? than to go to law, eſpecially before unjuſt perſons and unbelievers, taking the advice of Chriſt, Matt. v. 40. It is more adviſeable to a believer to ſuffer wrong than to go to law with any man, and eſpecially with a brother. It is a petition in the Jewiſh liturgy [g], "let it pleaſe thee, O Lord God, and "the God of my fathers, to deliver me this day, and "every day——from hard judgment, and a ſevere "adverſary, בין בן ברית ובין שאינו בן ברית, "whether he be a ſon of the covenant, or whether "he be not a ſon of the covenant."

Ver. 8. Nay, you do wrong and defraud, &c.] So far were they from taking and acting up to the advice given, that inſtead of taking wrong, they did wrong; and inſtead of ſuffering themſelves to be defrauded, they defrauded others: and that your brethren; that were of the ſame faith, of the ſame religion, and in the ſame church and family: in ſhort, neither party, not the plaintiff, nor the defendant, ſought any thing more or leſs than to wrong, trick, and defraud each other; ſuch a ſad corruption and degeneracy prevailed among them: hence the Apoſtle thought to deal plainly and cloſely with them, as in the following verſes.

Ver. 9. Know ye not that the unrighteous ſhall not inherit the kingdom of God, &c.] A way of ſpeaking much like that in the Talmud, הרי יודע שהעולם הבא אינו עשוי אלא לצדיקים, know thou that the world to come is not made but for the righteous [h]. Without a righteouſneſs there will be no entrance into the world of bliſs and happineſs hereafter; and this muſt be a better righteouſneſs than what a ſinful creature is capable of working out, and no other than the righteouſneſs of Chriſt. 'Twas a loſs and want of righteouſneſs that caſt the angels down from heaven, and turn'd Adam out of paradiſe; and whoever of his poſterity are deſtitute of one, will fall ſhort of enjoying the glory of God; for it is not agreeable to the holy nature of God, to his infinite juſtice and righteous law, to admit any into heaven without a righteouſneſs; hence a judgment-ſeat is erected, before which all muſt ſtand; and thoſe that will be found without a righteouſneſs, will be for ever excluded the kingdom of heaven; and could any unrighteous perſons be received there, it would ſpoil the pleaſure and happineſs of the ſaints. Now this is ſaid, partly to diſſuade the Corinthians from going to law with each other before unrighteous perſons, who have no right to the kingdom of God, and living and dying as they are, will have no ſhare in it; and therefore ſince they are not to be fellow-heirs and companions with them in another world, they ſhould not bring their cauſes before them in this; and partly to reprove them for their injurious and unrighteous actions among themſelves, their tricking and defrauding of one another, with other ſins they were guilty of; which, if not repented of, would ſhew, that notwithſtanding their profeſſion, they were deſtitute of the grace of God, were unfit to be in the kingdom of God, in a Goſpel church-ſtate here below, and would be ſhut out of the kingdom of heaven hereafter. Be not deceived; imagining, that through your knowledge and profeſſion, you ſhall be ſaved, live as you will: neither fornicators; ſuch as are guilty of uncleanneſs with perſons in a ſingle ſtate: nor idolaters; who worſhip more gods than one, and not the true God; who do ſervice to them that are not gods, and perform what the Jews call עבודה זרה, ſtrange ſervice; and not only fall down to ſtocks and ſtones, but ſerve divers luſts and pleaſures, the idols of their own hearts: nor adulterers; ſuch as have criminal converſation with perſons in a married ſtate: nor effeminate; or ſoft, or, as the Syriac renders it, מחבלא, corrupters; that is, of themſelves, by voluntary pollution, ſuch as are guilty of the ſin of Onan. Nor abuſers of themſelves with mankind; Sodomites.

Ver. 10. Nor thieves, &c.] Who take away another man's property, ſecretly or openly, by fraud or force. Nor covetous; inſatiable, in the luſt of uncleanneſs; or greedy of worldly gain, bent upon increaſing their ſubſtance at any rate, by circumvention, fraud, and deceit; and do not uſe the things of this life as they ſhould, for their own good, and that of others. Nor drunkards; who are ſtrong to drink ſtrong liquors; who give up themſelves thereunto; who ſit down on purpoſe to intoxicate themſelves, and are frequent in the commiſſion of this ſin. Nor revilers; who are free with other mens characters, load them with reproaches, and take away their good names; either openly or ſecretly, either by tale-bearing, whiſpering, and back-biting, or by raiſing and ſpreading ſcandalous reports in a public manner. Nor extortioners; raviſhers of virgins; or plunderers of mens ſubſtance in an open and forcible way; or who extort unlawful gain: ſhall inherit the kingdom of God; not that theſe ſins, any or all of them, are unpardonable; for ſuch who have been guilty of them, may, thro' the blood of Chriſt, receive the remiſſion of them, and thro' the grace of the Spirit of God, obtain repentance for them, and have both right and meetneſs for the kingdom of heaven, as the following words ſhew.

Ver. 11. And ſuch were ſome of you, &c.] Not all, but ſome of them; and of theſe every one was not guilty of all theſe crimes; but ſome had been guilty of one, and others of another; ſo that they had been all committed by one or another of them. The Corinthians were a people very much given to uncleanneſs and luxury, without meaſure [i], which was the ruin of their ſtate: and among theſe wicked people God had ſome choſen veſſels of ſalvation; who are put in mind of their former ſtate, partly for their preſent humiliation, when they conſidered what they once were, no better than others, but children of wrath, even as others; and partly to obſerve to them, and the more to illuſtrate and magnify the grace of God in their converſion, pardon, juſtification, and ſalvation; as alſo to point out to them the obligations that lay upon them to live otherwiſe now than they formerly did. But ye are waſhed; which is not to be underſtood of external waſhing, of corporal ablution, or of their being baptized in water; ſo they might be, and yet not be cleanſed from their filthineſs, either by original or actual tranſgreſſions; nor of the waſhing of regeneration, which more properly comes under the next head; but of their being waſhed from their ſins by the blood of Chriſt, thro' the application of it to them, for the remiſſion of them; which ſuppoſes them to have been polluted, as they were originally, being conceived in ſin, and ſhapen in iniquity; naturally, for who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? and internally, in heart, mind, and conſcience; alſo univerſally, both as to perſons, and as to the powers and faculties of their ſouls, and members of their bodies; and that they could not waſh and cleanſe themſelves by any ceremonial purifications, moral duties, or evangelical performances; but that this was a bleſſing of grace they enjoyed thro' the blood of Chriſt, by which they were waſhed from their ſins, both in the ſight of God, his juſtice being ſatisfied for them, they were all pardoned and done away, ſo as to be ſeen no more, and they appeared unblameable and irreproveable in his ſight; and alſo in their own apprehenſions, for being convinced of their pollution, and being directed to Chriſt for cleanſing, the Spirit of God, took his blood, and ſprinkled it on their conſciences, to the appeaſement of them, the removal of ſin from thence, and a non-remembrance of it. But ye are ſanctified; which deſigns not their ſanctification by God the Father, which is no other than the eternal ſeparation of them from himſelf, or his everlaſting choice of them to eternal happineſs; nor the ſanctification of them, or the expiation of their ſins by the blood of Chriſt, this is meant in the former clauſe; nor their ſanctification in Chriſt, or the imputation of his holineſs with his obedience and death for their juſtification, which is intended in the following one; but the ſanctification of the Spirit, which lies in a principle of ſpiritual life, infuſed into the ſoul, in a ſpiritual light in the underſtanding, in a flexion of the will to the will of God, both in grace and providence, in a ſettlement of the affections on divine objects, and in an implantation of every grace; which is a gradual work, as yet not perfect, but will be fulfilled in all in whom it is begun. But ye are juſtified; not by the works of the law, but by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt. Juſtified they were from all eternity, as ſoon as Chriſt became a ſurety for them; and ſo they were when he roſe from the dead, who were juſtified as their head and ſurety, and they in him; but here it is to be underſtood of their being juſtified in the court of conſcience, under the witneſſings of the Spirit of God; who having convinced them of the inſufficiency of their own righteouſneſs, and having brought near the righteouſneſs of Chriſt unto them, and wrought faith in them to lay hold on it, pronounced them juſtified perſons in their own conſciences; whence followed joy, peace, and comfort. In the name of the Lord Jeſus; which may refer, as the following clauſe to all that is ſaid before: by the name of the Lord Jeſus may be meant he himſelf; and the ſenſe be, that they were waſhed by his blood, ſanctified by his Spirit, and juſtified by his righteouſneſs; or it may intend the merit and efficacy of Chriſt's blood, ſacrifice, and righteouſneſs; as that their ſins were pardoned, and they cleanſed from them thro' the merit of the blood of Chriſt ſhed for the remiſſion of their ſins; and that they were regenerated and ſanctified thro' the efficacy of Chriſt's reſurrection from the dead; and were juſtified by the grace of God, thro' the redemption that is in Chriſt: or elſe the name of Chriſt may deſign his Goſpel, thro' which they received the knowledge of God's way of pardoning ſinners, and juſtifying them, and the Spirit of God, as a Spirit of regeneration and ſanctification: and by the Spirit of our God; who ſprinkled the blood of Chriſt upon them, to the cleanſing of them; who ſanctified their hearts, and revealed the righteouſneſs of Chriſt unto them for their juſtification, and pronounced the ſentence of it upon them. 'Tis to be obſerved, that all the three perſons, Father, Son, and Spirit, are here mentioned, as being jointly concerned in thoſe acts of grace.

Ver. 12. All things are lawful unto me, &c.] That is, which are of an indifferent nature; otherwiſe every thing is not lawful to be done: but all things are not expedient; when the doing of them deſtroys the peace, comfort, and edification of others; when it ſtumbles and grieves weak minds, and cauſes offence to them; ſee ch. x. 23. all things are lawful for me; which is repeated for the ſake of ſaying the following words: but I will not be brought under the power of any; which would be very inexpedient, ſhould any by the uſe of liberty in things indifferent, on the one hand, offend his brethren, and, on the other, bring himſelf into bondage to thoſe very things he has the free uſe of; and therefore the Apoſtle determines, that theſe ſhall not have the maſtery over him, that he'll uſe them, or not uſe them, at his pleaſure. It is ſomewhat difficult to know what in particular he has reſpect unto, whether to what he had been treating of before, concerning going to law before unbelievers; and his ſenſe be, that however lawful this might be in itſelf, yet was not expedient, ſince it was expoſing of themſelves to ungodly perſons, and a putting themſelves under their power to judge and determine as they pleaſed; or whether to the uſe of meats forbidden under the law, or offered to idols; which tho' in themſelves lawful to be eaten, every creature of God being good, and not to be refuſed and accounted common and unclean; yet it was not expedient to uſe this liberty, if a weak brother ſhould be grieved, or a man himſelf become a ſlave to his appetite.

Ver. 13. Meats for the belly, and the belly for meats, &c.] All ſort of food is appointed and provided to ſatiſfy the appetite and ſtomach, to fill the belly, and nouriſh the body; and the belly, and all the parts thro' which the food paſſes, are purpoſely formed by God for the reception and digeſtion of the food, for its ſecretion, chylification, and nutrition by it, and the ejection of the excrementitious parts. But God ſhall deſtroy both it and them; at death, and in the grave, when the one ſhall be conſumed, and the other be needleſs and uſeleſs; and tho' that part of the body, with the reſt, will be raiſed at the laſt day, ſince the body will be raiſed perfect, conſiſting of all its parts; yet there will be no appetite, no deſire in the ſtomach after meats, no need of them to fill the belly, and ſo no uſe of theſe parts for ſuch purpoſes as they now are; for the children of the reſurrection will be like the angels, and ſtand in no need of eating and drinking. Now the body is not for fornication. Tho' meats are appointed for the belly, and the belly for them, and this and the other ſort of meats are of an indifferent kind, which may or may not be uſed; yet this cannot be ſaid of fornication, which the Corinthians, and other Gentiles, took to be equally indifferent as meats; but the Apoſtle ſhews there is not the ſame reaſon for the one as the other. The body was not originally made and appointed for fornication; this is quite beſides the will of God, who has provided marriage as a remedy againſt it: but for the Lord; for Jeſus Chriſt, for whom a body was prepared in God's council and covenant; and for the ſake of which, and after the exemplar of it in God's eternal mind, the body of man was firſt formed; and which was alſo made, as after the image, ſo for the glory of Chriſt, to be a member of his, to be redeemed by him, and to ſerve him in, in righteouſneſs and holineſs, and at laſt to be raiſed by him, and made like to his glorious body at the great day. And the Lord for the body; he was pre-ordained in the council of God, and provided in the covenant of grace, and ſent in the fulneſs of time to be a redeemer and ſaviour of the body, as well as the ſoul; to be a ſanctifier of it, and the raiſer of it up from the dead in the reſurrection; all which are ſo many arguments to diſſuade from the ſin of fornication.

Ver. 14. And God hath both raiſed up the Lord, &c.] God the Father has raiſed up from the dead the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, tho' not excluſive of the Son, who was equally concerned in the reſurrection of himſelf, whereby he demonſtrated himſelf to be the Son of God, truly and properly God. And will alſo raiſe up us by his own power; for the reſurrection of the dead, whether of Chriſt, or of his people, is an act of power, of God's own power, even of his almighty power, and is what the power of a mere creature could never effect. Now as Chriſt, the head, is raiſed, ſo ſhall all his members by the ſame power; their bodies will be raiſed powerful, glorious, incorruptible, and ſpiritual; an argument that they were never made for fornication, nor to be defiled with ſuch uncleanneſs.

Ver. 15. Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Chriſt, &c.] The whole perſons of God's elect were choſen in Chriſt, and given to him, and made one with him, their bodies as well as their ſouls; and both are redeemed by him, and in union with him, are members of his body, of his fleſh, and of his bones: ſhall I then take the members of Chriſt, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid. Signifying, that it is a moſt abſurd, indecent, abominable, and deteſtable thing, that the bodies of the ſaints, which are the members of Chriſt, ſhould be joined in carnal copulation with an harlot.

Ver. 16. What know ye not that he which is joined to an harlot, &c.] Not in marriage, but in carnal copulation, and unclean embraces, is one body with her; for two (ſaith he, Adam, or Moſes, or God or the ſcripture, or as R. Sol. Jarchi ſays, the holy Spirit, Gen. ii. 24.) ſhall be one fleſh; what is originally ſaid of copulation in lawful marriage, in which man and wife legally coupled together, become one fleſh, is applied to the unlawful copulation of a man with an harlot, by which act they alſo become one body, one fleſh; and which is made uſe of by the Apoſtle, to deter the members of Chriſt from the commiſſion of this ſin, which makes a member of Chriſt one body and fleſh with an harlot, than which nothing is more monſtrous and deteſtable. The Apoſtle here directs to the true ſenſe of the phraſe in Geneſis, and they ſhall be one fleſh; that is, man and wife ſhall only have carnal knowledge of, and copulation with each other. Some Jewiſh [k] writers interpret this phraſe, מצד הולד, on account of the fœtus, which is formed by the means of them both, and which becomes their one fleſh; others [l], thus, as if they were, or becauſe they are, like as if they were one fleſh; but others [m] in more agreement with the Apoſtle, think that this has reſpect אל התבור, to that conjunction, by which the fixing of the ſpecies is compleated; and others [n] expreſly thus, they two ſhall be one fleſh, למקום ששניהם עושים בשר אחד, that is, in the place where both of them make one fleſh; which is equally done by unlawful copulation with an harlot, as with a man's own wife.

Ver. 17. He that is joined unto the Lord, &c.] As every elect perſon is; his whole perſon, ſoul and body is united to the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, to his whole perſon, as God-man and mediator; even as Adam and Eve, whoſe marriage was a repreſentation of the marriage between Chriſt and his church, were perſonally united, and were called by the ſame name; and as the whole human nature of Chriſt, conſiſting of a true body and a reaſonable ſoul, was united to the perſon of the Son of God; and as appears from the influence that union with Chriſt has upon the redemption, ſanctification, and reſurrection of the body. The ground, foundation, and bond of which union is, not the ſpirit on Chriſt's part; for the Spirit being received as a Spirit of regeneration, ſanctification, &c. is a fruit of union to Chriſt, and an evidence of it; nor faith on our part, which as a grace is not ours, but the gift of God, and is a fruit of union; nor is it of an uniting nature, but is a grace of communion; and the foundation of all its acts, as ſeeing Chriſt, going to him, receiving of him, walking on in him, &c. is a previous union to Chriſt; but it is the everlaſting and unchangeable love of Chriſt to them, ſhewn in his choice of them, in his covenant with his father on their behalf, in his engaging for them as a ſurety, in aſſuming their nature, and acting both in time and eternity, as the repreſentative of them, which is the bond and cement of their union, and from which there can be no ſeparation. This union is firſt diſcovered in effectual vocation, and will be more manifeſt hereafter. Now he that is in this ſenſe united to Chriſt, is one ſpirit; for this union is a ſpiritual one; it is compleat and perfect; near and indiſſoluble; by virtue and in conſequence of it, God's choſen ones come to have and enjoy the ſame ſpirit in meaſure, which Chriſt their head and mediator has without meaſure: hence they have the Spirit of God, as a Spirit of illumination and converſion, of faith and holineſs, of adoption, and as the earneſt, pledge and ſeal of their future glory. And ſince ſo it is, fornication which makes them one fleſh with an harlot, ought ſtudiouſly to be abſtained from.

Ver. 18. Flee fornication, &c.] As that which is hurtful, ſcandalous, and unbecoming chriſtians; avoid it, and all the occaſions of it, that may lead unto it, and be incentives of it: every ſin that a man doth is without the body; not but that other ſins are committed by the body, and by the members of it as inſtruments; but they are generally committed by the abuſe of other things, that are without, and don't belong to the body; and ſo don't bring that hurt unto and reproach upon the body, as fornication does: but he that committeth fornication, ſinneth againſt his own body; not meaning his wife, which is as his own body; but his proper natural body, which is not only the inſtrument by which this ſin is committed, but the object againſt which it is committed; and which is defiled and diſhonoured by it; and ſometimes its ſtrength and health are impaired, and it is filled with nauſeous diſeaſes hereby.

Ver. 19. What know ye not, that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghoſt, &c.] What is ſaid in chap. iii. 16, 17. of the ſaints in general, is here ſaid of their bodies in particular. The holy Spirit in regeneration and ſanctification, when he begins the good work of grace on a man, takes poſſeſſion of his whole perſon, ſoul and body, and dwells therein as in his temple. So the Jews[o] call the body of a righteous man, משכן, the habitation of the holy Spirit. Now it is moſt abominably ſcandalous and ſhameful, that that body which is the dwelling-place of the holy Spirit, which is ſacred to him as a temple, ſhould be defiled by the ſin of fornication: 'tis added, which is in you, which ye have of God; meaning the holy Spirit which was in them, as in his temple; which dwelt in their hearts, and influenced their bodies, lives, and converſations; and which they received of God as a wonderful inſtance of his grace and love to them; that he ſhould be beſtowed upon them, to regenerate, renew and ſanctify them, to implant every grace, to make them a fit habitation for God, and meet for the inheritance of the ſaints in light: and ye are not your own; their own maſters, at their own diſpoſe, to live to their own luſts, or the luſts of men; men have not power over their bodies to abuſe them at pleaſure by fornication, or ſuch like uncleanneſs, neither ſingle nor married perſons; ſee chap. vii. 4. and of all men, not the ſaints, who are neither their own nor other mens, nor ſatan's, but God's; not only by creation, but by choice and covenant; and Chriſt's by gift, by purchaſe, and powerful grace, and in a conjugal relation to him; wherefore fornication ill becomes them.

Ver. 20. For ye are bought with a price, &c.] Not with gold and ſilver, but with the precious blood of Chriſt, as the whole church, and all the elect of God are. This proves them to be the Lord's, not only his redeemed ones, being ranſomed by a price from the bondage of the law, ſin, ſatan, and the world; but his eſpouſed ones, and which is chiefly deſigned here; for one way of obtaining and eſpouſing a wife among the Jews, was by a price[p]; "a woman they ſay, is obtained or "eſpouſed three ways; בכסף, by ſilver, by a writ-"ing, and by lying with; by ſilver, the houſe of "Shammai ſay, by a penny, and the value of a "penny; the houſe of Hillel ſay, by a pruta, and "the value of a pruta; how much is a pruta? "the eighth part of an Italian farthing." That is, be it ever ſo ſmall a price, yet if given and taken on the account of eſpouſals, it made them valid; and it was an ancient rite in marriage uſed among other nations[q], for huſband and wife to buy each other: Chriſt indeed, did not purchaſe his church to be his ſpouſe, but becauſe ſhe was ſo; but then his purchaſing of her with his blood, more clearly demonſtrated and confirmed his right unto her, as his ſpouſe; he betrothed her to himſelf in eternity, in the everlaſting covenant of grace; but ſhe with the reſt of the individuals of human nature, fell into ſin, and ſo under the ſentence of the law, into the hands of ſatan, and the captivity of the world; to redeem her from whence, and by ſo doing to own and declare her his ſpouſe, and his great love to her, he gave himſelf a ranſom-price for her; which lays her under the greateſt obligation, to preſerve an inviolable chaſtity to him, and to love and honour him. Therefore glorify God, in your body and in your ſpirit, which are God's; by God is here meant, more eſpecially the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by the price of whoſe blood, the bodies and ſouls of his people are bought, which lays the obligation on them, to glorify him in and with both; and contains a very conſiderable proof of the deity of Chriſt; who is glorified, when all the perfections of the divine nature are aſcribed to him; when the whole of ſalvation is attributed to him, and he is looked unto, received, truſted in and depended on as a ſaviour, and praiſe and thanks are given unto him on that account; and when his Goſpel is embraced and profeſſed, and walked worthy of, and his ordinances ſubmitted to, and his commandments kept in love to him: and he is to be glorified both in body and ſpirit; in body, by an outward attendance on his worſhip, and a becoming external converſation; by confeſſing and ſpeaking well of him; by acting for him, laying out and uſing time, ſtrength and ſubſtance for his honour and intereſt; and by patient ſuffering for his name ſake: in ſpirit, which is done when the heart or ſpirit is given up to him, and is engaged in his ſervice, and when his glory lies near unto it: the reaſon enforcing all this, is becauſe both are his; not only by creation, but by his father's gift of both unto him; by his eſpouſal of their whole perſons to himſelf; and by his redemption of both ſoul and body from deſtruction: the Vulgate Latin verſion reads, bear or carry God in your body, and leaves out the next words, and in your ſpirit, which are God's; and which alſo are left out in the Ethiopic and in the Alexandrian copy, and ſome others.

CHAP. VII.

IN this chapter various caſes concerning marriage being propoſed to the Apoſtle, are anſwered by him; and he diſcourſes of the nature, uſe, and end of marriage, and of the duties of married perſons to one another; and gives advice to ſuch as were unmarried, and points at the advantages of a ſingle ſtate, where it can be continued in without danger. Some of the Corinthians having written to him upon theſe heads, he returns for anſwer in general, that abſtinence from marriage was moſt adviſeable; that is, at that time of perſecution, and by thoſe who had the gift of continence, and for reaſons after mentioned, ver. 1. tho' in order to avoid fornication, it was abſolutely neceſſary for ſuch who had not that gift to enter into it, and act agreeably thereunto, ver. 2. and therefore adviſes both parties in ſuch a ſtate to yield due benevolence to each other, ver. 3. giving this as a reaſon for it, that neither of them had power over their own bodies, but over each others, ver. 4. wherefore abſtinence from the marriage-bed ought not to be but with the following limitations; that it be by mutual agreement, and only for a time, and that only for the ſake of devotion; but that they come together again, leſt ſatan ſhould take an advantage of their incontinency, and tempt them to evil, ver. 5. tho' in all this the Apoſtle would be underſtood to ſpeak, not in an authoritative, but in a permiſſive way, and rather by way of counſel than of command, ver. 6. and expreſſes his hearty wiſh, that every one was, and would continue in a ſingle ſtate, as he himſelf; tho' he corrects himſelf by obſerving, that it was not the pleaſure of God to beſtow the gift of continency on every one, and therefore ſuggeſts, that it was right for every one to act according to the gift he had received, ver. 7. and then addreſſes perſons in a ſingle ſtate, whether they had ever been married or not, and adviſes them ſo to abide, partly by his own example, and partly by the profitableneſs of it, ver. 8. but if they had not the gift of continency, his counſel is, that they enter into a marriage-ſtate, giving this reaſon for it, that it is better to enter into ſuch a ſtate than to be inflamed with luſt, ver. 9. and then he directs himſelf to married perſons; and theſe he commands, not in his own name, but in the name of the Lord, to live together; and particularly, that the wife ſhould not leave her huſband for any trivial matter, or on account of any difference that might ariſe between them, ver. 10. and that if ſhe ſo did, ſhe ought to remain unmarried, or ſeek to be reconciled to her huſband, and come to him again; and, on the other hand, the huſband ought not to divorce his wife, unleſs in caſe of adultery, and wilful, obſtinate deſertion, ver. 11. And as to another caſe of conſcience which was moved unto him, whether a believer, having married an unbeliever, ſhould live together; he anſwers, that if a chriſtian brother had married an unbelieving wife, and ſhe thought fit to continue with him, he ſhould not put her away, ver. 12. And ſo a chriſtian woman that had married an unbelieving huſband, if it was his pleaſure to dwell with her, ſhe ought not to forſake him, ver. 13. giving this reaſon for it, becauſe they were legally married to each other, or otherwiſe their children muſt be reckoned baſtards; whereas by maintaining the validity of their marriage, and abiding by it, they would appear to be legitimate, ver. 14. but if the unbeliever, whether man or woman, thinks fits to deſert the believing wife or huſband, ſo be it, the party deſerted may make themſelves eaſy, nor are they under obligation to remain unmarried: however, as they are called to peace they ought to ſeek it, and endeavour to live quietly together, ver. 15. and that for this reaſon, becauſe they may be the means of the converſion, and ſo of the ſalvation of the unbelieving party, ver. 16. hence the Apoſtle takes an occaſion to exhort every man in general to walk and abide in the calling wherein he is called, this being an order he had given to all the churches, ver. 17. and which he exemplifies by particular inſtances, as that thoſe who are called in circumciſion, or in uncircumciſion, ſhould abide ſo, ver. 18. becauſe theſe are nothing, or indifferent things, which may be, or may not be, but keeping the commandments is binding, and not to be diſpenſed with, ver. 19. wherefore the general rule is repeated, that it might be the more regarded and obſerved, ver. 20. And another inſtance given, illuſtrating it, as that if a man is called while a ſervant, he ſhould make himſelf eaſy, and continue ſo; though if he can have his freedom it is moſt eligible, ver. 21. The reaſon perſuading him to be ſatisfied with his condition, is, becauſe he that is called by grace, tho' a ſervant in a civil ſenſe, is the Lord's freeman in a ſpiritual ſenſe; and, on the other hand, he who is free in a civil ſenſe when called, is in a ſpiritual ſenſe a ſervant of Chriſt, ver. 22. as clearly appears by his being bought with the price of his blood; and therefore neither one nor the other ſhould be ſervants of men in matters of religion, ver. 23. Wherefore, as before, it becomes every man to abide in the ſtation in which he is called, until it pleaſe God in his providence to change his ſituation, ver. 24. After this the Apoſtle returns to his former ſubject about marriage, and addreſſes the virgins particularly, concerning whom he declares he had no expreſs commandment from the Lord, but however was willing to give his judgment and advice, with all ſincerity and uprightneſs, as one that had the honour to be counted faithful by the Lord himſelf, ver. 25. and his judgment was, that conſidering the preſent perſecution of the churches of Chriſt, it was better for ſingle perſons, men or women, to remain ſo, ver. 26. tho' he adviſes thoſe that were married by no means to deſert one another, or ſeek to diſſolve the marriage-bond; as, on the other hand, thoſe that were free from it, he would not have them ſeek out for a wife, ver. 27. tho' ſhould they, it would not be criminal in them; and whether young men or maidens, it was not unlawful for them to marry, only it was not ſo convenient for the preſent; and ſuch therefore muſt expect trouble in the world, ver. 28. However, it was proper, ſince time was ſhort, and every worldly enjoyment was fading and periſhing, that care be taken that there be no abuſe of any, in whatſoever ſtate and condition, or circumſtance men were in; neither to be too much depreſſed with afflictive providences, nor too much elated with proſperous ones; and by no means to indulge to laſciviouſneſs and luxury, ver. 29, 30, 31. And whereas the married life is a careful one, and the Apoſtle was deſirous the perſons he writes to ſhould be without any diſtreſſing care, he adviſed ſo ſtrongly as he did to a ſingle ſtate; and in order to perſuade to it, he puts the difference between an unmarried and a married man, who tho' they both had their cares, yet about different things; the former about divine and religious things, in order to pleaſe the Lord; the latter about worldly things, in order to pleaſe his wife, ver. 32, 33. And juſt the like difference he obſerves there is between a wife and a virgin; the virgin, ſhe is concerned about and taken up in religious matters, that ſhe may increaſe in holineſs, both inward and outward; and the wife is engaged in worldly and domeſtic affairs, which engroſs her thoughts and time, in order to pleaſe her huſband, ver. 34. wherefore the advice he had given to continue ſingle, was manifeſtly for the profit and advantage of ſuch perſons in ſpiritual things; tho' he gave it with no deſign to enſnare any, who had not the gift of continence, but adviſed to it, when it could be done, in a comely manner, and that they might attend upon the worſhip of God, without diſtraction by worldly cares for their families, ver. 35. but in caſe, when a virgin is ripe for marriage, and there is a neceſſity for it, it is by no means adviſeable in parents to behave uncomely to her, and refuſe to marry her, and ſo deprive her of the remedy againſt incontinence; when ſuch is the caſe, ſhe ought to marry, that being not ſinful, yea it would be ſinful to do otherwiſe, ver. 36. yet where there is no neceſſity, where perſons have the gift of continency, are ſtedfaſtly determined not to marry, but to keep their virginity, this is commendable, as well as profitable, ver. 37. whence this concluſion is drawn, that they that marry do well, rather than burn in luſt, or commit ſin, but they that do not marry, having the gift of continency, do better, both for themſelves, and for the Lord, ver. 38. And whereas whilſt an huſband is living, the wife is bound by law to continue with him; and when he is dead, ſhe may marry whom ſhe will, ſo be it ſhe ſeeks the Lord, and has his glory in view, ver. 39. yet in the judgment of the Apoſtle ſhe would be a much more happy perſon ſhould ſhe continue a widow; and this was not only his own private judgment, but he had reaſon to believe it was according to the mind of the Spirit of God, ver. 40.

Ver. 1. Now concerning the things whereof ye wrote unto me, &c.] Tho' the falſe Apoſtles had greatly influenced the members of this church, yet there were many among them that had a very great reſpect for the Apoſtle, and kept up a correſpondence with him, tho' at a diſtance from him, by writing; in which way they informed him of their doubts and difficulties, that aroſe in their minds about certain things, and deſired his judgment in them, to which they paid a very great deference. The things they wrote to him about, here referred to, may be collected from the contents of this chapter, and ſome others following; as whether a chriſtian man ought not to abſtain from the uſe of women; whether a believer ought to live with an unbelieving yoke-fellow; whether ſuch as had been circumciſed ſhould not make uſe of ſome methods to draw on the fore-ſkin of their fleſh; whether apprentices, who were called by the grace of God, ought to ſerve out their time with their maſters; and concerning celibacy or virginity, the eating of things offered to idols, and the maintenance of miniſters: and he begins with the firſt; to which he anſwers, it is good for a man not to touch a woman; which is to be underſtood, not of merely touching a woman, which can neither be criminal, nor in all caſes inexpedient, or be attended with any ill, or dangerous conſequences; nor of the matrimonial contract, which is lawful and honourable; but of the act of carnal copulation with a woman: in this ſenſe the Jews uſe the phraſe, "there are three " they ſay [r], that fled from tranſgreſſion, and the " bleſſed God joined his name with them; and " they are theſe, Joſeph, and Jael, and Phalti. " Joſeph, as appears from what is ſaid, Pſal. lxxxi. 5. " a teſtimony in Joſeph is his name; what is the " meaning of the phraſe in Joſeph? this teſtifies " concerning him, שלא נגע באשה פוטיפר, that " he did not touch Potiphar's wife, (i. e. he did not " lie with her;) Jael, as is clear from what is ſaid, " Judges iv. 18. and Jael went forth to meet Siſera " and ſhe covered him with a mantle; what is the " meaning of the phraſe, בשמיכה? (which is " rendered, with a mantle) our Rabbins here (in " Babylon) ſay with a linnen cloth; but our Rabbins " there (in the land of Iſrael) ſay with bed-cloaths; " ſays Reſh Lekiſh, if we run over the whole ſcripture, we ſhall not find any houſhold goods ſo called; " wherefore what is it? it is all one as שמי כה, my " name is thus; and the meaning is, my name witneſſes concerning her, שלא נגע בה אותו רשע, " that that wicked one (Siſera) did not touch her [s]; " (i. e. had not carnal knowledge of her;) Phalti, " as is evident from hence, one ſcripture ſays, " and Saul gave Michah his daughter to Phalti, " 1 Sam. xxv. 44. and another ſcripture ſays Phaltiel; ſometimes he is called Phalti, and ſometimes he is called Phaltiel; who takes Phalti? " and who gives Phaltiel? but I teſtify concerning " him, שלא נגע באשת דוד, that he did not touch " David's wife; (i. e. did not lie with her;") ſee Gen. xx. 6. And in this ſenſe alſo is the word touch uſed, both by Greek and Latin authors. The Apoſtle's meaning is not that it is unlawful to marry, or that it is ſinful to lie with a woman in lawful wedlock; but that it is much better, and more expedient on ſeveral accounts, to abſtain from the uſe of women, when perſons have the gift of continency.

Ver. 2. Nevertheleſs, to avoid fornication, &c.] Or fornications; meaning either the frequent commiſſion of that ſin; or all ſorts of uncleanneſs and pollution, which may be avoided by wedlock, and the proper uſe of the marriage-bed, where the gift of continency is not beſtowed: wherefore to prevent unlawful copulations, as of ſingle perſons with one another, or of a married perſon with a ſingle one, the Apoſtle adviſes, as being what is right and proper, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own huſband; that is, let every man that has a wife enjoy her, and make uſe of her, and let every woman that has an huſband, receive him into her embraces; for theſe words are not to be underſtood of unmarried perſons entring into a marriage-ſtate, for the words ſuppoſe them in ſuch a ſtate, but of the proper uſe of the marriage-bed; and teach us that marriage, and the uſe of it, are proper remedies againſt fornication; and that carnal copulation of a man with a woman, ought only to be of huſband and wife, or of perſons in a married ſtate; and that all other copulations are ſinful; and that polygamy is unlawful; and that one man is to have but one wife, and to keep to her; and that one woman is to have but one huſband, and to keep to him.

Ver. 3. Let the huſband render unto the wife due benevolence, &c.] The Syriac verſion renders it, חובא דמתתחיב, due love; and ſo the Arabic; and may include all the offices of love, tenderneſs, humanity, care, proviſion, and protection, which are to be performed by the huſband to his wife; tho' it ſeems chiefly, if not ſolely, here to reſpect what is called, ענתה, Exod. xxi. 10. her marriage duty, as diſtinct from food and raiment to be allowed her; and what is meant by it, the Jewiſh doctors will tell us: one ſays [t], 'tis תשמיש המטה, the uſe of the marriage-bed; and, ſays another [u], לבא עליה, it is to lie with her, according to the way of all the earth. And ſo the phraſe here, due benevolence, is an Euphemiſm, and deſigns the act of coition; which as it is an act of love and affection, a ſign of mutual benevolence, ſo of juſtice; it is a due debt from divine ordination, and the matrimonial contract. The Jewiſh doctors have fixed and ſettled various canons [w] concerning the performance of this conjugal debt; and the Apoſtle may not be altogether without ſome view to the rules and cuſtoms which obtained in his own nation. And likewiſe alſo the wife unto the huſband; ſhe is not to refuſe the uſe of the bed when required, unleſs there is ſome juſt impediment, otherwiſe ſhe comes under the name of מורדת, a rebellious wife; concerning whom, and her puniſhment, the Jews [x] give the following rules: "a woman that " reſtrains her huſband from the uſe of the bed, is " called rebellious; and when they aſk her why " ſhe rebels, if ſhe ſays, becauſe it is loathſome to " me, and I can't lie with him; then they oblige “ him to put her away directly, without her “ dowry; and ſhe may not take any thing of her “ huſband's, not even her ſhoe-ſtrings, nor her hair-“ lace; but what her huſband did not give her “ ſhe may take, and go away: and if ſhe rebels “ againſt her huſband, on purpoſe to afflict him, “ and ſhe does to him ſo or ſo, and deſpiſes him, “ they ſend to her from the Sanhedrim, and ſay to “ her, know thou, that if thou continueſt in thy “ rebellion, thou ſhalt not proſper; and after that “ they publiſh her in the ſynagogues and ſchools “ four weeks, one after another, and ſay, ſuch an “ one has rebelled againſt her huſband; and after “ the publication, they ſend and ſay to her, if thou “ continueſt in thy rebellion, thou wilt loſe thy “ dowry; and they appoint her twelve months, “ and ſhe has no ſuſtenance from her huſband all “ that time; and ſhe goes out at the end of twelve “ months without her dowry, and returns every “ thing that is her huſband's.” This account, with a little variation, is alſo given by Maimonides [y].

Ver. 4. The wife hath not power of her own body, &c.] To refrain the uſe of it from her huſband; or to proſtitute it to another man: but the huſband; he has the ſole power over it, and may require when he pleaſes the uſe of it: and likewiſe alſo the huſband has not power over his own body; to withhold due benevolence, or the conjugal debt from his wife; or abuſe it by ſelf-pollution, fornication, adultery, ſodomy, or any acts of uncleanneſs: but the wife; ſhe only has a power over it, a right to it, and may claim the uſe of it: this power over each other's bodies is not ſuch, as that they may by conſent, either the huſband allow the wife, or the wife the huſband, to lie with another.

Ver. 5. Defraud ye not one the other, &c.] By withholding due benevolence, denying the uſe of the marriage-bed, refuſing to pay the conjugal debt, and which is called a diminiſhing of her marriage duty, Exod. xxi. 10. where the Septuagint uſe the ſame word defraud, as the Apoſtle does here; 'tis what both have a right to, and therefore if either party is denied, it is a piece of injuſtice, it is properly a defrauding; though with proper conditions, ſuch as follow, it may be lawful for married perſons to lie apart, and abſtain from the uſe of the bed, but then it ſhould never be done, except it be with conſent: becauſe they have a mutual power over each other's bodies, and therefore the abſtinence muſt be voluntary on each ſide; otherwiſe injury is done to the perſon that does not conſent, who is deprived againſt will of juſt right; but if there is an agreement, then there's no defrauding, becauſe each give up their right; and ſuch a voluntary abſtinence is commended by the Jews [z]; “ every one that leſſens the uſe of the bed, lo, he “ is praiſe worthy; and he who does not make “ void, or cauſe to ceaſe the due benevolence, but, “ מדעת אשתו, by conſent of his wife;” i. e. he alſo is praiſe-worthy: another condition of this abſtinence is, that it be only for a time; which ſhall be agreed unto, and fixed by both parties; not for ever, which would be contrary to the will of God, the inſtitution and end of marriage, and of dangerous conſequence to either party. The Jews allow of a vow of continency for a while, and which they limit to different perſons; thus [a], “ if a man “ by a vow excludes his wife from the uſe of the “ bed, the ſchool of Shammai ſay it is for the “ ſpace of two weeks, the ſchool of Hillell ſay one “ week; ſcholars go out to learn the law, without “ leave of their wives thirty days, workmen one “ week;” which vow for ſuch a limited time, they ſeem to allow of, without mutual conſent; and herein they diſagree with the rule the Apoſtle gives; and who further obſerves, the end to be had in view by ſuch a voluntary ſeparation for a time, that ye may give yourſelves to faſting and prayer; not that this was neceſſary for the ordinary diſcharge of ſuch ſervice, as for private acts of devotion among themſelves, and conſtant family prayer; but either when times of faſting and prayer on ſome emergent occaſions were appointed by themſelves, or by the church, or by the civil government on account of ſome extraordinary and momentous affairs; and this ſeems to be obſerved by the Apoſtle, in agreement with the cuſtoms and rules of the Jewiſh nation, which forbid the uſe of the bed, as on their great and annual faſt, the day of atonement [b], ſo on their faſts appointed by the Sanhedrim for obtaining of rain [c]: the word faſting is omitted in the Vulgate Latin, and Ethiopic verſion, and ſo it is in the Alexandrian copy, two of Stephens's, and others: the Apoſtle adds, and come together again; to the ſame bed, and the uſe of it, and that for this reaſon, that ſatan tempt you not for your incontinence; for not having the gift of continency, ſhould they pretend to keep apart long: ſatan, who knows the temperament and diſpoſition of men and women, may tempt them not only to hatred of, and quarrels with one another, but to impure luſts and deſires, to fornication, adultery, and all uncleanneſs; a very good reaſon why, though abſtinence from the marriage-bed for a ſhort time, by the conſent of both parties, for religious purpoſes, may be lawful, yet ought not to be continued; ſince ſatan may hereby get an advantage over them, and draw them into the commiſſion of ſcandalous enormities. The Jews have a notion of ſatan's being a tempter, and of his tempting men to various ſins, which they ſhould guard againſt, as idolatry, &c. So ſay they [d], “ thou mayeſt not look after idolatry, according “ to Deut. iv. 19. ——— and again, thou muſt “ take heed leſt this be a cauſe of it to thee, “ ושטן יסית אותך, and ſatan tempt thee to look “ after them, and do as they do:” and again [e], “ frequently ſhould a man think upon the unity “ of the bleſſed God, leſt there ſhould be any thing “ above or below, before him or behind him, or “ by him, and ſo, השטן מסיתו, ſatan tempt him, “ and he come into hereſy.”

Ver. 6. But I ſpeak this by permiſſion, &c.] Referring either to what he had ſaid before, though not to all; not to ver. 2. that for the avoiding of fornication, every man ſhould make uſe of his own wife, and every woman of her own huſband; ſince this is not by permiſſion, but by command, Gen. ii. 24. that carnal copulation ſhould be between one man and one woman in a married ſtate; nor to ver. 3, 4. for that married perſons ought to render due benevolence to, and not defraud each other, having a power over each others bodies, is a precept, and not a permiſſion, Exod. xxi. 10. but to ver. 5. their parting for a time, and coming together again: it is not an abſolute command of God that they ſhould ſeparate for a time, on account of faſting and prayer, but if they thought fit to do ſo by agreement, they might; nor was there any poſitive precept for their coming together again directly, after ſuch ſervice was over. The Apoſtle ſaid this, not of commandment; but conſulting their good gives this advice, leſt ſatan ſhould be buſy with them, and draw them into ſin; but if they had the gift of continence, they might continue apart longer; there was no preciſe time fixed by God, nor did the Apoſtle pretend to fix any: or it may refer to what follows after, that he would have all men be as he was; though he laid no injunction, but left them to their liberty; unleſs it can be thought to regard marriage in general, and to be ſaid in oppoſition to a Jewiſh notion, which makes marriage, מצוה, a command; "a man, they ſay [f], is bound "to this command at ſeventeen years of age, and "if he paſſes twenty and does not marry, he "tranſgreſſes, and makes void an affirmative pre"cept;" but the Apoſtle puts it as a matter of choice, and not of obligation.

Ver. 7. For I would that all men were even as I myſelf, &c.] The Apoſtle ſpeaks not of his ſtate and condition, as married or unmarried, for 'tis not certain which he was; ſome think he had a wife, others not: it looks however as if he had not at this time, as appears from ver. 8. but be it which it will, it can hardly be thought he ſhould wiſh all men to be in either ſtate, either all married, or all unmarried; but he ſpeaks of the gift of continency, which he had, as the following words ſhew; and this he deſires for all men, that they might not be in any danger from ſatan's temptations, and that they might be more fit for, and intent upon the ſervice of Chriſt. The Syriac verſion adds, ברכיותא, in purity, or chaſtity; which may be preſerved in a marriage ſtate, as well as in ſingle life: but every man hath his proper gift of God, one after this manner, and another after that; all the gifts of nature and grace which men have, they have of God, and not of themſelves; and every man has a gift proper to himſelf; no one man has all gifts, but ſome one, and ſome another; and with reſpect to the caſe in hand, one man has the gift of continency, another the gift of marriage; all can't contain themſelves, only to whom it is given: and all are not diſpoſed to marriage; ſome are inclined to a ſingle life, and ſome to a marriage ſtate; and of thoſe that are married, ſome can abſtain from the uſe of the marriage-bed longer than others, without being in danger of being tempted by ſatan for their incontinency; and ſuch a diſpoſition is deſirable.

Ver. 8. I ſay therefore to the unmarried and widows, &c.] Not by way of command, but advice: by the unmarried he means, either ſuch men who never were in a married ſtate, or elſe ſuch who had been married, but their wives were dead; which latter ſenſe ſeems more agreeable, ſince they are joined with widows, who had loſt their huſbands: it is good for them if they abide; unmarried, and don't change their condition any more; not that it was ſinful to marry again, for he allows of it in the next verſe, in caſe they have not the gift of continence; and therefore good here, is not oppoſed to evil, only ſignifies that it would be better for them, more expedient and profitable for them; they would be more free from the cares of life, have leſs trouble, and be more at leiſure to ſerve the Lord; and which he knew by experience, and therefore propoſes himſelf as an example: even as I; that is, as he was then; for at that time it ſeems certain, that he had no wife; though whether he had had one, and ſhe was now dead, or whether he had never been married, may be matter of diſpute; the former ſeems moſt agreeable, ſince he propoſes himſelf as an example to widowers and widows; and having known what a married and ſingle ſtate both were, was better able to give his judgment of both, and proper advice to ſuch perſons; which muſt come with more force and ſtrength, and a better grace from ſuch an one.

Ver. 9. But if they cannot contain, &c.] Or if they do not contain, as the words may be rendered, and as almoſt all verſions do render them; if they have not the gift of continency; if they are not willing, and don't think fit to contain, for none are to be compelled; if either therefore they want a will or power to contain, let them marry; it is not only lawful for them to marry, but it is right and beſt for them; hence it appears, that ſecond marriages are lawful, which were condemned by ſome of the ancients: for it is better to marry, than to burn; or be burnt; not with material fire, as Judah ordered Tamar to be brought forth and burnt with, for whoredom; nor with hell-fire, the juſt demerit of uncleanneſs; but with the fire of luſt itſelf; and ſo the Syriac verſion reads it, it is better to marry than to be burnt, ברגתא, with luſt; when perſons not only find in them ſome luſtful motions and deſires, and a glowing heat of concupiſcence; but are as it were all on fire with the luſts of the fleſh, and in great danger of being drawn into the commiſſion of fornication, adultery, or other pollutions, and even unnatural luſts; it is much better to enter into a marriage-ſtate, though it may have its cares, inconveniencies, and difficulties, than to be under temptations and inclinations to ſuch defilements: ſo the Jews often expreſs the luſt of concupiſcence by fire; they tell [g] us a "ſtory of R. Amram, that "he redeemed all the captives, men and women; "and the women and the virgins dwelt in a cham"ber in his houſe alone; one time ſatan kindled "in him, אש התאוה, the fire of luſt, and he ſet "a ladder to go up to them, and when he came "upon the ſteps of the ladder, he began to cry with "a loud voice, נורא בי עמרם נורא בי עמרם, "fire in the houſe of Amram, fire in the houſe of "Amram; and the men came to quench the fire, "and found nothing burning; for it was only his "intention to cauſe to ceaſe from him the fire of "luſt; and his thought ceaſed, and his mind grew "cool; and they aſked him, why he mocked "them? he replied, for this is a greater fire, than "all the fires in the world, for it is the fire of "hell:" this ſtory is alſo told in the Talmud [h], with ſome little variation: ſo we read of one that is אתלהיט ביצר רע, enflamed [i], or all on fire with the corruption of nature, who does not direct his heart to God: and ſuch a man that finds his corruptions prevail over him, he ought to marry, they ſay [k], as a proper remedy againſt it: "he whoſe mind "is intent upon the law continually, and learns it "as Ben Azzai, and cleaves to it all his days, and "does not marry a wife, there's no iniquity in his "hands, and that becauſe his corruption does not "prevail over him; but if his corruption prevails "over him, חייב לישא אשה, he ought to marry "a wife:" and that for the very reaſon the Apoſtle here gives. The Ethiopic verſion reads, it is better to marry than to commit fornication; that and adultery both, are expreſſed by fire and burning, with the Jews, as they prove from Hoſ. vii. 4. Cant. viii. 6 [l].

Ver. 10. And unto the married I command, &c.] To the unmarried and widows he ſpoke by permiſſion, or only gave advice and counſel to remain unmarried, provided they could contain; but if not, it was adviſeable to marry; but to perſons already in a married ſtate, what he has to ſay to them, is by commandment, enjoining them what they are under obligation to obſerve, not being at liberty to do as they will: yet not I, but the Lord; not as if he took upon him the dominion over them, to make laws for them, and in an imperious, authoritative way, oblige them to obedience to them, no; what he was about to deliver, was not a law of his own enacting and obtruding, but what their Lord, their Creator, head, huſband, and Redeemer, had ordered and enjoined; and this grave, ſolemn way of ſpeaking he makes uſe of, to excite their attention, command awe and reverence, make the greater impreſſion upon their minds, and ſhew the obligation they were under to regard what was ſaid: let not the wife depart from her huſband; for the ſame law that obliges a man to cleave to his wife, obliges the wife to cleave to her huſband, Gen. ii. 24. and thoſe words of Chriſt, what God hath joined together, let no man put aſunder, Matt. xix. 6. regard the one as well as the other; and the rules he has given, forbidding divorces only in caſe of adultery, Matt. v. 32. and xix. 9. are as binding upon the wife as upon the huſband. The wife therefore ſhould not depart from her huſband upon every ſlight occaſion; not on account of any quarrel, or diſagreement that may ariſe between them; or for every inſtance of moroſeneſs and inhumanity; or becauſe of diſeaſes and infirmities; nor even on the ſcore of difference in religion, which by what follows, ſeems to be greatly the caſe in view. The Apoſtle obſerves this, in oppoſition to ſome rules and cuſtoms which obtained among Jews and Gentiles, divorcing and ſeparating from one another upon various accounts; not only huſbands put away their wives, but wives alſo left their huſbands: for women to put away, or leave their huſbands, were not in former times allowed of among the Jews, but from other nations crept in among them; indeed if a man married one under age, and ſhe did not like him for her huſband, ſhe might refuſe him, and go away without a bill of divorce; the manner of refuſal was, by ſaying before two witneſſes, I don't like ſuch an one for my huſband, or I don't like the eſpouſals, with which my mother or my brother eſpouſed me, or in ſuch like words; and ſometimes a written form of refuſal was given[m]; but otherwiſe where marriage was conſummated, ſuch a departure of the wife was not allowed. Salome the ſiſter of Herod, is thought to be the firſt that introduced it, who ſent a bill of divorce to Coſtobarus[n] her huſband; and in this ſhe was followed by Herodias, the daughter of Ariſtobulus, who left her huſband, and married Herod Antipas[o]; and it ſeems certain, that this practice prevailed in Chriſt's time, ſince not only ſuch a caſe is ſuppoſed, Mark x. 12. but a very flagrant inſtance is given in the woman of Samaria, John iv. 18. who had had five huſbands, not in a lawful regular manner, one after another upon their reſpective deaths, but ſhe had married them, and put them away one after another: and as for the Gentiles, the account the Jews[p] give of them is, that though they had "no divorces in form, they "put away one another; R. Jochanan ſays, "אשתו מגרשתו, a man's wife might put him away, "and give him the dowry:" though according to other accounts, they had divorces in form, which when a man put away a woman, were called γραμματα αποπομπης, letters of diſmiſſion; and when a woman left her huſband, απολειψεως γραμματα, letters of dereliction, ſuch as Hipparchia the wife of Alcibiades gave to him[q]; and Juſtin Martyr[r] gives us an inſtance of a chriſtian woman, who gave her huſband what the Roman ſenate called a divorce.

Ver. 11. But and if ſhe depart, &c.] This is ſaid, not as allowing of ſuch a departure, which only in caſe of fornication is lawful; but ſuppoſing it a fact, that a woman can't be prevailed upon to ſtay with her huſband, but actually forſakes him upon ſome difference ariſing between them, let her remain unmarried: ſhe ought not to marry another man; her departure don't make the marriage void; nor is it to be made void by any difference between them, either on religious or civil accounts, only in caſe of adultery; and therefore, if upon ſuch ſeparation ſhe marries, ſhe is guilty of adultery: or be reconciled to her huſband; which is rather to be choſen, than to remain ſeparate, though unmarried; if ſhe has given the offence, and is the cauſe of the ſeparation, ſhe ought to acknowledge it, and aſk forgiveneſs of her huſband, and return to him, and live in peace with him; and if the fault is on his ſide, ſhe ought to make uſe of all proper methods to convince him of it, bring him into good temper, forgive any injury done her, and live peaceably and comfortably together: and let not the huſband put away his wife; as the Jews were wont to do, upon every trifling occaſion; ſee the note on Matt. v. 31, 32.

Ver. 12. But to the reſt ſpeak I, not the Lord, &c.] He had ſpoken before to married perſons in general, and had delivered not his own ſentiments barely, but the commandment of the Lord, that ſuch ſhould never ſeparate from, or put away each other; in which he has reſpect to ſuch as were upon equal foot in matters of religion, who were both of them believers in Chriſt; but now he ſpeaks to the reſt, to ſuch as were unequally yoked, the one a believer, the other an unbeliever; and what he delivers on this head, concerning their living together, there being no expreſs determination of this matter by the Lord himſelf, he under divine inſpiration gives his ſenſe of it; as that ſuch marriages were valid, and that ſuch perſons ought to live together, and not ſeparate on account of difference in religion: or the ſenſe is, that as to the reſt of the things they had wrote to him about, beſides what he had given anſwer to already, he ſhould ſpeak to under divine illumination; though he had not an expreſs law of Chriſt to point unto them, as the rule of their conduct: and particularly, whereas they had deſired his judgment and advice upon this head, whether one who before converſion had married an unbeliever, ought to live with ſuch an one, or whether it would not be adviſeable to leave, or put ſuch away, to it he anſwers, if any brother hath a wife that believeth not; that is, if any man who is now a brother, one called by the grace of God, and is in church-fellowſhip, has a wife to whom he was married whilſt in a ſtate of unregeneracy and infidelity; who is as ſhe was when he married her, entirely deſtitute of faith in Chriſt; not one that is weak in the faith, or only makes an outward profeſſion, but that has no faith at all in Chriſt, nor in his Goſpel, not ſo much as an hiſtorical one; who diſbelieves, denies, and rejects, the truths of the Goſpel: and ſhe be pleaſed to dwell with him; loves her huſband, chuſes to continue with him, notwithſtanding their different ſentiments of religion: let him him not put her away; infidelity is no reaſon for a divorce. The Goſpel-revelation does not diſſolve the natural obligations men and women are in to one another. The Jews had a law prohibiting marriages with heathens and idolaters; and ſuch marriages were diſſolved, and ſuch wives put away, Exod. xxxiv. 16. Ezra x. 3. but this was a law peculiar to that people, and was not obligatory on other nations, and eſpecially has no place under the Goſpel-diſpenſation.

Ver. 13. And the woman which hath an huſband that believeth, &c.] The Apoſtle puts the caſe both ways, there being the ſame reaſon for one as for another; that if one that was a ſiſter, who was partaker of the grace of God, and a member of the church, had a huſband to whom ſhe was married before her converſion; who was an unbeliever, had no faith in Chriſt, nor any notion of the Goſpel, but an infidel to both: and if he be pleaſed to dwell with her; loves her, and is willing to continue with her; neither puts her away from him, nor departs from her on account of her chriſtianity: let her not leave him; but continue, and cohabit with him as man and wife; this is the advice the Apoſtle gives, as agreeable to the light of nature and reaſon; as becoming the Goſpel of Chriſt, and as what might ſerve to recommend it, and ſpread the knowledge of it.

Ver. 14. For the unbelieving huſband is ſanctified by the wife, &c.] That is, by the believing wife; as the Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions read, and ſo it is read in ſome copies; and likewiſe in the next clauſe the ſame is read, by the believing huſband; this is a reaſon given by the Apoſtle why they ſhould live together. This can't be underſtood of internal ſanctification, which is never the caſe; an unbeliever can't be ſanctified by a believer in this ſenſe, for ſuch a ſanctification is only by the Spirit of God; nor external ſanctification, or an outward reformation, which tho' the believing yokefellow may ſometimes be a means of, yet not always; and beſides, the uſefulneſs of one to another in ſuch a relation, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, is urged as a reaſon for living together, in ver. 16. nor merely of the holineſs of marriage, as it is an inſtitution of God, which is equally the ſame in unbelievers as believers, or between a believer and an unbeliever, as between two believers; but of the very act of marriage, which, in the language of the Jews, is expreſſed by being ſanctified; inſtances almoſt without number, might be given of the uſe of the word קדש, in this ſenſe, out of the Miſnic, Talmudic and Rabbinic writings, take the following one inſtead of a thouſand that might be produced [s]. "The man מקדש, "ſanctifies, or eſpouſes a wife by himſelf, or by "his meſſenger; the woman מתקדש, is ſanctified, "or eſpouſed by herſelf, or by her meſſenger. The "man מקדש, ſanctifies, or eſpouſes his daughter, "when ſhe is a young woman, by himſelf or by "his meſſenger; if any one ſays to a woman, "התקדשי, be thou ſanctified, or eſpouſed to me "by this date, (the fruit of the palm-tree;) "התקדשי, be thou ſanctified, or eſpouſed to me "by this, (any other thing;) if there is in any one "of theſe things the value of a farthing, מקודשת, "ſhe is ſanctified, or eſpouſed, and if not ſhe is not "מקודשת, ſanctified, or eſpouſed; if he ſays, by "this, and by this, and by this, if there is the "value of a farthing in them all, מקודשת, ſhe is "ſanctified, or eſpouſed; but if not, ſhe is not "מקודשת, ſanctified, or eſpouſed; if ſhe eats one "after another, ſhe is not מקודשת, ſanctified, or "eſpouſed, unleſs there is one of them the value "of a farthing;" in which ſhort paſſage, the word which is uſed to ſanctify, or be ſanctified, in the Hebrew language, is uſed to eſpouſe, or be eſpouſed no leſs than ten times. So the Jews [t] interpret the word ſanctified, in Job i. 5. he eſpouſed to them wives; in the Miſna, the oral law of the Jews, there is a whole treatiſe of קידושין, ſanctifications [u], or eſpouſals; and in the Gemara or Talmud [w] is another, full of the diſputes of the doctors on this ſubject. Maimonides has alſo written a treatiſe of women and wives [x], out of which might be produced almoſt innumerable inſtances in proof of the obſervation; and ſuch as can read, and have leiſure to read the ſaid tracts, may ſatisfy themſelves to their hearts content. Let it be further obſerved, that the prepoſition εν, which is in moſt verſions rendered by, ſhould be rendered in or to, as it is in the next verſe, and in many other places; ſee Matt. xvii. 12. Mark ix. 13. Col. 1. 23. 1 Theſſ. iv. 7. 2 Pet. i. 5, 6, 7. if it be rendered in the former way in, it denotes the near union which by marriage the man and woman are brought into; if in the latter, it deſigns the object to which the man or woman is eſpouſed, and the true ſenſe, and even the right rendering of the paſſage is this; for the unbelieving huſband is eſpouſed to the wife, and the unbelieving wife is eſpouſed to the huſband; they are duly, rightly, and legally eſpouſed to each other; and therefore ought not, notwithſtanding their different ſentiments of religion, to ſeparate from one another; otherwiſe, if this is not the caſe, if they are not truly married to one another, this conſequence muſt neceſſarily follow; that the children born in ſuch a ſtate of cohabitation where the marriage is not valid, muſt be ſpurious and not legitimate, and which is the ſenſe of the following words: elſe were your children unclean, but now are they holy; that is, if the marriage contracted between them in their ſtate of infidelity was not valid, and ſince the converſion of one of them, can never be thought to be good; then the children begotten and born, either when both were infidels, or ſince one of them was converted, muſt be unlawfully begotten, be baſe born, and not a genuine legitimate offſpring; and departure upon ſuch a foot, would be declaring to all the world that their children were illegitimate; which would have been a ſad caſe indeed, and contains in it another reaſon why they ought to keep together; whereas, as the Apoſtle has put it, the children are holy in the ſame ſenſe as their parents are; that as they are ſanctified, or lawfully eſpouſed together, ſo the children born of them, were in a civil and legal ſenſe holy, that is legitimate; wherefore to ſupport the validity of their marriage, and for the credit of their children, it was abſolutely neceſſary they ſhould abide with one another. The learned Dr. Lightfoot ſays, that the words unclean and holy, denote not children unlawfully begotten, and lawfully begotten; but Heatheniſm and Chriſtianiſm; and thinks the Apoſtle alludes to the diſtinction often made by the Jews, of the children of proſelytes being born in holineſs, or out of it, that is, either before they became proſelytes or after; but it ſhould be obſerved, that tho' the word holineſs is uſed for Judaiſm, yet not for chriſtianity; and beſides, the marriages of heathens were not looked upon as marriages by the Jews, and particularly ſuch mixed ones, as of a Jew and Gentile, they were not to be reckoned marriages; for ſo they ſay [y], "he that eſpouſes a Gentile woman, "or a ſervant, אינן קידושין, they are not eſpouſals; "but lo, he is after the eſpouſals as he was before "the eſpouſals; and ſo a Gentile, or a ſervant, that "eſpouſes a daughter of Iſrael, אין קידושיהן קידושין, "thoſe eſpouſals are no eſpouſals;" nor do they allow children begotten of ſuch perſons, to be legitimate. This learned writer himſelf, owns ſuch a tradition, and which he cites [z], "that a ſon begotten in uncleanneſs, is a ſon in all reſpects and "in general, is reckoned as an Iſraelite, tho' he is "a baſtard, חבן מן הגויה אינו בנו, but a ſon begotten on a Gentile woman, is not his ſon;" all which are juſt the reverſe of what the Apoſtle is here obſerving; and who it muſt be remarked, is ſpeaking of the ſame ſort of holineſs of children as of parents, which can't be underſtood of chriſtianity, becauſe one of the parents in each, is ſuppoſed to be an heathen. The ſenſe I have given of this paſſage, is agreeable to the mind of ſeveral interpreters, ancient and modern, as Jerom, Ambroſe, Eraſmus, Camerarius, Muſculus, &c. which laſt writer makes this ingenuous confeſſion; formerly, ſays he, I have abuſed this place againſt the Anabaptiſts, thinking the meaning was, that the children were holy for the parents faith; which tho' true, the preſent place makes nothing for the purpoſe: and I hope that upon reading this, every one that has abuſed it to ſuch a purpoſe, will make the like acknowledgment; I am ſure they ought.

Ver. 15. But if the unbelieving depart, &c.] If the unbelieving party, man or woman, ſeparate themſelves from the believing party on account of religion, and in hatred to it, and will not live with the believer unleſs Chriſt is denied, his Goſpel abjured, and his ordinances and worſhip relinquiſhed: let him depart; he or ſhe, tho' not without making uſe of all proper means to retain them; but if after all, they will go, unleſs ſuch things are complied with as are unreaſonable and ſinful, they are not to be held, but let go; and the deſerted perſon may ſit down contented, being not to be blamed, the fault entirely lying upon the deſerter: a brother or a ſiſter is not under bondage in ſuch caſes. The Ethiopic verſion reads it, to ſuch an one; one that is called by grace a church-member, and ſo a brother or ſiſter in Chriſt, is not to be ſubject to an unbeliever in matters of conſcience, in things appertaining to the worſhip of God, and the ſervice and glory of Chriſt; nor, being in ſuch circumſtances, that either Chriſt muſt be forſaken, or the unbeliever will depart, are they obliged to yield to ſuch an one, but rather ſuffer a departure; nor are they bound to remain unmarried, but are free to marry another perſon, after all proper methods have been tried for a reconciliation, and that appears to be impracticable; deſertion in ſuch a caſe, and attended with ſuch circumſtances, is a breach of the marriage contract, and a diſſolution of the bond, and the deſerted perſon may lawfully marry again; otherwiſe a brother, or a ſiſter in ſuch a caſe, would be in ſubjection and bondage to ſuch a perſon: but God hath called us to peace; which ought to be ſought after and maintained, ſo far as it can be conſiſtent with truth, the glory of God, the honour of Chriſt, and intereſt of religion. The believing party being threatned with a deſertion, ought as much as poſſible to ſeek for peace and reconciliation, and do all that can be to prevent a departure; for ſaints are called by the grace of God, to follow after and cultivate peace, not only with one another in their chriſtian communion as ſaints, but with all men, even their enemies, and eſpecially with ſuch as are ſo nearly allied; wherefore the departure ſhould not be eaſily admitted, or a new marriage be ſuddenly entered into, reconciliation if it can be obtained, being moſt eligible and becoming a chriſtian.

Ver. 16. For what knoweſt thou, O wife, &c.] Theſe words may be underſtood, as containing a reaſon either why the believing party ſhould be eaſy at the departure of the unbeliever, after all proper methods have been uſed in vain to retain him or her; taken from the uncertainty and improbability of being of any uſe to them, to bring them to the knowledge of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him; for what knoweſt thou, O wife; thou doſt not know, thou can'ſt not know, thou can'ſt not be ſure, whether thou ſhalt ſave thy huſband? be the means of bringing of him under the means of grace, and ſo of his converſion and ſalvation; there is no likelihood of it, ſince he is ſuch an implacable enemy to Chriſt, and ſo bitterly averſe to the Goſpel, and the ordinances of it; and therefore ſince he is determined to ſeparate, e'en let him go: or elſe, as rendering a reaſon why the believer ſhould ſeek for peace and reconciliation, and by all means, if poſſible, continue to dwell with the unbeliever; taken from hopes of being ſerviceable under a divine influence and bleſſing, for their ſpiritual and eternal good, the wife for the good of the huſband; by whoſe converſation he may be won over, and prevailed upon to entertain a better opinion of the chriſtian religion; to take a liking to the Goſpel, and to attend upon the miniſtry of the word, which may be made the power of God unto ſalvation to him: or how knoweſt thou, O man, whether thou ſhalt ſave thy wife; this may poſſibly be done, in the ſame manner as now ſuggeſted: perſons in ſuch a relation have often great influence upon one another, and are by divine providence often great bleſſings to each other, in things ſpiritual as well as temporal. This puts me in mind of a caſe related by the Jewiſh doctors [a]; "it happened to a holy "man that he married a holy woman, and they "had no children; ſay they, we are of no manner "of profit to the bleſſed God; they ſtood up and "divorced one another; he went and married a wicked woman, and ſhe made him wicked; ſhe went "and married a wicked man, ועשתה אותו צדיק, "and ſhe made him righteous;" or to uſe the Apoſtle's phraſe, ſaved him.

Ver. 17. But as God hath diſtributed to every man, &c.] This text is ſo placed, and the words of it ſo expreſſed, as that it may have regard both to what goes before, and follows after; it may have reſpect to every man's proper gift, whether of continence, or of diſpoſition to marriage, which every man has of God, ver. 7. and accordingly ought to live in a ſingle, or in a married ſtate; or it may refer to the laſt verſe, what knoweſt thou, &c. and ει μη, which we render but, be tranſlated either unleſs; and then the ſenſe is, thou knoweſt not, O man or woman, whether thou ſhalt ſave thy wife or huſband, nor any other, unleſs God, who diſtributes his grace to every one as he pleaſes; or elſe it may be rendered if not, and the ſenſe be, if thou ſhouldſt not ſave thy huſband, or thou man ſhouldſt not ſave thy wife; yet as God hath diſtributed to every man his own proper gift, both as to nature and grace; his proper ſphere of uſefulneſs, and the ſtation in which he would have him be, and the place he would have him fill up, and the buſineſs he muſt do in life; ſo let him act, and as the Lord hath called every one; which is to be underſtood of that particular ſtation of life, and thoſe circumſtances of it, in which men are providentially placed by God, or are found in when he calls them by his grace; as whether married or unmarried; whether joined to a believer or an unbeliever; whether circumciſed or uncircumciſed; whether bond or free; a ſervant or a maſter; and ſo may refer to what follows, as well as to what goes before: ſo let him walk; contented with his ſtation and kind of life, agreeable to the profeſſion he makes of the Goſpel, doing all the good he can to thoſe he is concerned with: and ſo ordain I in all churches; the deciſions and determinations he had made, in the caſes propoſed to him about marriage, the rules and orders he had preſcribed, what he had given out by way of precept or permiſſion, by command or counſel, or what he was about to deliver, were no other than what he in common enjoined other churches; and therefore they ought not to think that they were uſed with more ſtrictneſs and ſeverity than others; and might be induced hereby to attend to what was adviſed or enjoined, ſince it was what was common to all the churches.

Ver. 18. Is any man called being circumciſed, &c.] That is, if any man that is a Jew, who has been circumciſed in his infancy, is called by the grace of God, as there were many in thoſe days, and many of them in the church at Corinth: let him not become uncircumciſed; or draw on the foreſkin; as ſome did in the times of Antiochus, for fear of him, and to curry favour with him, who 'tis ſaid, 1 Maccab. i. 15. made themſelves uncircumciſed, and forſook the holy covenant; and ſo did Menelaus, and the ſons of Tobias, as Joſephus reports [b]; and there were many in the days of Ben Cozba; who became uncircumciſed by force, משוכין, they had their foreſkins drawn on by the Gentiles againſt their wills, and when he came to reign were circumciſed again [c]; for according to the Jews, circumciſion muſt be repeated, and not only four or five times [d], but a hundred times, if a man becomes ſo often uncircumciſed [e]. They make mention of ſeveral particular perſons who voluntarily became uncircumciſed, or to uſe their phraſe, and which exactly anſwers to the word uſed by the Apoſtle, מושך בערלתו, that drew over his foreſkin; as Jehoiachin [f], Achan [g], yea even the firſt Adam [h]; one guilty of this they ſay, makes void the covenant [i]; it was accounted a very great ſin, ſo great that he that committed it, was reckoned [k] among them that ſhall have no part in the world to come, but ſhall be cut off and periſh; phyſicians ſay, this may be done by the uſe of an inſtrument they call ſpaſter, which has its name from the word uſed in the text. The Apoſtle's ſenſe is, that ſuch as had been circumciſed, and had now embraced the faith of Chriſt, had no reaſon to be uneaſy, or take any methods to remove this mark from their fleſh, becauſe it was aboliſhed by Chriſt, and now of no ſignificancy; ſince as it did them no good, it did them no hurt: is any called in uncircumciſion? let him not become circumciſed; that is, if a Gentile who was never circumciſed is called by grace, let him not ſubmit to circumciſion, which is now abrogated, and is altogether unneceſſary and unprofitable in the buſineſs of ſalvation; yea, hurtful and pernicious if done on that account, ſince it makes men debtors to do the whole law, and Chriſt of none effect unto them.

Ver. 19. Circumciſion is nothing, &c.] In the affair of juſtification before God, and acceptance with him; it cannot make any man righteous in the ſight of God, nor recommend him to the divine favour; it is no evidence of a man's calling, or of his having the truth or grace of God in him; nor is it of any avail in the buſineſs of ſalvation. It was ſomething formerly; it was a command and an ordinance of God, to Abraham and his natural ſeed; it pointed at the corruption and pollution of nature; was typical of the effuſion of the blood of Chriſt, for pardon, and cleanſing, and of the internal circumciſion of the heart; it was a ſign and ſeal to Abraham, that he ſhould be the father of many nations, and that the righteouſneſs of faith ſhould come upon the uncircumciſed Gentiles; and was a diſtinguiſhing character of the people of the Jews, until the Meſſiah came: but now it is nothing, nor has it any of theſe uſes, being with the reſt of ceremonies aboliſhed by Chriſt; it gives no preference to the Jew above the Gentile; he that has this mark in his fleſh, is not a whit the better for it, and he that is without it, is not at all the worſe; and is a reaſon why both the one and the other ſhould be eaſy, and not attempt any alteration in themſelves with regard to this, or think the better or worſe of themſelves on account of it. This is ſaid in direct oppoſition to the ſentiments of the Jews, who extol circumciſion to the ſkies. The Apoſtle ſays it is nothing, and they ſay it is every thing, and every thing is nothing without it; they ſay, it is the hinge of their whole law [l], and that it is equal to all the precepts in the law [m]; their extravagant commendations of it take in the following paſſage [n]; "ſays R. Eliezar ben Azariah, uncircumciſion is rejected, becauſe by it the wicked are defiled, as it is ſaid, for all the Gentiles are uncircumciſed; ſays R. Iſhmael, גדולה מילה, great is circumciſion, for on account of it, thirteen covenants were made; ſays R. Joſe, great is circumciſion, for it drives away the ſabbath, the weighty (command in the law, that is, it is obliged to give way to it;) R. Joſhua ben Kortha ſays, great is circumciſion, for it was not ſuſpended to Moſes the righteous, one full hour; R. Nehemiah ſays, great is circumciſion, for it drives away plagues; ſays Rabba, great is circumciſion, for notwithſtanding all the commands which Abraham our father did, he was not called perfect until he was circumciſed; as it is ſaid, walk before me, and be thou perfect; ſays another, great is circumciſion, for had it not been for that, the holy bleſſed God would not have created his world; as it is ſaid, thus ſaith the Lord, if my covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth." More of this kind might be produced, but enough of this. And uncircumciſion is nothing; it does not hinder any having an intereſt in, and partaking of the bleſſings of grace; nor their enjoyment of the Goſpel and Goſpel-ordinances; nor their communion and fellowſhip with the churches of Chriſt, much leſs their everlaſting ſalvation, as ſay [•] the Jews; "the holy bleſſed God, ſay they, rejects the uncircumciſed, and brings them down to hell; as it is ſaid, Ezek. xxxii. 18. ſon of man, wail for the multitude of Egypt, and caſt them down; and ſo ſays Iſaiah, chap. v. 14. therefore hell hath enlarged herſelf and opened her mouth, לבלי חק; that is, to him that hath not the law of circumciſion; as it is ſaid, Pſal. cv. 10. and confirmed the ſame unto Jacob for a law, and to Iſrael for an everlaſting covenant; for no circumciſed perſons go down to hell:" but the keeping of the commandments of God; that is ſomething; not that the commands of God, and the obſervance of them are of any avail to procure the pardon of ſin, acceptance with God, juſtification in his ſight, and eternal ſalvation; yet they are of moment, as they are the commands and ordinances of God; and ought to be kept in faith and fear, as they were delivered, from a principle of love, and with a view to the glory of God; and tho' for keeping of them there is no reward of debt, yet in keeping of them there is a reward of grace; peace of mind is had, and the preſence of God enjoyed; obedience to them upon Goſpel-principles and motives, is a fruit of grace, an evidence of faith, and of the new creature; it is the ornament of a chriſtian profeſſion, and is profitable to men.

Ver. 20. Let every man abide in the ſame calling, &c.] Civil calling, ſtation and buſineſs of life, wherein he was called; that is, in which he was when he was called by the grace of God; and is to be underſtood of ſuch a calling, ſtation, and buſineſs of life, as is lawful, honeſt, and of good report; otherwiſe he ought not to abide in it, but betake himſelf to another, as Matthew and Zaccheus when called by grace, left the ſcandalous employment of a publican: nor is it the Apoſtle's ſenſe, that a man that is in an honeſt way of living, may not change that for another that is equally ſo, as if a man was bound down to that ſort of buſineſs he is in when firſt called; for no doubt it may be lawful, and there may be juſt reaſon for it in providence, why a man ſhould change his calling and ſtation in life; tho' this ought not to be done raſhly and unadviſedly, and without wiſe and good reaſons; but the chief view of the Apoſtle is to teach contentment in every condition, and ſtation of life, and that perſons ſhould not be uneaſy and reſtleſs in it, and ſeek for an alteration when there is no juſt occaſion; and particularly he ſeems to have reference, either to the different ſtate of married and unmarried perſons, he had before been ſpeaking of; ſee ver. 27. or to the different circumſtances of Jew and Gentile, as circumciſed or uncircumciſed, as in the foregoing verſe; or to the different condition of bond and free, ſervant and maſter, in the following verſe; and perſuades them to remain eaſy and ſatisfied, for that the chriſtian religion does not neceſſarily require a change in a man's civil circumſtances of life.

Ver. 21. Art thou called being a ſervant, &c.] That is, called by grace whilſt in the condition of a ſervant, care not for it; don't be troubled at it, and uneaſy with it; be not anxiouſly ſollicitous to be otherwiſe; bear the yoke patiently, go thro' thy ſervitude chearfully, and ſerve thy maſter faithfully; don't look upon it as any objection to thy calling, any contradiction to thy chriſtian liberty, or as unworthy of, and a reproach upon thy profeſſion of Chriſt: but if thou may'ſt be made free, uſe it rather. The Syriac renders the laſt clauſe, גבי לך דתפלוח, chuſe for thyſelf to ſerve; perfectly agreeable to the ſenſe given of the words, by ſeveral great criticks and excellent interpreters, who take the Apoſtle's meaning to be, that ſhould a chriſtian ſervant have an opportunity of making his eſcape from his maſter, or could he by any art, trick, and fraudulent method, obtain his liberty, it would be much more adviſeable to continue a ſervant, than to become free by any ſuch means: yea, ſome ſeem to carry the ſenſe ſo far, that even if ſervants could be made free in a lawful way, yet ſervitude was moſt eligible, both for their own and their maſter's good; for their own to keep them humble and exerciſe their patience; for their maſter's not only temporal, but ſpiritual good; ſince by their good behaviour they might be a means of recommending the Goſpel to them, and of gaining them to Chriſt; but one ſhould rather think the more obvious ſenſe is, that when a chriſtian ſervant has his freedom offered him by his maſter, or he can come at it in a lawful and honourable way, this being preferable to ſervitude, he ought rather to make uſe of it; ſince he would be in a better ſituation, and more at leiſure to ſerve Chriſt, and the intereſt of religion: however, certain it is, that the Apoſtle's deſign is, to make men eaſy in every ſtation of life, and to teach them how to behave therein; he would not have the freeman abuſe his liberty, or be elated with it, nor the ſervant be uneaſy under his ſervitude, nor be depreſſed by it, for the reaſons following.

Ver. 22. For he that is called in the Lord, &c.] Which is to be underſtood, not of any civil calling, or of calling to an office; or of the outward call by the miniſtry of the word only; but of an internal, ſpecial, powerful, evangelical, and ſaving call by the grace of God; which is of perſons out of darkneſs into light, out of bondage into liberty, from their ſinful companions to the company and ſociety of Chriſt and his people, from off themſelves and their own righteouſneſs, to the grace and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and out of the world unto a kingdom and glory. And this may be ſaid to be, in the Lord; either becauſe it is by him, he is the efficient cauſe of it, his grace the moving cauſe, and his glory the end; or becauſe it is in conſequence of being in him, united to him, perſons are firſt in the Lord, and then called by him; or becauſe they are called into fellowſhip and communion with him; the whole is true, and make up the ſenſe of the text; for he that is effectually called by grace, is called by the Lord, and by virtue of being choſen in him, and in union to him, and to partake of all the bleſſings of grace and glory that are with him. And ſuch an one, being a ſervant; in a natural and civil ſenſe when called, in a ſpiritual ſenſe is the Lord's freeman; he is free from ſin, not from the being, but from the ſervitude, guilt and damning power of it: he is free from ſatan, not from his temptations and inſults, but from his dominion and captivity; he is ranſomed from him, by the redemption of Chriſt, and is turned from his power in converſion; he has not that influence over him he before had; and he is ſo ſafe and ſecure from him, that he can never be deſtroyed by him, and in a ſhort time ſatan will be bruiſed under his feet: he is free from the law, the obſervance of the ceremonial law, and all its numerous burdenſome rites; and from the moral law, not from obedience to it, as in the hands of Chriſt, but from the bondage, curſe and condemnation of it, as miniſtred by Moſes: he is free of the company of ſaints, of the church of God below, and of heaven, the city God has built and prepared for his; he is free to the uſe of all things indifferent, provided it is done in faith, the peace of weak brethren ſecured, and the glory of God preſerved; he is free to all the priviledges and immunities of the houſe of God, and to the throne of grace, come when he will; and therefore tho' a ſervant, in another ſenſe he is a very happy man; he is free indeed, and can never be diſfranchiſed, or arreſted, or caſt into priſon; the various priviledges he is free unto and enjoys, ſhew him to be a happy man; and the effects following on his freedom prove it, as peace with God, the preſence of Chriſt, joy in the Holy Ghoſt, fellowſhip with ſaints, and a well grounded hope of glory; he is not only called to the liberty of grace, which he enjoys, but will be delivered into the glorious liberty of the children of God; and therefore has no reaſon to be uneaſy with his civil ſervitude: on the other hand, likewiſe he that is called being free; he that is called by the grace of God, with an holy and effectual calling, being a freeman, his own maſter, and it may be the maſter of others in a civil ſenſe, he in a ſpiritual one, is Chriſt's ſervant; he is bought by Chriſt with his money, with the price of his blood; and therefore he has a right unto him, and a claim to his ſervice; and he becomes a voluntary ſervant to him, thro' the power of his grace upon him; and tho' he ſerves his Lord Chriſt without mercenary views, freely, readily and chearfully, from a principle of love and gratitude, he ſhall not fail of a reward of grace; he ſhall be honoured of God, approved of men, and ſhall receive the reward of the inheritance: chriſtian liberty and the ſervice of Chriſt, are not all inconſiſtent; nor ſhould we entertain any other notions of liberty, but what are conſiſtent with ſerving the Lord; whatever liberty contradicts that is no true liberty; tho' it may have the face of it, it is no other than bondage.

Ver. 23. Ye are bought with a price, &c.] Some read theſe words interrogatively, as ver. 18. 21. are ye bought with a price? and ſuppoſe them directed to ſuch who had bought out their time of ſervitude with a ſum of money, and ought not to return to their former condition; but they are rather to be read affirmatively, and to be underſtood of all, whether freemen or ſervants, that are bought with the ineſtimable price of Chriſt's blood, as in chap. vi. 20. and contain in them a reaſon why ſuch as are called by the grace of God, whilſt in a ſtate of civil ſervitude, are chriſt's freemen, becauſe they are redeemed by him, from ſin, ſatan, the law, and from among men; and alſo why ſuch as are called by the grace of God, being in a ſtate of civil liberty, are Chriſt's ſervants, becauſe he has purchaſed them with his blood, and therefore has a right unto them, both to their perſons and ſervice: be not ye the ſervants of men: not that the Apoſtle diſſuades ſuch as are redeemed by Chriſt, and are believers in him, from being the ſervants of men in a civil ſenſe; for this would be to contradict himſelf, who here and elſewhere exhorts ſervants to continue in the ſervice of their maſters, and to perform it heartily and chearfully, and with great ſincerity and integrity; but his meaning is, that ſince they were redeemed from a vain converſation by the blood of Chriſt, they ſhould not be ſervants to the luſts of men, nor obey them in things ſinful and wicked, which were contrary to law and Goſpel, and which were made unlawful by the word of God, and were a breach of the command of their Lord and maſter Chriſt; nor ſhould they in matters of religion and the worſhip of God ſubmit to the authority of any ſett of men whatever, or be ſubject to the doctrines and commandments of men; whether theſe relate to Jewiſh ceremonies, or Gentile ſuperſtitions, or be a mixture of both: they were to call no man maſter upon earth; nor ſuffer any to lord it over them, as the falſe teachers very much did in this church; but to acknowledge Chriſt, who had bought them to be their only Lord and maſter. The alluſion ſeems to be to a tradition of the Jews, that the Iſraelites being redeemed out of Egypt were the ſervants of God, and not of men[p]; "R. Jochanan "ben Zaccai was explaining this ſcripture, Exod. "xxi. 6. how different the ear is from all the "members of the body; ſays the holy bleſſed God, "the ear that heard my voice on mount Sinai, at "the time I ſaid, the children of Iſrael are my "ſervants, ולא עבדים לעבדים, and not ſervants "to ſervants; and this goes and gets itſelf a maſter, "let it be bored: R. Simeon ben Ribbi was explaining "the ſame ſcripture, how different the door "and the door-poſt were from all the parts of the "houſe; ſays the holy bleſſed God, the door and "the door-poſt which were witneſſes in Egypt, at "the time that I paſſed by the threſhold, and by the "two door-poſts, and I ſaid, the children of Iſrael are "my ſervants, and not ſervants to ſervants, and I "brought them out of bondage to liberty; and "this goes and gets itſelf a maſter, let it be bored "before them."

Ver. 24. Brethren, let every man wherein he is called, &c.] The Apoſtle repeats the advice given in ver. 20. and prefaces it with that tender and affectionate appellation brethren, the more to engage them to attend to it; ſhewing alſo that whatever difference there was in their civil ſtate and condition, there was none in their religious one; they were all brethren, one of another, they were his brethren, yea, even the brethren of Chriſt: therein abide with God; that is, abide in his civil calling and ſtation of life, be it what it will, as knowing he is in that ſtate 'tis the will of God he ſhould be in; and as in the ſight of God, who knows all men, and what is beſt for them, and who ſees and obſerves all their actions and conduct of life; and with whom there is no reſpect of perſons, of bond or free, of maſters or ſervants; they are admitted equally to enjoy the ſame favours and priviledges in the houſe of God; have the ſame acceſs to the throne of grace, and enjoy the ſame communion with God; and therefore ſhould be content in their preſent ſituation, diſcharging the ſeveral duties of their ſtation aright, and exerciſe a good conſcience both towards God and man.

Ver. 25. Now concerning virgins, &c.] Whether they ſhould continue in the ſame ſtate or no, whether they ſhould marry or not, was one of the caſes put to the Apoſtle, and which the Corinthians wrote to him about, and to which he returns this anſwer: I have no commandment of the Lord; neither in the Old Teſtament, in the law of Moſes, or writings of the prophets; nothing is therein enjoined concerning celibacy, or commanding perſons to live a ſingle life; but on the contrary there are many things directing and exciting to a marriage-ſtate; nor had the Apoſtle any command from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, under the Goſpel-diſpenſation, obliging to virginity; nor any ſpecial orders, or peculiar revelation from the Spirit of God, fixing and ſettling this point: yet I give my judgment; what will be moſt adviſeable, convenient, and prudent to be done, conſidering perſons, times, and circumſtances. The Apoſtle does not make uſe of his power and authority as ſuch, to make decrees, and preſcribe rules, binding on the conſciences of men; only humbly and modeſtly gives his opinion, which if thought well of, might be followed by them: and the more to engage them to take his advice, he adds, as one that hath obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful; the meaning of which is, not that he, thro' the goodneſs and mercy of the Lord, had with great integrity preſerved his virginity, and ſo propoſes himſelf, as an inſtance and example of retaining it; for it is not certain, that tho' the Apoſtle was now ſingle, that he had never been married; it ſeems rather that he had, and therefore this can't be his ſenſe; nor does he refer to his faithfulneſs, to the Goſpel committed to his truſt, and the faithful diſcharge of his whole miniſterial ſervice, and which was owing to divine grace and mercy; but to that plainneſs, honeſty, and integrity which appeared in the whole courſe and conduct of his life, and in all his converſation with men; and particularly in giving advice about any matter, or declaring his ſentiments on any ſubject: and when a man is free and faithful, and openly, and honeſtly tells his mind, it greatly recommends him, and commands attention and regard to what he ſays; and faithfulneſs, it may be obſerved, conſidered in this ſenſe, is not of nature, but of grace; 'tis obtained not by a man's own power and ſtrength, but by the grace and mercy of God; to which it is here aſcribed.

[p] T. Bab. Kiddushin, fol. 22. 2.

Ver. 26. I ſuppoſe therefore, that this is good, &c.] The opinion of the Apoſtle, the ſentiment of his mind, his judgment in this caſe were, that it was better, more adviſeable and eligible, for perſons that were ſingle to continue ſo; his reaſon for it follows, for the preſent neceſſity; by which is meant not the ſhortneſs of life, and the neceſſity of dying, when huſband and wife muſt part, upon which trouble enſues; nor the various ſorrows, cares, encumbrances, trials, and exerciſes that attend a conjugal ſtate, as bearing and bringing forth, and bringing up children, proviſion for the family, &c. which are common to all, and at all times more or leſs; but the preſent time of perſecution, under which the churches of Chriſt were; agreeably the Syriac verſion reads it, מטל אננקא דזבנא, becauſe of the neceſſity of the time, or ſeaſon; uſing the very Greek word in the text; as the Targumiſts[q] alſo have frequently adopted it into their language, and uſe the phraſe, שעת אננקי, an hour, or time of neceſſity, for a time of great affliction and diſtreſs, juſt as the Apoſtle does here; becauſe this was the preſent caſe of the chriſtians, he thought it moſt prudent for ſuch as were ſingle, to remain ſo; ſince as they were often obliged to move from place to place, to fly from one city to another, this would be very incommodious for married perſons, who might have young children to take care of, and provide for, ſee Matt. xxiv. 19. Luke xxiii. 29. upon a like account, the Jewiſh doctors adviſe to the ſame the Apoſtle here does[r]; "from the day that the "empire is extended, which decrees hard decrees "upon us, and cauſes the law and the command"ments to ceaſe from us, and does not ſuffer us to "circumciſe children; it is right that we agree "among ourſelves, שלא לישא אשה, not to marry, "and beget children:" I ſay it is good for a man ſo to be; to remain unmarried, to live a ſingle life, to be a virgin; for the word virgin, as here uſed, relates to men as well as maidens, and denotes the ſingle ſtate of either. The Apoſtle does not add, even as I; as he does in ver. 8. which ſeems to confirm the conjecture already made, that he was not a batchelor, but a widower; otherwiſe he would doubtleſs have enforced this advice by his own example, as before.

Ver. 27. Art thou bound unto a wife, &c.] Or to a woman; either by promiſe, or by eſpouſal, or by conſummate marriage; either of which is a tye, or obligation, a bond, and eſpecially the latter; marriage is ſuch a bond as cannot be diſſolved, but by the death of one of the parties; ſee Rom. vii. 2. unleſs in caſe of adultery, or of wilful deſertion: and it is a bond which mutually obliges; as the huſband is bound by the law of marriage, to live chaſtly and lovingly with his wife, and to take care of her, and provide for her; ſo the wife is bound by the ſame law, to live in like manner with her huſband, and to ſubmit unto him, and obey him: ſeek not to be looſed; don't depart from her, nor ſeek to be divorced, nor even deſire to be looſed by death: art thou looſed from a wife? being either never married, or elſe if having been married the wife is dead, or legally divorced for a juſt cauſe: ſeek not a wife, or woman; make no enquiry after one; be content to live without one; enter not into a marriage ſtate, nor take any ſtep towards it; 'tis beſt to continue looſed, for the reaſon above given, that is, provided the perſon has the gift of continence, otherwiſe not; ſee ver. 5.

Ver. 28. But and if thou marry, thou ſinneſt not, &c.] If a man that has never been married, or one that has, if legally looſed from his wife, thinks fit to marry, he commits no ſin, he breaks no law of God, far from it; marriage is honourable in all. The Apoſtle would be underſtood, that in the advice he before gives, he is not diſſuading from marriage, as a thing ſinful and criminal; only that it was more adviſeable to ſuch as could, to abſtain from it, under the preſent circumſtances of things; and what he ſays of a man, holds equally true of a virgin: and if a virgin marry, ſhe hath not ſinned; the one may as lawfully marry as another; there's no law forbidding virgins to marry, any more than young men; and if they think fit to enter into ſuch a ſtate, they break no law of God, and conſequently ſin not: nevertheleſs ſuch ſhall have trouble in the fleſh; that is, ſuch young men and virgins, who chuſe to marry, and who generally promiſe themſelves a great deal of pleaſure, ſhall meet with a great deal of trouble; and that even where they expected the moſt ſatisfaction and delight, in the fleſh; the body, the outward man, and external circumſtances of life. This trouble is the ſame with the preſent neceſſity before mentioned, the perſecutions and tribulations, the ſaints ſhould ſuffer in the fleſh, for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel; not that married perſons ſhould be the only ones that ſhould have trouble in this way, but that ſuch perſons would be leſs able to bear it, or to eſcape from it. Moreover, this may be extended to all the ſorrows, troubles, and diſtreſſes which attend a married ſtate: but I ſpare you; the ſenſe of which is, either that the Apoſtle, out of his great tenderneſs to ſuch who were inclined to marry, and could not contain, juſt gave this hint, that ſuch ſhould have trouble in the fleſh; but did not dwell upon it, or enter into particulars, leſt they ſhould be diſcouraged from it, and fall into temptation, ſin, and a ſnare; or becauſe of the great reſpect he had to the Corinthians, he he gave the above advice to keep themſelves ſingle, that they might the better bear afflictions and perſecutions, for the ſake of their profeſſion, and eſcape many troubles which others endure.

Ver. 29. But this I ſay brethren, the time is ſhort, &c.] This is another reaſon, with which the Apoſtle ſupports his advice to virgins, and unmarried perſons to remain ſo; ſince the time of life is ſo very ſhort, and 'tis even but a little while to the end of the world, and ſecond coming of Chriſt; and therefore ſeeing the marriage ſtate is ſo full of care and trouble, and it affords ſtill leſs time for the ſervice of Chriſt and religion; he thought it moſt adviſeable for them to continue in a ſingle life, that they might be more at leiſure to make uſe of that little time they had for their ſpiritual good and welfare, the edification of others, and the glory of Chriſt: unleſs it ſhould be rather thought that the Apoſtle is ſtill enlarging upon the former argument, taken from the preſent time, being a time of diſtreſs and perſecution; and ſo the phraſe, the time is ſhort, or contracted, and full of anguiſh and affliction, is the ſame with the preſent neceſſity, and trouble in the fleſh; and ſince this was the caſe, he ſuggeſts again, that an unmarried ſtate was moſt preferable: it remaineth that both they that have wives, be as tho' they had none; and as for the reſt, they that were married, his advice to them was, that they ſhould ſo behave as if they were not married; not that he would have them put away their wives, or fancy with themſelves that they had none, or make no uſe of the marriage bed; but ſuggeſts a moderate uſe of it; he would not have them give up themſelves to laſciviouſneſs and carnal luſts and pleaſures, even with their own wives, and ſpend their time altogether in their company and embraces; but ſince the time of life was ſhort, and that full of troubles, they ſhould ſpend it in the ſervice and worſhip of God, private and publick, as much as poſſible; and not in the indulging and ſatisfying of the fleſh.

Ver. 30. And they that weep, as tho' they wept not, &c.] They that weep for troubles and croſſes, things adverſe and afflicting in a marriage ſtate, for the loſs of wives or children, ſhould expreſs their ſorrow in ſuch a manner and degree, as if they wept not; not that the Apoſtle here introduces and eſtabliſhes a ſtoical apathy, and would have perſons ſhow no manner of concern for theſe things; but he directs to a moderate uſe of ſorrow, to ſuch a degree as not to hinder and divert from the exerciſes of piety and religion: and they that rejoice, as tho' they rejoiced not; ſuch who are bleſſed with great proſperity, and with whom every thing goes well; they have married wives, and have children, and thrive in the world; let them rejoice on the account of theſe things, in ſuch a ſtill, ſilent way, as if they rejoiced not, their hearts not being ſet upon their outward felicity, nor elated with it; but rejoicing rather that their names were written in heaven, that they had an intereſt in Chriſt and his grace, and a right and title to the glories of another world, and at the ſame time be thankful to God for what they enjoy in this: and they that buy as though they poſſeſſed not; meaning, not any ſort of buyers, every one is a buyer in ſome ſenſe; but ſuch as purchaſe eſtates, buy houſes and lands, and become proprietors of large tracts. Theſe the Apoſtle would not have hold their ſubſtance for themſelves, but hold it as if they did not hold it, parting with it for the uſe of others; and as perſons that are only ſtewards, and not properly owners, and in a little time muſt quit it all, and be accountable for their uſe and diſpoſition of it.

Ver. 31. And they that uſe this world, as not abuſing it, &c.] Such as have a large affluence of the things of this world, ſhould uſe them in a moderate and temperate manner; ſhould not ſquander them away extravagantly, or ſpend them on their luſts, and uſe them intemperately, which is to abuſe them: for the faſhion of this world paſſeth away; not the nature, matter and ſubſtance, but the figure and form of it; for after this world is burnt up, a new one, as to form and faſhion, will ariſe, in much more beauty and glory; all that looks glorious and beautiful in the preſent world, as riches, honour, &c. are all mere ſhow and appearance, have nothing ſolid and ſubſtantial in them; and are all fluid and tranſitory, are paſſing away; there is nothing firm and permanent; in a little time, all will be at an end; the world itſelf, as to its preſent form, and all that is in it; when there will be no more marrying, nor giving in marriage, no more buying and ſelling, no more of the preſent changes and viciſſitudes of proſperity and adverſity, of joy and ſorrow; theſe ſcenes will be all removed, and quite a new face of things appear: wherefore what the Apoſtle exhorts unto, with reſpect to preſent conduct and behaviour, muſt be right and good.

Ver. 32. But I would have you without carefulneſs, &c.] This is another reaſon, by which the Apoſtle confirms the advice he gives to virgins to remain ſuch, becauſe the married ſtate is full of cares, whereas the ſingle life is more free from them; and therefore he wiſhes them to continue in ſuch a ſtate, that they might be without anxious and diſtracting cares of temporal things, things relating to the good decorum and ſuſtenance of a family, and ſo be more free and at leiſure for the ſervice of God; which he illuſtrates, by ſhewing the different cares that married and unmarried perſons are involved in: he that is unmarried, careth for the things that belong to the Lord; ſuch as hearing the word, reading it, meditating upon it, praying to God and attending upon all ordinances, taking every opportunity to glorify God, and do good to others; but this is not to be underſtood as matter of fact, that unmarried perſons are ſo ſtudiouſly concerned for theſe things, or that this is the caſe of all of them; there are many unmarried perſons think nothing about them, and are not at all concerned with them; but the meaning is, that ſuch perſons are more at leiſure, and can more conveniently attend to theſe things, and ought ſo to do; and they that have the grace of God, will be more or leſs ſolicitous to obſerve them: how he may pleaſe the Lord; for when theſe things are attended to in faith and fear, from a principle of love, and with a view to the glory of God, the good of their own ſouls and others, they are well pleaſing to the Lord; and tho' they are not meritorious of eternal life, yet they are acceptable to God thro' Jeſus Chriſt, and will be taken notice of with approbation, and followed with a reward of grace another day.

Ver. 33. But he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, &c.] Attending diligently to the buſineſs and calling of life, he is engaged in, that he may provide food and cloathing, and other neceſſaries for the ſupport and ſuſtenance of his family: how he may pleaſe his wife; and make her and his children eaſy and comfortable. This alſo, is not to be underſtood of every individual perſon in a married ſtate, as matter of fact; for on the one hand, there are ſome who take no care to pleaſe their wives and provide for their families, and are worſe than infidels ; and, on the other hand, there are others who take a proper care to make a ſuitable proviſion for their wives and children, to the ſatisfaction of both ; and yet this is not their only care, they alſo care for the things of the Lord, and concern themſelves much for his honour and glory : but the ſenſe is, that, generally ſpeaking, perſons in ſuch a ſtate are greatly involved in worldly cares, and have not that leiſure, and thoſe opportunities, that ſingle perſons have to attend religious exerciſes ; wherefore the ſingle ſtate, on this account is, in the Apoſtle's opinion, the more preferable.

Ver. 34. There is difference alſo between a wife and a virgin, &c.] The word μεμεριϛαι, tranſlated there is difference, ſtands in ſome copies at the end of the laſt verſe, and in the Vulgate Latin, and Ethiopic verſions, by which it is rendered, and is divided ; referring to the married man, whoſe thoughts are diſtracted with the cares of the world, and his mind divided between the Lord and his wife, between the things that pleaſe the one, and thoſe that pleaſe the other ; ſo that he cannot attend upon the Lord without diſtraction, as the unmarried perſon may ; ſee ver. 35. But the more generally received reading is what we follow ; in which words the Apoſtle ſhews, that there is juſt the ſame difference between a married and an unmarried woman, as there is between a married and an unmarried man. There's no difference in their nature, nor ſex, but in their ſtate and condition, and in the cares which involve the one and the other. The unmarried woman careth for the things of the Lord ; not every one that is unmarried, but one that has the grace of God, being in a ſingle ſtate; as ſuch an one is more at leiſure, and can more conveniently attend on the ſervice of the Lord, ſo ſhe ought, and generally ſpeaking does : and her end in ſo doing is, that ſhe may be holy both in body and in ſpirit ; not in body only, but in ſpirit alſo ; for outward chaſtity, without internal holineſs, will be of little avail : but as a cloſe adherence to the Lord, and to his worſhip and ſervice, may be a means of preſerving from external pollutions of the body, ſo likewiſe of carrying on the internal work of grace upon the ſoul ; not that it is to be thought that unmarried perſons are the only ones that are holy in body and ſpirit ; there are ſome that are ſo in neither ; and there are many married perſons that are chaſte in their bodies, and poſſeſs their veſſels in ſanctification and honour, and are bleſſed with inward ſpiritual purity. But ſhe that is married careth for the things of the world, how ſhe may pleaſe her huſband ; not by beautifying and adorning herſelf with broider'd hair, or gold, or pearls, or coſtly array ; tho' this is all that ſome care for ; but with good works, taking care of her houſhold and family affairs, bringing up her children in an orderly manner, honouring and obeying her huſband, doing every thing to oblige him, and to engage his love and affection to her, as becomes her ; nor is this ſaid of her by way of diſpraiſe, only that ſuch is her ſtate and ſituation in life, that ſhe has not the opportunities and advantages the unmarried perſon has of ſerving the Lord ; on which account the ſingle life is repreſented as moſt adviſeable to abide in.

Ver. 35. And this I ſpeak for your own profit, &c.] The Apoſtle ſuggeſts, that in giving the advice he did to unmarried perſons to abide ſingle, he had nothing elſe in view than their temporal and ſpiritual advantage ; that they might be better able to meet and grapple with perſecution for the ſake of the Goſpel ; that they might be more free from the cares and incumbrances of life, and more at liberty to ſerve the Lord; whereby not only his glory, but their ſpiritual good, might be promoted ; not that he thought that marriage was unlawful, or that the ſingle life was a more honeſt, and a more chaſte way of living, or that it was abſolutely neceſſary, and an incumbent duty upon them to remain ſingle, nor would he be ſo underſtood : all that he had ſaid was by way of advice ; he had very faithfully laid before them the advantages and diſadvantages of both ſtates, and now leaves them to their full liberty to do as they pleaſed to take his advice, or not : not that I may caſt a ſnare on you ; as fowlers on birds : had he enjoyned virginity as neceſſary, and inſiſted upon it, that it was abſolutely their duty to live a ſingle life ; this would have been laying an obligation upon them, and an enſnaring and entangling of them : hereby ſome might have engaged in a ſingle life, who had not the gift of continence, and ſo might have been drawn into the ſin of fornication, or into unnatural luſt, and ſuch impurities as would be very ſcandalous unto, and highly reflect upon the Goſpel of Chriſt. But the Apoſtle delivered himſelf on this ſubject with no ſuch view, and in ſuch a manner, as is plain he meant not to enſnare any : but for that which is comely, and that you may attend upon the Lord without diſtraction : all he aimed at, by adviſing them to a ſingle life, was that they might more orderly and conſtantly, and without diſtraction of mind, thro' the cares of the world, wait upon the Lord, and ſerve him ; which, in his opinion, was chuſing the good part with Mary ; whilſt others, like Martha, were troubled, divided, and diſtracted with many things.

Ver. 36. But if any man think, &c.] This ſome underſtand of a man that is engaged, or betrothed to a virgin, and protracts marriage, who may uſe his prudence in conſummating it, if he pleaſes, for any thing the Apoſtle has ſaid to the contrary : but it is better to underſtand it of a parent, or one that has the care and guardianſhip of virgins ; if ſuch an one is of opinion, that he behaveth himſelf uncomely towards his virgin ; by expoſing her to contempt and reproach, in retaining her at home, and not giving her in marriage when at proper age for ſuch a ſtate; it being reckoned reproachful to be at, or paſt the age of marriage, or to be in years, and not married ; or by ſo doing lay her under temptation to do that which is uncomely, to commit fornication, which would be uncomely, both to him, and to her ; and ſuch a tendency has living in a ſingle ſtate, contrary to inclination. The Apoſtle may have reſpect to a Jewiſh tradition founded upon the ſuppoſed ſenſe of Lev. xix. 29. do not proſtitute thy daughter to cauſe her to be a whore [s]. " Says R. Eliezer, this is he who marries his " daughter to an old man. Says R. Akiba, (who " was cotemporary with the Apoſtle) this is he " who detains his daughter at home when ſhe is " marriageable." If ſhe paſs the flower of her age ; that is, one that is arrived to years of maturity, is ripe for marriage, and is what the Jewiſh doctors call בגרת ; who, according to them, was one of twelve years and a half old [t], at which age virgins were judg'd fit to marry : hence that ſaying of theirs [u], " if thy daughter, בגרה, is ripe, or come " to the flower of her age, make thy ſervant free, " and give her to him." Moreover, according to their canons, ſuch an one was no longer under her father's power; for ſo runs the canon [w], "כיון שבגרה, when ſhe is at the flower of her age, "ſhe is no more under her father's power:" her father can't make void her vows, tho' a huſband can [x]: and need ſo require; that ſhe be given in marriage to a man; if ſhe has not the gift of continence; if ſhe is in danger of falling into the ſin of fornication, and the father or guardian are ſenſible of this: let him do what he will, he ſinneth not; he is under no obligation by what the Apoſtle had ſaid to detain her in a ſingle life; he may give her in marriage if he pleaſes: he may do what ſhe will, as it may be rendered; comply with her inclination and deſire in marrying her to ſome perſon; in doing which, neither he nor ſhe will break any law of God, and ſo not ſin therein: let them marry; let parents marry their children when this is the caſe; let the young men and young women marry who are ſo diſpoſed; there's no reaſon why they ſhould not; there is nothing contrary to it in the word of God, nor in the advice of the Apoſtle; nay, according to him, it was much better to marry than to burn, or to be expoſed to any ſnare and temptation.

Ver. 37. Nevertheleſs, he that ſtandeth ſtedfaſt in his heart, &c.] The Apoſtle returns to confirm his former advice, where it can be attended to with ſafety; and obſerves, that notwithſtanding what he had allowed, might lawfully be done, and was proper to be done; yet a man that had deliberated upon, and had well weighed the matter of virginity, the caſe of a ſingle life, and was at a point about it, having no heſitation nor fluctuation of mind concerning it: and alſo having no neceſſity; of acting otherwiſe, either thro' the meanneſs of his circumſtances, or rather through the weakneſs of his virgin, ſhe not having the gift of continency: but hath power over his own will; his daughter's will being the ſame with his, and ſhe entirely conſenting to live a ſingle life; otherwiſe he would have no power of acting as he pleaſed in ſuch a caſe: and hath ſo decreed in his heart; it is a fixed point on mature deliberation, in which he himſelf is hearty and determined, and his child perfectly aſſents to it, ſo that on all hands it is an agreed matter: that he will keep his virgin; at home with him, unmarried, and not give her to any man in marriage: doth well; or that which is for both temporal and ſpiritual profit and advantage, as before obſerved. Some underſtand all this of a man's keeping his own virginity, and determining to continue unmarried.

Ver. 38. So then he that giveth her in marriage doth well, &c.] Does that which is in its own nature good; that which is agreeable to the will of God, is of his inſtitution and appointment, and therefore muſt be good, and anſwer many good ends and purpoſes. Such an one that marries his daughter, he ſeeing a neceſſity for it, and a propriety in it, does a very good thing; ſecures her chaſtity, and his own credit; prevents fornication, and other evils that might follow; conſults the good of mankind, and the honour of religion. But he that giveth her not in marriage doth better; not a better action in itſelf, ſimply conſidered; but more profitable and advantageous under ſuch and ſuch circumſtances, with ſuch and ſuch conditions and conſequences; ſince hereby a ſingle perſon is more fit to encounter with, and endure perſecutions, is freer from the cares of life, and more at liberty to wait upon the Lord, and give up himſelf to his ſervice.

Ver. 39. The wife is bound by the law as long as her huſband liveth, &c.] That is, ſhe is bound to her huſband, by the law of marriage, during his life; nor can the bond of marriage between them be diſſolved but by the death of one of them, except in the caſes of adultery, and wilful deſertion, ſee Rom. vii. 2, 3. But if her huſband be dead; or aſleep, for ſo the word may be rendered; tho' it deſigns death: death is often expreſſed by ſleeping in ſcripture; for the dead will not always remain in ſuch a ſtate, but be raiſed from thence at the laſt day, juſt as perſons are awaked out of ſleep. The Alexandrian copy reads, αποθανη, dead; and ſo ſeems the Ethiopic verſion to have read. She is at liberty to marry whom ſhe will; ſo that ſecond marriages are lawful, tho' condemned by many of the ancients: the liberty of a widow is greater than that of a virgin, becauſe a virgin is under the power, and at the diſpoſe of her parents; but a widow is at her own diſpoſe; and death having diſſolved her former obligation, ſhe is at entire liberty to marry, or not marry, and to marry whom ſhe pleaſes, that is not forbidden by the laws of God: only in the Lord; not that it is abſolutely neceſſary that her huſband ſhould be in the Lord, a converted perſon, a believer in Chriſt; tho' ſuch an one ſhould be moſt deſirable and eligible: but either that ſhe ſhould continue in the poſſeſſion of her faith in Chriſt, and not relinquiſh it for the ſake of an huſband; or that ſhe enter into this ſtate in the fear of the Lord, calling upon him, and conſulting him in ſuch an important affair; and take care that whom ſhe marries is not within the line prohibited by the Lord.

Ver. 40. But ſhe is happier if ſhe ſo abide, &c.] That is, a widow, in an unmarried ſtate; which is to be underſtood not of the happineſs of another world, but of this: the Apoſtle's meaning is, that ſhe would be more free from cares, and leſs liable to trouble, would live with more peace and quietneſs, and be more at leiſure to ſerve the Lord, ſecond marriages oftentimes proving more diſagreeable than the firſt; but in this the Apoſtle only gives his opinion, enjoins nothing by way of command, or in an authoritative manner: and therefore adds, after my judgment; according to his ſenſe of things, and agreeable to the advice he had before given to unmarried perſons, whether virgins or widows, ſuch a perſon was likely to have moſt peace, and leaſt trouble, remaining a widow, than if married, and ſo conſequently more happy: and in order to engage ſuch to regard his counſel, he further ſays, and I think alſo that I have the Spirit of God; that tho' he had no expreſs command, nor did he pretend to any, nor did he lay any injunction on any, but left them to their liberty; yet he could not but think, nay, he was aſſured, though he thus modeſtly expreſſes himſelf, that he was directed to give this advice by the Spirit of God.

CHAP. VIII.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle proceeds to conſider the caſe of eating things offered to idols, which, tho' an indifferent thing, was abuſed by many in the Corinthian church, to the ſcandal and hurt of weak chriſtians; wherefore the Apoſtle diſſuades from the uſe of it, and refutes the arguments which were uſed by them in defence of their practice. And the general foundation on which they proceeded being their knowledge of chriſtian liberty, he begins with that; and makes anſwer to it, by granting, that he, and they, and all had knowledge in general; and by diſtinguiſhing between knowledge and charity, the one puffing up, and the other edifying: wherefore to argue from the one, to the diſuſe of the other, was wrong, ver. 1. ſeeing that kind of knowledge, which was not accompanied with love, was no true knowledge, ver. 2. but that was right which had annexed to it love to God, and our neighbour, ver. 3. and then applies this obſervation to the caſe of things offered to idols; and explains the knowledge which ſome had, and boaſted of, that an idol was nothing, and that there was but one God, ver. 4. which latter he proves and confirms, partly by allowing that there were many nominal gods and lords, both in heaven and earth; but then they were only ſo by name, not by nature, ver. 5. and partly by obſerving the common faith of chriſtians, that there is but one God, and one Lord Jeſus, who are both deſcribed by their names and properties, ver. 6. But now, though there was ſuch knowledge concerning an idol, as nothing, and things offered to it, as indifferent, in ſome, this was not the caſe of all; who, as their knowledge was ſmall, their conſciences were weak, and were defiled by eating ſuch things thro' the example of others, ver. 7. wherefore it became ſuch who had greater knowledge, to abſtain from eating them; partly from the unprofitableneſs of ſuch eating to them with reſpect to divine acceptance, it making them neither better nor worſe, ver. 8. and partly from the hurtfulneſs of it to others, it being a ſtumbling-block to the weak, which ought not to be laid in their way, ver. 9. and emboldening to do ſo likewiſe to the injury of their weak conſciences, ver. 10. and ſo was to the loſs and ruin of their peace and comfort, which is aggravated by their being brethren, and ſuch for whom Chriſt died, ver. 11. Thus by wounding their weak conſciences, they that drew them into this practice, by their example, ſinned both againſt their brethren, and Chriſt himſelf, ver. 12. From all which the Apoſtle concludes, that rather than offend a weak brother, it was right never to eat any fleſh at all; and this he ſtrengthens by his own example and reſolution, ver. 13.

Ver. 1. Now as touching things offered unto idols, &c.] This was another of the things the Corinthians wrote to the Apoſtle about, deſiring to have his judgment in; it was a controverſy that had been before moved, whether it was lawful to eat things that had been ſacrificed to idols. This was conſidered in the council at Jeruſalem, Acts xv. and it was agreed to, that for the peace of the churches, that the Gentiles, among other things, be adviſed to abſtain from them; which, it ſeems, the church at Corinth knew nothing of, for the controverſy was now moved among them: ſome that were weak in the faith, and had not, at leaſt, clear notions of Goſpel liberty, thought it very criminal and ſinful to eat them; others that had, or boaſted they had more knowledge, would not only eat them privately at home, having bought them of the heathen prieſts, or in the common ſhambles, where they were expoſed to ſale, and at publick feaſts, to which they were invited by their friends; but would even go into an idol's temple, and ſit and eat them there, to the great grief and prejudice of weak chriſtians; and what they had to plead in their own defence was their knowledge, to which the Apoſtle here replies: we know that we all have knowledge; which is ſaid either affirmatively and ſeriouſly; and the meaning is, that the Apoſtles, and other chriſtians knew, and were conſcious to themſelves of their light and knowledge, and were aſſured, and might affirm with confidence, that they all, or the moſt part, only ſome few excepted, ſee ver. 7. had the ſame knowledge of chriſtian liberty as they had; knew that an idol was nothing, and that eating meats offered to them could not defile, or do them any hurt; for they were very ſenſible there was nothing common or unclean of itſelf, and yet did not think fit to make uſe of their knowledge to the grieving and wounding of their fellow-chriſtians: or elſe this is ſaid ironically, we are wiſe folks; you particularly are men of knowledge, and wiſdom will die with you; you know that you know; you are very knowing in your own conceits, and very poſitive as to your knowledge. 'Twas the ſaying of Socrates, that this one thing he knew, that he knew nothing; but men wiſe in their own opinion know every thing: knowledge puffeth up; not true knowledge; not that which comes from above, which is gentle and eaſy to be entreated; not ſanctified knowledge, or that which has the grace of God going along with it, that makes men humble, and will not ſuffer them to be puffed up one againſt another; but a mere ſhew of knowledge, knowledge in conceit, mere notional and ſpeculative knowledge, that which is deſtitute of charity or love: but charity edifieth; that is, a man that has knowledge, joined with love to God, and his fellow-chriſtians, will ſeek for that which makes for the edification of others; and without this all his knowledge will be of no avail, and he himſelf be nothing.

Ver. 2. And if any man think that he knows any thing, &c.] Whoever has an opinion of himſelf, or is conceited with his own knowledge, and fancies that he knows more than he does; which is always the caſe of thoſe that are elated with their knowledge, and treat others with contempt, and have no regard to their peace and edification: he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know; if he did, he would know this, that he ought to conſult the peace, comfort, and edification of his brother; and therefore whatever knowledge he may fancy he has attained to, or whatever he may be capable of, and hereafter obtain, for the preſent he muſt be put down for a man that knows nothing as he ſhould do; for he knows neither his duty to God nor man; if he knew the former, he would know the latter.

Ver. 3. But if any man love God, &c.] As they do, and ſhew it, who love their brethren, and are careful not to grieve them; and make uſe of their ſuperior knowledge, not for their deſtruction, but edification: the ſame is known of him; is taught by him, made to know more by him; ſuch an one increaſes in ſpiritual knowledge, or he is highly approved of, eſteemed and beloved by God; he takes a ſpecial and particular notice of him, manifeſts his love to him, and will own and acknowledge him another day, when proud, haughty, overbearing, and hard-hearted profeſſors will be rejected by him.

Ver. 4. As concerning therefore the eating of thoſe things, &c.] The Apoſtle having enlarged on the head of knowledge, which thoſe who made an ill uſe of their chriſtian liberty, urged in favour of their conduct; he returns to the ſubject in queſtion in relation to meats, that are offered in ſacrifice unto idols. The determinations of the Jewiſh ſchools concerning this affair, are as follow, which admit of no manner of profit by them in any ſhape: "a "beaſt, the whole of which they offer to idols, is "forbidden of profit, even its dung, and its bones, "and its horns, and its hoofs, and its ſkin, all is "forbid to be of any profit [y]." Again [z], "fleſh, "or wine, or fruits, which are brought in to be "offered up to idols, are not forbidden to profit "with, although they are brought into the idol's "temple, until they offer them up before it; "הקריבום לפניה, but when offered up before it, "they become an offering; and tho' they may return them, and bring them out, lo, theſe are forbidden for ever; and all that is found in an idol's "temple, even water and ſalt are forbidden of "profit by the law, ואוכל ממנו כל, and he that "eats any thing thereof is to be beaten." Once more [a], "an Iſraelite that lifts up a cheeſe to wor"ſhip it, but does not worſhip it, but a Gentile "worſhips it, it is forbidden of profit, becauſe "the lifting of it up is an action; and ſo if he "lifts up an egg, and a Gentile comes and wor"ſhips it, it is forbidden; he that cuts a gourd, "or any ſuch thing, and worſhips it, it is forbid"den, &c." But by theſe decrees we chriſtians are not bound: we know that an idol is nothing in the world; among the things created by God in the world; for tho' the matter of it may be of God, the form is of men; nor has it any ſhare in the government of the world: and though that of which it may be made, as gold, ſilver, braſs, &c. is ſomething; yet as it is a form and repreſentation of God, it is nothing, becauſe there can be no repreſentation of the inviſible God; it is nothing, that is, it has no divinity in it, it is no God. Tho' it may have an exiſtence, as the ſun, moon, and ſtars, yet not divinity; and in that ſenſe nothing. The Apoſtle here ſpeaks the language of the Jewiſh doctors, who ſay [b], "why doſt thou envy an idol? "שאין בה ממש, ſince it is nothing, or there is no"thing in it." And again [c], "the Rabbins ſay, "ſince, ואין בע״ז ממש, there is nothing in an idol, "why do they call them deities?" Very likely the Apoſtle may have reference to אלילים, the Hebrew word for idols, which ſignifies things of nought, that are good for nothing, are of no value, and are as nothing, Iſ. ii. 20. And that there is none other God but one. This clauſe may be conſidered either as a reaſon of the former, why an idol is nothing, is no deity, is no God, for there is none other God but one, as it may be rendered; or as a part of what believers know; for as they know an idol is nothing, ſo they know both from reaſon and revelation, from the books of the Old and New Teſtament, that there is but one God, and conſequently that idols are nothing, and that they cannot defile them, nor any thing that is offered to them.

Ver. 5. For though there be that are called gods, &c.] That are ſo by name, tho' not by nature; who are called ſo in ſcripture, as angels and magiſtrates, or by men, who give them ſuch names, and account them ſo: whether in heaven; as the ſun, moon, and ſtars: or in earth; as men who formerly lived on earth; or various creatures on earth, who have been accounted deities; or ſtocks and ſtones graven by man's device: as there be gods many; almoſt without number, as were among the Egyptians, Grecians, Romans, and others; yea, even among the Jews, who falling into idolatry, their gods were according to the number of their cities, Jer. ii. 28. and lords many; referring to the Baalim, or the ſeveral idols that went by the name of Baal, or lord, as Baal Peor, Numb. xxv. 3. Baal Zephon, Exod. xiv. 2. Baal Zebub, 2 Kings i. 2. Baal Berith, Judg. viii. 33.

Ver. 6. But to us there is but one God, the Father, &c.] In this Chriſtians and Jews agree with the beſt and wiſeſt philoſophers of the Gentiles, that there is but one God; which is clear from the perfections of God, as neceſſary exiſtence, eternity, infinity, omnipotence, all-ſufficiency, goodneſs, and perfection; from one firſt cauſe of all things; from the government of the world; and from the writings of the Old and New Teſtament; ſo that to us believers this point is out of all doubt: but who this one God is the Gentiles knew not, and the Jews are very ignorant of; but we Chriſtians know him to be the Father; by whom is meant either God eſſentially conſidered, the one God, Father, Son, and Spirit, called the Father, not in relation to any perſon in the Godhead, but in relation to the creatures: ſo this one God, Father, Son, and Spirit, is the Father of ſpirits, the creator of angels, and the ſouls of men, the God of all fleſh, the Father of all the individuals of human nature, the Father or author of all the mercies and bleſſings the children of men enjoy. Or elſe perſonally conſidered, and ſo deſigns the firſt perſon in the Godhead, who is called ſo in relation to his Son, who is ſtiled the only-begotten of the Father: and when he is ſaid to be the one God, it muſt be underſtood, not as excluſive of the Son and Spirit; for if the Son ſtands excluded in this clauſe from being the one God with the Father, by the ſame rule of interpretation, the Father in the next clauſe muſt ſtand excluded from being the one Lord with Chriſt; but as dominion or lordſhip belongs to the Father, ſo deity to the Son, and alſo to the Spirit. Of whom are all things; all created beings and things; angels are of him, are created by him, ſerve and worſhip him; devils are of him, and under him, and at his controul, tho' they have rebelled againſt him; all mankind are of him, and are his offspring; the whole univerſe, the heavens, the earth, and ſeas, and all that in them are, are of him; all things in nature, providence, grace, and glory, come of him; he is the author of every mercy, temporal and ſpiritual. And we in him; or for him; as creatures we are not only made by him, but live in him, and are ſupported in him, and by him, and are created for his glory: tho' this ſeems rather to reſpect what believers are, as new creatures; they are in God; they are intereſted in him as their Covenant-God, and in his everlaſting and immutable love; they are engraven on his hands, and ſet as a ſeal on his heart; they are into him, as it may be rendered; they are brought into nearneſs to him, and communion with him; and are for him, are choſen, redeemed, regenerated, and called for the glorifying of the grace, and to ſhew forth his praiſe. And one Lord Jeſus Chriſt; ſo called, not to the excluſion of the Father and Spirit, but in oppoſition to the lords many before mentioned, and with reſpect to all his people. Chriſt is the one Lord of all, as he is God over all, the creator and former of all things; and he is ſo likewiſe as mediator, having all power, dominion, and government put into his hands: he is, in a ſpecial ſenſe, the one Lord of his people, and that by right of marriage to them; by right of redemption of them; thro' his being an head unto them, and king of them; and by a voluntary ſurrender of themſelves to him, rejecting all other lords, as ſin, ſatan, and the world, who have formerly had dominion over them, they acknowledge him to be their one and only Lord: by whom are all things; in nature; all the created beings of this, or the other world, whether viſible or inviſible, thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers are by him; no creature was made without him, and all by him; and all things in grace, our election, redemption, reconciliation, pardon, juſtification, and everlaſting glory and happineſs. And we by him; we are redeemed by him from ſin, ſatan, the law, death, and hell; we are by him what we are, as chriſtians, as believers in him; by him, and from him, we have all the grace and the ſupplies of it we have; by him we have acceſs to the Father, and fellowſhip with him; by him we are governed, influenced, protected, and preſerved to his kingdom and glory; and by him we are, and ſhall be ſaved with an everlaſting ſalvation.

Ver. 7. Howbeit, there is not in every man that knowledge, &c.] The Apoſtle is not ſpeaking of Heathens, in whom there was no knowledge of the one true God, the author of all things, and of the one Lord Jeſus, the only ſaviour and redeemer; but of Chriſtians, in whom there was the knowledge of theſe things, but not in all of them; the knowledge of this, that an idol was nothing; for tho' they knew that an idol was not God, and had no true deity in it, nor was it any true repreſentation of God, yet fancied that it had an influence upon food that was offered to it, to defile it, and render it unclean, ſo that it ought not to be eaten; and ſince there were ſuch perſons that were ſo ignorant and weak, it became thoſe who had more knowledge to be careful how they laid ſtumbling-blocks in the way of ſuch, to the prejudice of their conſciences: that there were ſuch, the Apoſtle affirms, for ſome with conſcience of the idol unto this hour, eat it as a thing offered unto an idol; that is, there were ſome perſons even at that very time, tho' they had been ſo long converted from heatheniſm to chriſtianity, yet had ſuch an opinion of an idol, that they really thought in their own conſciences, that there were ſomething in an idol, they could not well tell what, that defiled meats offered to it, and made them unlawful to be eaten; and yet, thro' the influence of the examples of others, were prevailed upon to eat of them, having at the ſame time a notion of ſuch food, as if it was not common food, but had received ſome virtue from the idol; and not without ſome reget, and uneaſineſs of mind, as being polluted with it. The Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, read, συνηθεια, through cuſtom of the idol; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion ſeems to have read: and the ſenſe is, that ſome having been formerly accuſtomed to worſhip idols, and to eat things offered to them, as having received ſome virtue from them, ſtill retained an opinion, that there was ſome difference between ſuch meats and others. And their conſcience being weak is defiled; becauſe ſuch act againſt the dictates of their own conſcience; which, though weak, is binding, and ſinn'd againſt, defiles, according to the rules given by the Apoſtle, Rom. xiv. 14, 23.

Ver. 8. But meat commendeth us not to God, &c.] Theſe words are ſaid by the Apoſtle, either as expreſſing the argument of ſuch as had knowledge in favour of themſelves, that what they did was a thing indifferent, by which they were made neither better nor worſe; nor did they look upon it as meritorious, or expect any favour from God on account of it, and therefore were not to be blamed for uſing their liberty in the manner they did: or elſe they are ſpoken by him as his own ſenſe; and the meaning is, that eating of meat, any ſort of meat, and ſo that which is offered to idols, or abſtinence from it, neither one nor the other recommends any to the love and favour of God; לא מקרבא, does not bring near, or give acceſs to God, as the Syriac verſion renders the phraſe; does not ingratiate any into his affectionate regards, or make them acceptable unto him: for neither if we eat are we the better; or abound, not in earthly but ſpiritual things, in the graces of the Spirit, and particularly in the eſteem and good-will of God, upon which ſuch an action can have no influence: neither if we eat not are we the worſe; or are deficient; meaning not in temporal things, but, as before, in ſpiritual; true grace and piety are not a whit the leſs; nor are ſuch perſons leſs in the love and favour of God, which is not to be known and judged of by any ſuch action, or the omiſſion of it.

Ver. 9. But take heed leſt by any means, &c.] This is either a reply to the inſtance of ſuch as argued in favour of eating things offered to idols; or a limitation and explanation of the Apoſtle's own conceſſion, that it made a man, with reſpect to the favour of God, neither better nor worſe: yet care ſhould be taken, leſt this liberty of yours become a ſtumbling-block to them that are weak: he owns they had a liberty, or a right, or power, as the word may be rendered, of eating, or not eating, as they pleaſed; but then they ought to be cautious, leſt they ſhould be the means of offending, or cauſing to offend, ſuch who were weak in the faith, and had not that knowledge of chriſtian liberty they had: not the uſe of their power and liberty is here denied, but the abuſe of it is guarded againſt; for tho' the action itſelf was indifferent, yet as it might be uſed, it might be ſinful, being attended with very bad conſequences, ſuch as hereafter mentioned.

Ver. 10. For if any man ſee thee which haſt knowledge, &c.] That is, not any perſon whatever; not one that has equal knowledge, and can with a good conſcience take the ſame liberty; but one that is weak in the faith, that has not ſuch a clear ſight of the doctrine of chriſtian liberty: if ſuch an one ſhould obſerve one that is famous for his ſuperior abilities, learning, and knowledge, ſit at meat in the idol's temple; or at table, or at a feaſt, where, it ſeems, after the ſacrifice was over, a feaſt was made of what was left, and friends were invited to partake of it: and ſome ſuch there were in this church, who to ſhow their chriſtian liberty, and their knowledge ledge of it, would go and ſit down at theſe feaſts publickly, looking upon ſuch meats as having nothing different from common food, or what they bought in the markets, or brought up as their own: ſhall not the conſcience of him that is weak; in knowledge, who is not clearly inſtructed in the doctrine of chriſtian liberty, but has ſome doubts upon his mind, whether it is lawful to eat ſuch meats, imagining them to be polluted by the idol: be emboldened; Gr. edified; that is, induced by ſuch an example, and confirmed by ſuch an inſtance with boldneſs, and without fear, to eat thoſe things which are offered to idols; contrary to his light, and knowledge, and conſcience; and ſo upon a reflection on what he has done, wound his weak conſcience, deſtroy his peace, and diſtreſs his ſoul. This the Apoſtle propoſes to the conſideration of theſe men of knowledge and liberty, as what might be the caſe, and which they could not well deny, to diſſuade them from the uſe of their liberty, in all places, and times, and under all circumſtances; all which ought to be ſeriouſly weighed and attended to in this buſineſs.

Ver. 11. And thro' thy knowledge, &c.] Theſe words contain an aggravation of the ſin ſuch perſons are guilty of, who are the means, by their example, of enſnaring weak minds, and cauſing them to ſtumble and fall, even in ſome ſenſe ſo as to periſh: ſhall the weak brother periſh, for whom Chriſt died? every word almoſt carries in it an exaggeration of this matter; it is not ſome ſlight injury that is done to the perſon, but even cauſing him to periſh; and this is not ſaid of any perſon, but a brother, to whom the ſtrongeſt affection, and ſtricteſt regard, ſhould be ſhown; and a weak brother, of whom the greater care ſhould be taken; and therefore it is an inſtance of cruelty to do damage to ſuch an one, and that not ignorantly, which can't be pretended, but thro' thy knowledge; not thro' the true uſe, but abuſe of it: thoſe that have knowledge ſhould know better, and improve it to the edification, and not the deſtruction of fellow-chriſtians; and all this done in a caſe of indifference, that might as well be let alone, of which there was no neceſſity for the doing of it: but what aggravates moſt of all is, that this affects a perſon for whom Chriſt died; that he had ſuch a value for as to purchaſe and redeem with the price of his own blood; and yet theſe men made ſo little account of, as by ſo trifling a thing to riſque their good and welfare. Some would from hence conclude the doctrine of univerſal redemption, that Chriſt died for all men, even for them that periſh; but it ſhould be obſerved, that the words are put by way of interrogation, and prove no matter of fact, even ſuppoſing they could be underſtood of eternal ruin and deſtruction; and at moſt only imply the danger and poſſibility thereof thro' offences given, were they not preſerved by the power and grace of God thro' Chriſt, who died for them, and ſo will not ſuffer them to periſh; though this is no thanks to them who lay ſtumbling-blocks in their way, and as much as in them lies, cauſe them to periſh, in this ſenſe: beſides, the periſhing of this weak brother is to be underſtood of his peace and comfort, and is explained by defiling his conſcience, ver. 7. by wounding it, ver. 12. and making him to offend, ver. 13. thro' an imprudent uſe of chriſtian liberty in thoſe who had the greater knowledge, and by a participation of things offered unto idols, in an idol's temple, and not of his eternal damnation in hell; which could never enter into the Apoſtle's thought, as to be brought about hereby, as appears from ver. 8. and ſo is no proof of Chriſt's dying for ſuch as periſh eternally: for thoſe for whom Chriſt has died, he has by his death procured ſuch bleſſings for them, as a juſtifying righteouſneſs, pardon of ſin, peace with God, reconciliation unto him, and eternal ſalvation, which will for ever ſecure them from periſhing in ſuch ſenſe.

Ver. 12. But when ye ſin ſo againſt the brethren, &c.] Through ſitting at meat in an idol's temple, and thereby violating the new commandment of love; by which ſaints are obliged to love one another as brethren, and take care to do nothing that may hurt and prejudice one another's peace and comfort, it being an incumbent duty upon them by love to ſerve one another: and wound their weak conſcience; as before obſerved: it is contrary to the law of love to wound a brother; 'tis an aggravation of the ſin to wound a weak one; what greater cruelty than to ſtrike or beat, as the word here uſed ſignifies, a ſick and infirm man? and greater ſtill to ſtrike and wound his conſcience than any part of his body; for a wounded ſpirit is inſupportable without divine aid and influence; and what ſerves moſt to enhance the crime and guilt is, ye ſin againſt Chriſt, who has ſo loved this weak brother as to die for him; and between whom there is ſo cloſe an union, as between head and members; and from whence ſuch a ſympathy ariſes, that what is done to, or againſt ſuch a perſon, Chriſt takes as done to himſelf. The Syriac verſion emphatically adds, הו, himſelf.

Ver. 13. Wherefore if meat make my brother to offend, &c.] This is the concluſion of the whole, which the Apoſtle makes with reſpect to himſelf, and propoſes for the imitation of others; that ſince an imprudent uſe of chriſtian liberty, in this article of eating things offered to idols, might be attended with ſuch bad conſequences, as to lay a ſtumbling-block in the way of weak chriſtians, and be a means of imboldening them to do things contrary to their conſciences, and ſo break the peace of their minds, wound their ſpirits, grieve and afflict their ſouls, and not only ſo, but ſo to do would be to ſin againſt Chriſt himſelf; rather than do any of theſe things, or be acceſſary to them, he determines, in the ſtrength of divine grace, that he will eat no fleſh while the world ſtandeth; or for ever: not only he reſolves he'll not eat fleſh offered to idols, but no other fleſh, if this was an offence to a weak brother; and he not only concludes to abſtain a few days, or months, or years, but as long as he ſhould live in the world: he choſe rather to live on herbs, or any other food but this, leſt, ſays he, I make my brother to offend: this is truly chriſtian charity, a proof of brotherly love, and it ſhews a concern for the peace and welfare of others, when a perſon foregoes his own right, and drops the uſe of his liberty, rather than grieve, wound, and offend a brother in Chriſt.

CHAP. IX.

THE principal things in this chapter are the proof of the Apoſtle's office and authority; arguments for his own maintenance, and the maintenance of Goſpel-minſters; reaſons why he did not make uſe of his right and privilege in this reſpect; and the whole is concluded with an exhortation to diligence and perſeverance in the chriſtian courſe of life, of which he himſelf was an example. He begins with his office, as an Apoſtle, and proves it; partly by his independency on men, not having his call and miſſion from them; and partly by his corporal ſight of Chriſt, and the authority which he in perſon received from him; and alſo by the ſucceſs of his miniſtry among the Corinthians, ver. 1. wherefore, whatever might be objected to him by other perſons, they had no reaſon to object to his Apoſtleſhip, ſeeing they being converted under his miniſtry, were ſo many ſeals of it, ver. 2. and ſince his call to the miniſtry was firm and valid, he had a right, as other miniſters, to a maintenance of himſelf and family, ſhould he have any, from the churches, without labouring with his own hands, ver. 3, 4, 5, 6. which he proves from the law of nature and nations, exemplified in the caſes of ſoldiers, planters of vineyards, and keepers of flocks, who by virtue of their calling and ſervice have a right to a livelihood, between whom, and miniſters of the Goſpel, there is ſome reſemblance, ver. 7. and alſo from the law of Moſes, particularly the law reſpecting the ox, which was not to be muzzled when it treaded out the corn; and which he obſerves is to be underſtood, not only and barely in the letter of oxen, but of miniſters of the word, who are as huſbandmen that plough and threſh in hope, and therefore ſhould be partakers of their hope, ver. 8, 9, 10. Moreover, the Apoſtle argues the right of the maintenance of the miniſters of the Goſpel, from the juſtice and equity of the thing, that ſeeing they miniſter ſpiritual things, it is but reaſonable that they ſhould receive temporal ones, ver. 11. and which the Apoſtle argues for himſelf, and Barnabas, as from the inſtances of other Apoſtles, ver. 5, 6. ſo from the examples of thoſe that ſucceeded him in Corinth, who were maintained by that church; though he did not think fit, when among them, to claim his right, and make uſe of his power, leſt any check ſhould be put to the progreſs of the Goſpel, ver. 12. And he goes on to make this point clear and manifeſt from the caſe of the prieſts and Levites under the former diſpenſation, who miniſtring in holy things, had a proviſion made for them, ver. 13. And laſtly, from the conſtitution and appointment of Chriſt himſelf, who has ordained it as a law of his, that the preachers of the Goſpel ſhould live of it, ver. 14. tho' the Apoſtle himſelf did not make uſe of this his privilege; nor would he ever make uſe of it, eſpecially at Corinth, for which he gives his reaſons; and his principal one was, that his glorying might not be made void, ver. 15. which did not lie in preaching the Goſpel, for that he was obliged to do, ver. 16. for if he had engaged in it of his own accord, he would have had his reward; but ſince it was thro' neceſſity, he could not claim any, ver. 17. or if any, it could be no other than to preach the Goſpel gratis, and without charge, which was the thing he gloried in, ver. 18. and thus, tho' he lived independent of men, both with reſpect to his office and his maintenance, yet in order to gain ſouls to Chriſt, and be the inſtrument of their ſalvation, he became a ſervant to all, ver. 19. who are diſtributed into three ſorts, the Jews that were under the law, ver. 20. the Gentiles that were without the law, ver. 21. and weak chriſtians, ver. 22. all which he did, not with any lucrative view to himſelf, but for the ſake of the Goſpel, that he might partake of that, and of the glory he was called unto by it, ver. 23. which, and not temporal things, he was looking unto, and preſſing after; and which he illuſtrates by a metaphor taken from the Grecian games, well known to the Corinthians, particularly that of running races, in which all ran, but one only had the prize: wherefore he exhorts the Corinthians to run in like manner, that they may obtain the prize which he mentions, and deſcribes as an incorruptible crown, in oppoſition to a corruptible one, which others ſtrove for, ver. 24, 25. and to this he animates by his own example and conduct, which he expreſſes in terms borrowed from racers and wreſtlers, expreſſive of his humility, ſobriety, and temperance; which things he exerciſed, that whilſt he was a preacher to others, he might not be worthy of reproof and diſapprobation himſelf, ver. 26, 27.

Ver. 1. Am I not an Apoſtle? am I not free, &c.] The Syriac, Ethiopic, and Vulgate Latin verſions, put the laſt clauſe firſt; ſo the Alexandrian copy, and ſome other copies; and many interpreters are of opinion, that it is the beſt order of the words, the Apoſtle proceeding by a gradation from the leſs to the greater, having reſpect either to his freedom in the uſe of things indifferent, as eating of meats, &c. for tho' he did not think fit to uſe his liberty, to the wounding of weak conſciences, it did not follow therefore that he was not free, as ſome might ſuggeſt from what he had ſaid in the latter part of the foregoing chapter: or he may have reſpect to his freedom from the ceremonial law in general; for though, for the ſake of gaining ſouls to Chriſt, he became all things to all men; to the Jews he became a Jew, that he might gain them; yet in ſuch a manner as to preſerve his liberty in Chriſt, without entangling himſelf with the yoke of bondage. Some have thought he intends his liberty, his right to inſiſt upon a maintenance, and that he was no more obliged to work with his hands than other perſons, of which he treats at large hereafter; but to me it rather ſeems, that the words ſtand in their right order; and that, whereas there were ſome perſons that either denied him to be an Apoſtle, or at leaſt inſinuated that he was not one, nor was he to be treated as ſuch, he goes upon the proof of it; and the firſt thing he mentions is his freedom, that is, from men; no man had any authority over him; he was not taught, nor ſent forth, nor ordained by men as a miniſter, but immediately by Jeſus Chriſt, as Apoſtles were; they were ſet in the firſt place in the church, and had power to inſtruct, ſend forth, and ordain others; but none had power over them; and this being the Apoſtle's caſe, proved him to be one; he was an Apoſtle, becauſe he was free: have I not ſeen Jeſus Chriſt our Lord? He had a ſpiritual ſight of him by faith, but that did not ſhew him to be an Apoſtle; this is what he had in common with other believers: whether he ſaw him in the fleſh, before his crucifixion and death, is not certain; it is very probable he might; yet this was no more than what Herod and Pontius Pilate did; but he ſaw him after his reſurrection from the dead, to which he refers, 1 Cor. xv. 8. and deſigns here, as a proof of his Apoſtleſhip, this being what the Apoſtles were choſen to be eye-witneſſes of, Acts x. 41. and publiſh to the world: now our Apoſtle ſaw him ſeveral times; firſt at the time of his converſion, next when in a trance at Jeruſalem, and again in the caſtle where the chief captain put him for ſecurity, and very probably alſo when he was caught up into the third heaven: are not you my work in the Lord? as they were regenerated, converted perſons, and were become new creatures; not efficiently, but inſtrumentally; they were God's workmanſhip, as he was the efficient cauſe of their converſion and faith; his only, as an inſtrument by whom they believed; and therefore he adds, in the Lord; aſcribing the whole to his power and grace: however, as he had been the happy inſtrument of firſt preaching the Goſpel to them, and of begetting them again through it; of founding and raiſing ſuch a large flouriſhing church as they were; it was no inconſiderable proof of his Apoſtleſhip.

Ver. 2. If I be not an Apoſtle unto others, &c.] This is ſaid by way of ſuppoſition, not conceſſion; for he was an Apoſtle to many others; he was an Apoſtle of the Gentiles in general; as the Apoſtleſhip of the circumciſion belonged to Peter, that of the uncircumciſion fell to his ſhare: but however, as if he ſhould ſay, be that as it will, yet doubtleſs I am to you; all the ſigns of Apoſtleſhip were wrought among them; not only the grace of God was implanted in them under his miniſtry, but the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit were received by them through it; and many ſigns, wonders, and mighty deeds were done in the midſt of them by him; ſee 2 Cor. xii. 12. which were ſufficient, to put the matter quite out of doubt with them: for the ſeal of mine Apoſtleſhip, are ye in the Lord; alluding to the ſealing of deeds and writings, which render them authentic; or to the ſealing of letters, confirming the truth of what is therein expreſſed; and the ſenſe is, that their being converted perſons, and ſo openly in the Lord, in union with him; or being made new creatures by the power of his grace, through his preaching, was an authentic proof of his Apoſtleſhip, and ſerved him inſtead of a letter teſtimonial and recommendatory; ſee 2 Cor. iii. 1, 2, 3. Some copies read, the ſeal of my epiſtle, and ſo the Ethiopic verſion.

Ver. 3. Mine anſwer to them that do examine me is this.] Theſe words are referred by ſome to the following, as if the Apoſtle's anſwer lay in putting the queſtions he does in the next verſes; but they rather ſeem to belong to the preceding, and the meaning to be this, that when any perſons called in queſtion his Apoſtleſhip, and examined him upon that head, what he thought fit to ſay in anſwer to them, and in defence of himſelf, was by referring them to the famous church at Corinth, who were as particular perſons, and as a church, his work in the Lord, and every one of them as ſo many ſeals of his Apoſtleſhip; he being the firſt preacher of the Goſpel to them, the founder of them as a church, and the inſtrument of their converſion.

Ver. 4. Have we not power to eat and to drink?] Having proved his Apoſtleſhip, he proceeds to eſtabliſh his right to a maintenance as a Goſpel miniſter; which he expreſſes by various phraſes, and confirms by divers arguments: by a power to eat and drink, he does not mean the common power and right of mankind to perform ſuch actions, which every one has, provided he acts temperately, and to the glory of God; nor a liberty of eating and drinking things indifferent, or which were prohibited under the ceremonial law; but a comfortable livelihood at the publick charge, or at the expence of the perſons to whom he miniſtered; and he ſeems to have in view the words of Chriſt, Luke x. 7, 8.

Ver. 5. Have we not power to lead about a ſiſter, a wife, &c.] The phraſe a ſiſter, a wife, is an Hebraiſm, and anſwers to, אחתי כלה, my ſiſter, ſpouſe, Cant. iv. 9, 10, 12. and v. 1. The Jews called their wives, ſiſters, not on account of religion, which alſo is not the meaning here; but becauſe of the common relation that men and women, all mankind ſtand in to one another, antecedent to any nearer relation, as that of man and wife. The ſenſe the Papiſts put on theſe words, to ſecure them from being a proof of the lawfulneſs of the marriage of the miniſters of the Goſpel, can by no means be the true one; which is, that they are to be underſtood of a rich woman, or women, the Apoſtles had a power to carry about with them, to miniſter of their ſubſtance to them, and provide for them; for ſuch a ſenſe is directly contrary to the ſubject and argument the Apoſtle is upon, which is to ſhow the right that he and others had, of caſting themſelves entirely upon the churches for a maintenance; whereas this is contriving a way for relieving the churches of ſuch a charge; beſides, the act of leading, or carrying about, is expreſſive of ſuch a power over them, as cannot be thought to agree with perſons of ſuch ſubſtance; and whoſe voluntary act this muſt be, to go along with them and ſupply them; add to this, that for the Apoſtles to lead about with them wherever they went women, whether rich or poor, that were not their wives, would be of no good report, and muſt tend to hurt their character and reputation: moreover, though theſe words clearly imply the lawfulneſs of a miniſter's marriage, and ſuppoſe it, yet they do not expreſs the act itſelf, or the lawfulneſs of entring into ſuch a ſtate, but rather what follows after it; and the ſenſe is this, that the Apoſtle and others, ſuppoſing them to have wives, and it may be added alſo and children, they had a right to take theſe with them wherever they went, and inſiſt upon the maintenance of them, as well as of their own, at the publick expence: as well as other Apoſtles; who it ſeems did ſo, that had wives and families, as Philip the Evangeliſt had four daughters, Acts xxi. 8, 9. And as the brethren of the Lord; who it ſeems were married perſons, and took ſuch a method; by whom are meant, James, Joſes, Judas, and Simon; who were the near kinſmen of Chriſt, it being uſual with the Jews to call ſuch brethren: and Cephas; that is, Peter, who 'tis certain had a wife; ſee Matt. viii. 14. and therefore it is with a very ill grace that the Pope, who pretends to be Peter's ſucceſſor, ſhould forbid the marriage of eccleſiaſtical perſons.

Ver. 6. Or I only and Barnabas, &c.] Who were for a great while companions and fellow-travellers; are we alone? are we exempted from thoſe rights and privileges, common to others? have not we power to forbear working? that is, with their hands, at their trades and occupations, to get their living by: Paul worked at his trade, and ſo it ſeems Barnabas did likewiſe: Paul wrought with his hands at Corinth, in company with Aquila and Priſcilla, they being tent-makers as he, Acts xviii. 3. and ſo he did in other places; he appeals for the truth of this, to the elders of the church at Epheſus, Acts xx. 34. and to the church of the Theſſalonians, 1 Epiſt. ii. 9. 2 Epiſt. iii. 8. not but that he had a right and power to leave off buſineſs, to forbear working, and require a maintenance from thoſe to whom he miniſtered; but for ſome reaſons he choſe not to make uſe of this his power and liberty, becauſe he would not be chargeable to them; and leſt that upon his firſt preaching the Goſpel to them, they ſhould think he had worldly ſelfiſh ends in view, and not the good of ſouls, and glory of Chriſt; however, he hereby lets them know, that though Barnabas and he continued to get their bread by their own hand-labour, they had a right to quit their trades, and throw themſelves upon them for a maintenance. The Apoſtle ſeems in this, to imitate the ancient, wiſe and holy men of his nation, who taught the law freely, and took nothing for it; not that they thought it was unlawful, or that they had no right to a maintenance on account of it, but for the honour of religion, and that piety they profeſſed; and leſt the law ſhould be thought to be made a trade of, they choſe not to inſiſt upon it [d].

Ver. 7. Who goeth a warfare any time at his own charges, &c.] Some people have done ſo, as did the Habeſſines [e], and the ancient Romans [f]; though before the Apoſtle wrote this, the ſenate had made an act, that the ſoldiers ſhould have a ſtipend from the public; and this being now ſo common, and univerſally obtaining every where, the Apoſtle puts the queſtion he does; and his meaning is, that ſince miniſters of the Goſpel are the good ſoldiers of Jeſus Chriſt, and are engaged in a warfare ſtate, in fighting the good fight of faith, againſt his enemies, and thoſe of his church, it is but reaſonable that their charges ſhould be bore, and they maintained at the public expence: who planteth a vineyard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? The church of Chriſt is a vineyard, it is often ſo called in ſcripture; miniſters are planters, vine-dreſſers, and labourers in it; and as the myſtical Solomon, the owner of the vineyard, ought to have his thouſand, the cultivators of it, the keepers of the fruit, ſhould have their two hundred, Cant. viii. 12. Or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock? The churches of Chriſt are compared to flocks of ſheep; the miniſters of the word are paſtors, or ſhepherds, who have the care and overſight of them, and feed them with knowledge and underſtanding; and it is but right and juſt, that they enjoy the fruit of their labours, and have a proper and ſuitable maintenance, as it is that he who feeds a flock, ſhould eat of the milk which that produceth.

Ver. 8. Say I theſe things as a man, &c.] After the manner of men, reaſoning from things common among men, and obvious to every one's obſervation: or ſaith not the law the ſame alſo? As the ſubject the Apoſtle is upon, was capable of being illuſtrated and confirmed by inſtances common unto, and eaſy of obſervation among men; ſo it might be ſupported by divine authority; it was not only a clear point from the reaſon of things, but was certain by the law of God.

Ver. 9. For it is written in the law of Moſes, &c.] Deut. xxv. 4. Thou ſhalt not muzzle the mouth of the ox that treadeth out the corn. The manner of threſhing, or beating out the corn among the Jews, was not the ſame with ours; it was not done by the flail, at leaſt not always, but by the means of oxen; and by theſe not only treading upon it to and fro, but drawing a wooden inſtrument after them, the bottom of which was ſtuck with iron teeth, and the top of it filled with ſtones, to preſs it down cloſe by the weight thereof; the ſheaves put in proper form, the oxen were led to and fro upon them, drawing this threſhing inſtrument after them, by which means the grain was ſeparated from the huſk and ear [g]; ſee Iſa. xli. 15. The learned Beckius [h] has given us a figure of this inſtrument, and the manner of uſing it: now according to this law, whilſt the ox was thus employed, its mouth was not to be muzzled, but it might freely eat of the corn it trod upon, excepting, the Jews ſay [i], what was dedicated to ſacred uſes. They give many rules relating to this law, and particularly obſerve, that it is to be extended to all ſorts of creatures, as well as the ox, and to all ſorts of buſineſs [k]; and that what is ſaid of the ox, is much more to be obſerved with reſpect to men [l]; and which agrees with the Apoſtle's reaſoning here: doth God take care for oxen? yes, he does, and for creatures of leſs importance than they, even the fowls of the air, and the moſt worthleſs of them, ſparrows, two of which are ſold for a farthing; but not for them only, nor principally, but chiefly for men.

Ver. 10. Or ſaith he it altogether for our ſakes, &c.] That is, God ſays this, or delivers out this law, forbidding the muzzling the ox, while it treads out the corn; not merely for the ſake of the ox, but chiefly for the ſake of men; and ſo Jarchi upon the place ſays, that the ox is mentioned, להוציא את אדם, to expreſs man; and ſo another of the Jewiſh writers [m] interprets the law in Deut. xxii. 6. Thou ſhalt not take the dam with the young; "the intention of the command is, not to have mercy "on birds, but for the ſake of men, he (God) ſays this, "whom he would accuſtom to meekneſs and com"paſſion:" and particularly this is here ſaid, for the ſake of miniſters of the Goſpel, who for their ſpiritual ſtrength and laboriousneſs in their work, may be compared to oxen; ſee Ezek. i. 10. This law is elſewhere produced by the Apoſtle, and urged in favour of the maintenance of miniſters, as here, 1 Tim. v. 17, 18. and therefore for our ſakes no doubt it is written; to teach men, that as any workmen are not to be deprived of proper ſuſtenance, ſo neither they that labour in the word and doctrine: that he that ploweth ſhould plow in hope; of enjoying the fruit of his labours: and that he that threſheth in hope, ſhould be partaker of his hope; of having a ſupply, out of that he is threſhing.

Ver. 11. If we have ſown unto you ſpiritual things, &c.] The preachers of the Goſpel are compared to ſowers of ſeed; the ſeed they ſow is the word of God, which is like to ſeed, for its ſmallneſs and deſpicableneſs in the eyes of carnal men; and yet as the ſeed is the choiceſt which is laid by for ſowing, the Goſpel is moſt choice and excellent to true believers; like ſeed, it has a generative virtue through divine influence; and whereas unleſs ſown into the earth, it brings forth no fruit, ſo neither does the word, unleſs it has a place in the heart; where, as ſeed in the ground, its operation is ſecret, its increaſe gradual, and its fruitfulneſs different. The ground they ſow upon is very various; ſome of their hearers are like the way-ſide, careleſs, ignorant, and on whom no impreſſion is made; others are like the ſtony-ground, who though for a while expreſs ſome affection and liking, yet not having the root of grace in them, whenever perſecution ariſes, forſake the hearing of it; others are like the thorny-ground, which are at firſt very promiſing, and greatly reformed, but inwardly full of the cares and luſts of the world, which choak the word, and make it unfruitful; and others are like the good ground, who are made good by the grace of God, underſtand the word, receive it, hold it faſt, and in whom it is fruitful: ſowing requires ſkill and art, and ſo preaching the Goſpel does, and that more than human; and is conſtantly in its returning ſeaſon to be attended to, notwithſtanding the winds and clouds, and ſo the miniſtry of the word, notwithſtanding all reproaches, perſecutions, and afflictions; and as the ſame ſort of ſeed, without mixture, and in plenty, is to be caſt into the earth, ſo the ſame pure and unmixed Goſpel of Chriſt, is to be preached, and that without keeping back any thing that is profitable and once more, as the ſower when he has caſt his ſeed into the earth, waits long and with patience for its ſpringing up and increaſe, ſo do the faithful diſpenſers of the Goſpel: and what they ſow or miniſter, is of a ſpiritual nature; it comes from the Spirit of God, he is the dictator of it; he by his gifts qualifies men to preach it, and by his power makes it effectual to the ſouls of men; and through it conveys himſelf to them, as a ſpirit of regeneration and ſanctification: the matter of the Goſpel is ſpiritual; it contains ſpiritual doctrines, ſuch as juſtification, pardon of ſin, adoption, regeneration, &c. and are what concern the ſouls and ſpirits of men, and their ſpiritual and eternal welfare: is it a great thing if we ſhall reap your carnal things? meaning temporal ones, what concern the fleſh, the body, the outward man, and the ſupport thereof. The argument is from the greater to the leſs, and much the ſame with that in Rom. xv. 27. The difference between carnal and ſpiritual things is very great; the one has a vaſtly ſuperior excellency to the other; and therefore if for carnal things men receive ſpiritual ones, they can be no loſers thereby, but muſt be gainers; nor ſhould it be thought any hardſhip or burden upon them, or any great and wonderful thing done by them, to ſupport and maintain ſuch who are ſo uſeful to their ſouls, and the ſpiritual welfare of them.

[l] T. Bab. Bava Metzia, fol. 88. 2.

[m] R. Menachem apud Ainſworth on Deut. xxii. 7. & Druſium in loc.

Ver. 12. If others are partakers of this power over you, &c.] Meaning not any tyrannical power and juriſdiction over them, with reſpect either to faith or practice; but the right of a maintenance, which either the falſe Apoſtles, or the true ordinary miniſters of the word there, juſtly claimed, and did enjoy: are not we rather? he and Barnabas, eſpecially himſelf, who was more than an ordinary miniſter, an Apoſtle, and the firſt preacher of the Goſpel to them: nevertheleſs, we have not uſed this power; though others had, and they had a right to it, but did not chuſe to inſiſt upon it; and rather than do ſo, worked with their own hands; their not making uſe of this power, was not becauſe they ſtood in no need of it, and enjoyed an affluence of temporal things, for the reverſe of this was their caſe: but ſuffer all things; famine, thirſt, nakedneſs, hard labour, and many other hardſhips: leſt we ſhould hinder the Goſpel of Chriſt; ſome might ſuggeſt, that they preached the Goſpel only for gain, and not for the good of ſouls, and glory of Chriſt; and other mean ſpirited perſons might be backward of embracing and profeſſing the Goſpel, leſt it ſhould become chargeable to them; wherefore that the Goſpel might not be retarded in its courſe by the calumny of ſome, and the ſordidneſs of others, the Apoſtle thought fit to drop his claim to a maintenance from them; though at the ſame time he would have them know it was a juſt due, and therefore goes on to defend it by other arguments.

Ver. 13. Do ye not know, that they which miniſter about holy things, &c.] Not the prieſts in the temples of the heathen deities, as the Ethiopic verſion ſuggeſts; but the prieſts in the temple at Jeruſalem, who were employed in ſlaying the ſacrifices, taking off their ſkins, cutting them into pieces, laying them in order with the wood upon the altar, and burning them, with other ſervices they there performed, which were well known to the Corinthians, many of this church being Jews: live of the things of the temple; the tithes and firſt-fruits, and other oblations, and preſents in money or goods, thither brought; nor had they any other way of living and ſupporting their families; for the prieſts and Levites had no inheritance among the children of Iſrael, and therefore proviſion was made for them in this way: and they which wait at the altar, are partakers with the altar; ſome read it, who ſit at the altar; but none might ſit in the temple, but a king of the houſe of David[n]; the prieſts and Levites always ſtood in their miniſtry, ſome doing one thing, and ſome another; ſome ſlew the ſacrifice, others ſprinkled the blood; ſome took away the aſhes, others laid the wood, others brought up the parts of the ſacrifice when ſlain, ſkinned, and cut aſunder, and laid them on the altar[o], and theſe partook with the altar; ſome parts the altar devoured, being conſumed by fire upon it; but then there were other pieces, which by law were reſerved for the prieſts, and upon which they and their families lived: hence the diſtinction of, אכילת מזבח, the food of the altar, and אכילת אדם, the food of man[p]; and therefore as it was but juſt and equitable that perſons ſo employed, ſhould be maintained out of the revenues of the temple and altar, it is but right that Goſpel miniſters ſhould be provided for with a ſuitable maintenance.

Ver. 14. Even ſo hath the Lord ordained, &c.] That is, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, in Matt. x. 10. and Luke x. 7, 8. it is an order and appointment of his, that his miniſtring ſervants, who labour in preaching his Goſpel, ſhould be ſufficiently taken care of, as to a comfortable livelihood; he has not indeed fixed it in the ſame way, as the prieſts and Levites had theirs under the law; but as the one was juſt and right, that they ſhould be maintained out of the things belonging to the temple and altar, and live on them, ſo it is his will and pleaſure, that they which preach the Goſpel; that continue to do ſo, that labour, and not loiter in the word and doctrine, who do the work of the miniſtry fully and faithfully, and not bear the name only of Goſpel preachers: ſhould live of the Goſpel; not the Goſpel itſelf, which is ſpiritual, and not corporal food; but the ſenſe is, that in conſideration, and becauſe of their preaching the Goſpel, they ſhould be ſupplied with the proper neceſſaries of life: the learned Mr. Mede has proved, by various inſtances, that the word Ευαγγελιον, here rendered Goſpel, and which ſignifies good news and glad tidings, is in other writers uſed for a reward, given to ſuch that bring good tidings; and has rightly obſerved, that the Hebrew word בשרה, which ſignifies the ſame, is uſed in a like ſenſe, in 2 Sam. iv. 10. and accordingly the ſenſe here will be, that it is the ordination of Chriſt, that ſuch who faithfully bring the good news and glad tidings of ſalvation to ſinners, ſhould as a reward for ſuch good news, be provided for with a comfortable maintenance, on which they ſhould live.

Ver. 15. But I have uſed none of theſe things, &c.] Either none of theſe arguments or reaſons, for a miniſter's maintenance, taken from the reaſon of things, the law of Moſes, the examples of the prieſts and Levites, and the order and appointment of Chriſt, in favour of himſelf, and that he might be provided for by them accordingly; or none of the things he had a right to do as other Apoſtles, as to eat and drink at the publick expence, to lead about with him a ſiſter, a wife, had he any, and to forbear working with his own hands: neither have I written theſe things, that it ſhould be ſo done unto me; it was not on his own account, that he gave theſe ſtrong reaſons, urged theſe inſtances, and ſo undeniably proved this point, that miniſters ſhould be maintained by the people; and this he ſays, to prevent what ſome might be ready enough to ſuggeſt, that though the Apoſtle had as yet took nothing of the church at Corinth, it was plain, that for the time to come, he meant to do it; and therefore had written theſe things with ſuch a view, to make way for his after ſupply from them. This he denies, and gives his reaſon for it, for it were better for me to die; through want, with famine, could he be ſupplied no other way, than to take the leaſt farthing of them: or than that any man ſhould make my glorying void; meaning not ſo much his inward pleaſure, joy, and ſatisfaction in preaching the Goſpel freely, it being more bleſſed to give than to receive; but his boaſting or glorying, not before God, but againſt the falſe Apoſtles; that he had never taken any thing of the church at Corinth for preaching, nor never would, when they had inſinuated he preached for gain, and by artful methods had got their money, and drained their purſes.

Ver. 16. For though I preach the Goſpel, I have nothing to glory of, &c.] The ſenſe is not, that if he preached the Goſpel in order for a livelihood, and to ſerve his private advantage, he ſhould have no room for glorying; ſince if this was the caſe, he ſhould be obliged to do it, or periſh for want: but his meaning is, that though he preached the Goſpel ever ſo well, or ever ſo freely, and might glory before men, and againſt the falſe teachers, who inſulted him in his character and office; yet not before God, from whom he received all his gifts, abilities, and qualifications, to preach the Goſpel; all his light and knowledge in it; all his enlargements in meditation, and liberty in expreſſion; all his faithfulneſs and integrity, courage and intrepidity, in the diſcharge and performance of his work, were by divine grace and aſſiſtance; and his ſucceſs in it, owing to the power and Spirit of God, ſo that he had nothing to glory of on any of theſe accounts: hence theſe words are a correction, or rather an explanation of the preceding: for neceſſity is laid upon me; not of getting a livelihood by preaching, for he could have got, and did get this another way, even by labouring with his hands; nor of force and compulſion, for no one more readily engaged in it, or more chearfully performed it; but of obligation from the divine call to this work, and from his own conſcience, in which he knew it to be an heavenly one, and from the nature of the truſt committed to him, and becauſe of the good of immortal ſouls, and the honour of Chriſt; all which lay with weight upon him, and obliged him in duty, love, and gratitude, to attend to it: yea, wo is unto me, if I preach not the Goſpel; which is to be underſtood, not of any temporal affliction, as reproach, perſecution, famine, nakedneſs, ſword, &c. for ſuch ſort of woes frequently attend thoſe, that do preach the Goſpel; but of the wounding of his conſcience, and expoſing himſelf through the neglect of his calling, and contempt of the divine will, to the wrath and curſe of God for ever; not that the Apoſtle feared this would be his caſe, or that it poſſibly could be; but he thus ſpeaks, to ſhew what he or any other miniſter of the Goſpel would deſerve, at the hand of God, who having abilities to preach, ſhould not make uſe of them; or ſhould preach, but not the Goſpel; or only a part of it, and not the whole; or ſhould entirely deſiſt from it, through ſelf-intereſt, or the fear of man, or through being aſhamed of Chriſt and his Goſpel, or as not able to bear the reproach and perſecution attending it.

Ver. 17. For if I do this thing willingly, &c.] That is, not freely and without receiving any thing for preaching, without ſeeking any temporal profits and advantages; nor in pure love to Chriſt, and the good of ſouls, without any fear of puniſhment, or hope of reward; but the Apoſtle ſuppoſes a caſe which was not, and his ſenſe is, that ſuppoſing no neceſſity had been laid upon him, or any injunction or command given him to preach the Goſpel, but he had entered on it without any obligation upon him, then ſays he, I have a reward; or ſhould have one, or might expect one; ſo the Jews [g] ſay, that a reward is given to him, who does any thing unbidden: but if againſt my will, or unwillingly, a diſpenſation of the Goſpel is committed to me; which was his caſe; the Goſpel was committed to his truſt, as any thing is to the truſt and charge of a ſteward by his Lord, who is obliged to take care of it, and is accountable for it, and of whom faithfulneſs is required; he did not undertake this œconomy, or diſpenſation of the Goſpel of himſelf, of his own mind and will, but it was enjoined him by one that had the command over him, and could and did oblige him to take the charge of it; though he made him willing, as well as able to do it: and therefore ſince this was the caſe, that it was not at his own option whether he would preach the Goſpel or no, but he was obliged to it by one, that had a ſuperior power and influence over him; hence tho' he performed it ever ſo well, and with never ſo much faithfulneſs and integrity, he aſks in the following verſe,

Ver. 18. What is my reward then? &c.] None at all, I have none to expect, hope for, or claim, in a way of debt; I am a ſervant entruſted by my Lord with the Goſpel, and an unprofitable one I am; I do at moſt and beſt, but what's my duty, and for that I can claim no reward: all the reward that remains is only this, verily, that when I preach the Goſpel, which I am obliged to do, I may make the Goſpel of Chriſt without charge; to them that hear it, as he did to the Corinthians, which was his glorying in ver. 15. and is the ſame with his reward here; for this means not any reward from God, but his glorying among men, and againſt the falſe teachers; that when he preached the word at Corinth, he was not chargeable to any, nor would he ever be: his reaſon for it is, that I abuſe not my power in the Goſpel; his right of having a maintenance, whilſt he was preaching the Goſpel; to have made uſe of which, would have been an abuſe of it, ſince it would have given occaſion to the falſe Apoſtles, to reproach and calumniate, and might have been an hindrance to the Goſpel of Chriſt, and a ſtumbling to ſome weak minds.

Ver. 19. For though I be free from all men, &c.] As an Apoſtle, being in the higheſt office in the church, he had none ſuperior to him, that could exerciſe any power and authority over him, and was alſo independent of men for his maintenance, which he got by his own hand labour: though it may be obſerved, that the word men is not in the original text, and the word all may as well have reſpect to things as men; and the ſenſe be, that he was free, as from the curſe of the moral law, ſo from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and all the rituals of it, and might if he would, make uſe of his chriſtian liberty; the following verſes ſeem to incline to this ſenſe, as the preceding ones do to the former: yet have I made myſelf ſervant unto all; in faithfully and indefatigably preaching the Goſpel to them; undergoing all manner of affliction and perſecution for the ſake of that and them; behaving towards them with all meekneſs and humility; condeſcending to their weakneſs, and accommodating himſelf to their capacities and cuſtoms: that I might gain the more; than other Apoſtles have done, or than it could be reaſonably thought he ſhould, had he behaved in a more lordly and domineering manner: his end was not to amaſs wealth, to gain riches and treaſures of good things to himſelf, but many ſouls to Chriſt, who otherwiſe muſt have been loſt; but being brought to the knowledge of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him through his miniſtry, it was profit to them, and gain to Chriſt: the metaphor is taken from merchants, who ſpare no pains, but take every method to acquire gain and profit; the miniſters of the word are ſpiritual merchants, their traffick lies in the ſouls of men, whom they are ſtudiouſly and anxiouſly careful to bring to Chriſt.

Ver. 20. And unto the Jews I became as a Jew, &c.] That is, in religion; or with reſpect to ſome religious obſervances peculiar to the Jews, for he himſelf was really a Jew by nature; who became as one unto them in this ſenſe, when he for their ſakes circumciſed Timothy at Derbe, or Lyſtra, purified himſelf at Jeruſalem, ſhaved his head at Cenchrea, obſerved their ſabbath, and abſtained from ſome ſorts of food forbidden in the law; and his end in ſo doing was, not to confirm them in ſuch uſages, but that he might hereby have the greater influence over them, and by little and little bring them off of theſe things, or as he ſays, that I might gain the Jews; bring them over to Chriſt, and off of a dependance on their own righteouſneſs, for juſtification before God: to them that are under the law, as under the law; the Vulgate Latin verſion adds, when I was not under the law, and ſo the Alexandrian copy and ſome others; by whom ſeem to be meant, the ſame perſons as before; though ſome have thought that the Samaritans are intended, and others the Sadducees; but if any as diſtinct from the former are deſigned, they ſhould rather ſeem to be the converted Jews; who though they believed in Chriſt, looked upon themſelves to be ſtill under the law, and therefore obſerved it; with whom the Apoſtle on certain occaſions complied, as if he was under it too, that he might have the greater ſhare in their affections and credit; hoping in time that by ſuch means, he might be able to prevail upon them to relinquiſh theſe things, and wholly attend to the Goſpel and ordinances of Chriſt, or, as he ſays, that I might gain them that are under the law; meaning the Jews, who were obſervers of the law of Moſes.

Ver. 21. To them that are without law, as without law, &c.] Meaning the Gentiles, who though they were not without the law of nature, nor without many good civil laws, by which the more cultivated and civilized nations among them were governed, yet they were without the written law of Moſes; a deſcription of the Gentiles, uſual with the Jews; ſee Rom. ii. 12, 14. And to theſe the Apoſtle accommodated himſelf, as if he was without the law; by converſing with them without any difference; by eating any ſort of food with them; by not circumciſing Titus, when the Jews would have had it done; and by reſiſting Peter, when he by his example would have influenced the Gentiles to have lived as did the Jews: being not without law to God; or the law of God, the moral law; for though he was delivered from the curſe and condemnation of it, and as a covenant of works, and the miniſtry of it by Moſes, yet not from the matter of it, and obedience to it, as a rule of walk and converſation; and therefore his compliance with the Gentiles, was not in any thing that was contrary to the moral law; nor did he act as one that had nothing to do with that law, but as one that was under the law to Chriſt, or under the law of Chriſt; that is, the law of love, which obliged him to take every lawful and proper method for the good of ſuch ſouls: that I might gain them that were without law; to believe in Chriſt for life and ſalvation, and to ſerve the law of God as in the hands of Chriſt, the only law-giver and king in his church; in teſtimony of their gratitude to him, for the bleſſings of grace received by him, without having any dependance on their obedience to it, for acceptance with God.

Ver. 22. To the weak became I as weak, &c.] That is, to weak chriſtians, who were weak in faith, and had not ſuch clear knowledge of Goſpel liberty, and therefore ſcrupled the eating of ſome ſorts of meat, and particularly meats offered to idols; and the Apoſtle ſo far conſulted the peace and edification of theſe weak brethren, and ſo far complied with them, and became as one of them, that rather than offend them, he determined to eat no meat while the world ſtood: that I might gain the weak; promote their edification and welfare, who otherwiſe might be ſtumbled, be in danger of falling from, and laid under a temptation to deſert the faith of the Goſpel: I am made all things to all men; which is to be underſtood, as in all the other inſtances of his being ſo, not in caſes and things criminal and ſinful, contrary to the moral law, and the dictates of his own conſcience, ſubverſive of the Goſpel of Chriſt, and of the order and diſcipline of it, but in caſes and things of an indifferent nature: that I might by all means ſave ſome; that is, that he might be the means of ſaving ſome of Jews and Gentiles, and of all ſorts of men; by preaching the Goſpel of ſalvation to them, and by directing them to Chriſt, the only Saviour of loſt ſinners; thus he explains what he means, by ſo often ſaying that he might gain them.

Ver. 23. And this I do for the Goſpel's ſake, &c.] The Alexandrian copy and ſome others read, all things I do, &c. and ſo the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions; that is, he became all things to all men, and ſo and ſo to different perſons; not for his own ſake, for his own temporal advantage, or to curry favour with men; not for the ſake of gaining wealth, or honour and applauſe to himſelf, but for the ſpread of the Goſpel, and its greater uſefulneſs among men: to which he adds, that I might be partaker thereof with you; meaning either the fruit of the Goſpel, the converſion and ſalvation of ſinners, which would be matter of joy both to him and them; or the bleſſings of grace and eternal life, which the Goſpel reveals and promiſes, which he deſired to enjoy in common with others, not only with the Corinthians, for the word you is not in the original text, but with Jews and Gentiles; with men of all ſorts, who may be gained over to Chriſt, and ſaved by him, through the miniſtry of the word.

Ver. 24. Know ye not that they which run in a race, &c.] The alluſion in this and the following verſes, is to the Grecian games, which conſiſted, among other things, of running of races, and of wreſtling, combating, and fighting; and which are in this and the context, particularly mentioned; and the Apoſtle the rather makes uſe of theſe terms, and refers to theſe things, becauſe they were well known to the Corinthians, and refers to them as well known; for the Iſthmian games were performed in their neighbourhood, and doubtleſs had been ſeen by many of them, for the Corinthians were preſidents of them. The race, or ſtadium in which they ran, was the ſpace or interval between the place they ſet out from, and that which they ran unto, and conſiſted of 125 paces, or 625 feet; it was the ſpace of a furlong, and about the eighth part of a mile: in this they run all; as many as would, that came around from all parts, ſtriving who ſhould be foremoſt and get the crown: but one receives the prize; which was held by the preſident of the game, or judge of the race, and received by the winner, who was judged to be ſo by him; and was no other in the Iſthmian games, which are moſt likely to be referred to here, than a crown made of pine-tree branches, or leaves, and ſometimes of dried parſly[a]: ſo run that ye may obtain. The Apoſtle accommodates or applies the above account to the chriſtian's courſe of life, and exhorts to run in it in like manner, as racers do in a race. The ſtadium, or race plot in the which the believer runs, is this world, or this preſent life; he is only a runner now and here, for no ſooner is the time of his departure come, but his courſe or race is finiſhed; and, as his forerunner Chriſt, ſits down in full reſt from all his labours as at a table, with Abraham, Iſaac, and Jacob, and on a throne with Chriſt: the courſe he runs, includes the exerciſe of every grace, particularly faith, which is expreſſed not only by going to Chriſt, walking in him, but by fleeing and running to him; and the diſcharge of every duty, ſignified by a running in the way of God's commandments; and in a word, the whole of a chriſtian profeſſion, and the holding of it faſt, and holding on in it unto the end. The act of running is a motion forward, a following on to know the Lord, a going from ſtrength to ſtrength, from one degree of grace to another, a preſſing forward toward the mark for the prize; and requires ſpiritual ſtrength from Chriſt, and a daily renewal of it; is to be performed with readineſs, ſwiftneſs, and chearfulneſs, in oppoſition to a ſlowneſs of heart to believe, and a ſlothfulneſs and ſluggiſhneſs in the buſineſs and ſervice of Chriſt. The manner of running, ſo, that is, as the Grecians ran in their races; they ran all, ſo ſhould all believers run, miniſters and churches, churches and the ſeveral members thereof, old and young profeſſors; ſo the church determines for herſelf, her members, and the daughters of Jeruſalem, we will run after thee, Cant. i. 4. and they have this encouragement which the others had not, for only one received the prize with the Grecians, but here all, that run well, obtain: again, they ran and ſtrove to be foremoſt, who ſhould get to the goal firſt and receive the prize, ſo ſhould believers be emulous to outdo each other, to go before one another, in faith and holineſs; ſtriving in the ſtrength of Chriſt, who ſhould do moſt ſervice for him, and bring moſt glory to him: moreover, as they ran in the way that was marked out for them, not turning to the right-hand or the left, ſo ſhould believers run in the way of ſalvation, which is Chriſt; in the way of holineſs, faith, and truth; and in the path of duty and ordinances, which are all clearly pointed out unto them: once more, as they while running kept their eye upon the mark, ſo ſhould believers while running the race ſet before them, be continually looking to Jeſus, the author and finiſher of faith: to ſay no more, as they kept running till they came to the end of their race, ſo ſhould the ſaints; there's no time for ſtopping or looking back; remember Lot's wife. The end of running, is to obtain the prize, the incorruptible crown of eternal life; not that this is to be procured in a way of merit by running; for the beſt ſervices of the ſaints have no merit in them, they are previouſly due to God, nor can they be profitable to him; and beſides, are done by the aſſiſtance of his own grace and ſtrength; nor is there any proportion between the beſt works of men, and this crown of glory, life, and righteouſneſs; yea, ſalvation, or eternal life, is expreſly denied to be of him that willeth, or of him that runneth, and is always repreſented as this crown is, to be a free-gift: the meaning of the expreſſion is, that believers are to run on in their chriſtian race, that they may, and when they are come to the end of it, they ſhall, as he that came foremoſt in the race did, ſtretch forth their hand, lay hold on, and receive the crown which the righteous judge will give them; and is the true import of the word made uſe of here, and the ſenſe the ſame with 1 Tim. vi. 12. Fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life, and denotes that the perſevering ſaint ſhall enjoy the crown.

Ver. 25. And every man that ſtriveth for the maſtery, &c.] Either in running a race, or in wreſtling; for the word here uſed agrees with both, and both are in the context referred to, nor has the Apoſtle as yet done with his alluſion to running in a race: is temperate in all things; contains himſelf from venery, abſtains from certain ſorts of food, which tend to hinder the agility, or weaken the ſtrength of the body; and indulges not himſelf in ſloth and idleneſs, but exerciſes himſelf in various manners, that he may be prepared for running or wreſtling: the Apoſtle's view in this, ſeems to be to ſtrengthen ſome exhortations he had already given, to abſtain from fornication, and the immoderate uſe of venery; to forbear eating things offered to idols, and not give themſelves up to luxury and intemperance; for ſhould they be overcharged with ſurfeiting and drunkenneſs, and the cares of this life, they would be very unfit for their chriſtian race, or for wreſtling with principalities and powers, and the diſcharging of the buſineſs of a chriſtian profeſſion: now they do it to obtain a corruptible ruptible crown; they confine themſelves to a certain diet and courſe of living, and abſtain from things otherwiſe deſirable to nature; and this they do for the ſake of a fading crown, a crown of leaves, made of the boughs and leaves of olives, laurels, pine, &c. or of parſly, green or dried, as before obſerved [t]: but we an incorruptible; even eternal life; compared to a crown, for the riches, glory, and luſtre of it; and as ſuitable to the character and dignity of ſaints, who are kings as well as prieſts unto God: it is called incorruptible, becauſe it is ſo in its own nature; nor can it be corrupted by other things, as crowns even of gold may; nor ſhall any corrupt perſon wear it; the corruption of nature muſt be removed from the ſaints, yea, that frailty and mortality of human nature, which ſometimes goes by the name of corruption, muſt be taken away, e'er they can inherit this crown and kingdom; nor will it ever fade away, as the corruptible crowns of the conquerors in theſe games did, and that in a very ſhort time; but this will laſt for ever, and always continue in the ſame glory and luſtre.

[a] Schmid. Prolegom. in Iſthm. Pindar, p. 5, 6. & Not. in Olymp. p. 312. Paſchalius de Coronis, l. 6. c. 27. p. 441.

Ver. 26. I therefore ſo run, &c.] The Apoſtle animates the Corinthians by his own example, telling them that he ran ſo as he exhorted them; he ran with chearfulneſs and ſwiftneſs in the way marked out for him, looking to Jeſus; continuing ſtedfaſt in the profeſſion of his faith, and diſcharge of his duty as a chriſtian, and in preaching the Goſpel as a miniſter; and nothing had he more at heart, than to finiſh his courſe with joy: not as uncertainly; as one that knew not, or was in doubt about the way in which he ſhould run, and ſo ran in and out, ſometimes in the way, ſometimes out of it; ſince it was clearly pointed out to him in the word of God: the alluſion is to the white line which was drawn from the place the runners ſet out at, to the goal; ſo that they did not run uncertainly, nor could they be at a loſs to ſteer their courſe: nor did the Apoſtle run, for what, as the Syriac verſion renders it, מא ידיע, is unknown: he knew what he ran for, for the incorruptible crown of glory, he knew the nature of it; nor was he uncertain as to the event and iſſue of his running; he knew that this crown was laid up ſafe and ſecure, that it would be given him, and he ſhould wear it; he had no doubt at all about it; and with this certain knowledge both of the way and prize, and full aſſurance of faith and hope, he ran: ſo fight I, not as one that beateth the air. The alluſion is here to fighting with the fiſt, when before the combat was entered on, the perſon uſed to ſwagger about, and beat about with his fiſts, ſtriking the air with them, having no adverſary before him; only ſhowing what he could do if he had one, or when he ſhould encounter: ſo did not the Apoſtle, he did not fight with his own ſhadow, or a man of ſtraw, or beat the empty air; but gave home blows to real adverſaries, ſatan, the world, and the fleſh; the latter of which is particularly mentioned in the next verſe.

Ver. 27. But I keep under my body, &c.] The alluſion is ſtill to fighters, who by cuffing and boxing, give their antagoniſts black and blue eyes; which is the proper ſignification of the word here uſed: ſo it is ſaid [u] of Menedemus, that in queſtions or ſcholaſtic exerciſes, he was ſo vehement and pugnacious, that he never departed without υπωπια φερων, carrying away black and blue eyes. This is not to be underſtood by the Apoſtle of his natural body, and of his keeping it under by immoderate watchings, faſtings, and labours, or by whipping and ſcourging, and lying upon the bare ground, and other ſuch practices; but of the body of ſin, the corruption of nature, and of that being laid under ſome reſtraints; of the mortifying the deeds of the body through the Spirit, of crucifying the affections with the luſts, of putting off the old man with his deeds, as concerning the former converſation, and of making no proviſion for the fleſh, to fulfil the luſts thereof: it ſeems to be the ſame with what the Jews call [w], כובש יצרו, a ſubduing of a man's evil concupiſcence: who is a ſtrong man? they ſay [x], הכובש את יצרו, he that ſubdues his corruption, according to Prov. xvi. 32. and again [y], "the ſons of Ulam were mighty and powerful men; "כבשין יצריהון, ſubduing their corruptions, as a "man that draws a bow with wiſdom." And bring it into ſubjection; ſo as not to ſerve and obey it in the luſts thereof; but to have the aſcendant of it, and government over it, that it does not, and cannot reign as it formerly did: the alluſion is ſtill to the combatant, who gets and keeps his antagoniſt under him, and has the command of him, and throws him on the ground, or drags him about at pleaſure: leſt that by any means when I have preached to others; the Goſpel of the grace of God, for their ſouls profit and advantage, to gain and ſave them; and have called upon them ſo to run, that they might receive and enjoy the incorruptible crown: I myſelf ſhould be a caſt away; or rejected, or diſapproved of; that is, by men: the Apoſtle's concern is, leſt he ſhould do any thing that might bring a reproach on the Goſpel; leſt ſome corruption of his nature or other, ſhould break out, and thereby his miniſtry be juſtly blamed, and be brought under contempt; and ſo he be rejected and diſapproved of by men, and become uſeleſs as a preacher: not that he feared he ſhould become a reprobate, as the word is oppoſed to an elect perſon; or that he ſhould be a caſt-away eternally, or be everlaſtingly damned; for he knew in whom he had believed, and was perſuaded of his intereſt in the love of God, and that he was a choſen veſſel of ſalvation, that could not be eternally loſt: tho' ſuppoſing that this is his ſenſe, and theſe his fears and concern, it follows not as neither that he was, ſo neither that he could be a loſt and damned perſon: the fears of the ſaints, their godly jealouſies of themſelves, and pious care that they be not loſt, are not at all inconſiſtent with the firmneſs of their election, their ſecurity in Chriſt, and the impoſſibility of their final and total falling away; but on the contrary are over-ruled, and made uſe of by the Spirit of God, for their final perſeverance in grace and holineſs.

CHAP.

CHAP. X.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle cautions the Corinthians againſt ſecurity on account of their gifts, knowledge, and profeſſion, ſince men of great characters, and enjoying high privileges, have fallen into ſin, and have been ſeverely puniſhed; and he particularly cautions againſt idolatry, and all appearances of it, on which account he again introduces the caſe of eating things offered to idols, and diſſuades from it, when it tended to idolatry, and had the appearance of it; tho' in ſome caſes he allows of eating them, but directs that all ſhould be done to the glory of God, and without offence to any, as they had him for an example. And now, whereas in the latter part of the preceding chapter he had ſignified his jealouſy of himſelf, leſt he ſhould be a caſt-away, he purſues the thought, and improves it to the uſe of the Corinthians, that they, on account of their high attainments, ſhould not think themſelves ſecure of all danger; and for this purpoſe ſets before them the inſtances and examples of the Jewiſh fathers, of which he would not have them ignorant, who were perſons that enjoyed great privileges, and were partakers of things which bore ſome reſemblance to Goſpel-ordinances; as their paſſing under the cloud thro' the ſea, was a figure of baptiſm, and their eating manna, and drinking water out of the rock, which was a type of Chriſt, had ſome likeneſs to the ordinance of the Lord's ſupper, of eating his fleſh, and drinking his blood, which are meat and drink indeed in a ſpiritual ſenſe, ver. 1, 2, 3, 4. and yet all theſe perſons that enjoyed theſe privileges were not acceptable to God; nor did they enter into the land of Canaan, but fell in the wilderneſs, ver. 5. in which they were examples to men under the Goſpel-diſpenſation, that they may ſhun the evils which were the cauſe of their fall and overthrow, ver. 6. particularly idolatry, of which their making and worſhipping the golden calf is an inſtance, ver. 7. alſo fornication, on account of which three and twenty thouſand fell in one day, ver. 8. likewiſe tempting Chriſt, which brought upon them deſtruction by the fiery ſerpents, ver. 9. moreover, murmuring againſt God, and his ſervants, for which reaſon the deſtroyer was ſent among them, and deſtroyed them, ver. 10. All which happened, and are recorded for the uſe, inſtruction, and admonition of profeſſors of religion in theſe laſt times, ver. 11. from all which the Apoſtle infers, by way of caution, to the ſaints, that they ſhould not be ſecure of ſtanding, but take heed leſt they fall, ſince ſo many, and ſuch great perſons had before fallen, ver. 12. But for their comfort, under afflictions, he obſerves, that as they were common to men, ſo the faithfulneſs of God was concerned to ſupport them under them, deliver them out of them, that they might not utterly fail of the grace of God, and periſh by them, ver. 13. And in order to their ſtanding, he particularly dehorts them from idolatry, ver. 14. and every appearance of it, as eating things offered to idols, in an idol's temple, which is what he has chiefly in view, as appears by the following verſes: and whereas they were men of wiſdom and judgment whom he addreſſed, he was the more encouraged to uſe the following arguments with them, the force of which they would underſtand, ver. 15. And his firſt argument is taken from the Lord's ſupper, and the communion of his body and blood, which believers have with him in eating the bread, and drinking the wine; ſuggeſting, that in like manner ſuch who eat things offered to idols, as ſuch, had communion with them, and ſo were guilty of idolatry, and therefore ſhould be abſtained from, ver. 16. His next argument is taken from the union and communion which ſaints have one with another at the Lord's table, whereby they appear to be one body and one bread; and ſo ſuch that aſſociate themſelves with idolaters in their temples, and eat with them things offered to idols, are one with them in a like ſenſe, and chargeable with idolatry, ver. 17. To which is added a third, taken from the prieſts of the Iſraelitiſh nation, who eating of the ſacrifices, were partakers of the altar, worſhipped the God of Iſrael, and had communion with him; and ſo in like manner eating of the ſacrifices offered to idols, and eſpecially in one of their temples, might be very well interpreted a partaking of their altars, a worſhipping of them, and ſo idolatry, ver. 18. not that he thought that an idol was to be conſidered as a deity, or that things offered to it were upon an equal foot with the Lord's ſupper, or Jewiſh ſacrifices, ver. 19. but as there was a communion in the one, ſo in the other; for as for the ſacrifices of the Gentiles, they were offered to devils, and not to God; and which he mentions to deter them from having the moſt diſtant regard to ſuch ſacrifices, ver. 20. it being the moſt inconſiſtent, as well as ſhocking thing in the world, to partake of both cups and tables, thoſe of the Lord, and thoſe of devils, ver. 21. wherefore the Apoſtle diſſuades from ſuch idolatrous practices, from the pernicious and dangerous conſequences of them, ſtirring up the Lord to jealouſy, fighting againſt him, and being deſtroyed of him, ver. 22. But inaſmuch as things offered to idols were in themſelves indifferent, the Apoſtle directs to a proper uſe of them; and obſerves, that tho' they might be lawfully eaten, yet the expediency of time and place, and the edification of others, ought to be conſidered, ver. 23. for we are not to ſeek our own pleaſure, but the welfare of others, ver. 24. If indeed ſuch meat is ſold in the butchers ſhambles in common with others, it may be bought and eat, when no queſtions are aſked about it, what it is, ver. 25. and that for this reaſon, becauſe the earth, and all that is in it, are the Lord's, and his people have a right to all thro' him, and therefore may make uſe of every creature in it, ver. 26. So if an idolater invites a believer to dine with him, and he accepts the invitation, he may very lawfully eat whatever is before him, even tho' it be meat offered to idols, provided he aſks no queſtions about it, ver. 27. But ſhould any one preſent point at certain meat, and ſay that was offered to idols, then it was adviſeable not to eat of it; partly for the ſake of the unbeliever that pointed at it, who would be hardened in his idolatry by it; and partly for the ſake of the conſcience of a weak believer preſent, who might be offended at it; and the reaſon given to enforce ſuch a conduct, is becauſe there is plenty of other food without it, ver. 28. And then the Apoſtle explains whoſe conſcience he means; not the conſcience of him that is invited, but either of the unbeliever, or the weak brother; and ſuggeſts a reaſon why he ſhould not make uſe of his liberty in their preſence, and under ſuch circumſtances, leſt it ſhould be cenſured and condemned, ver. 29. or he be reproached for what he had, thro' good-will, and had reaſon to be thankful for, ver. 30. wherefore, upon the whole, the Apoſtle adviſes in this affair, and in all others, to have the glory of God in view in the firſt place, ver. 31. and next to that to be careful not to offend any ſort of perſons whatever, ver. 32. and propoſes himſelf as an example in theſe things to be followed; who ſought not his own advantage, but the pleaſure and profit of others, and to promote, as much as in him lay, their ſalvation, and not hinder it, ver. 33.

Ver. 1. Moreover, brethren, I would not that ye ſhould be ignorant, &c.] The Apoſtle having ſuggeſted his own fears and jealouſies, leſt notwithſtanding all his gifts and grace, he ſhould be left to do any thing that might be a means of laying him aſide, and rendering him uſeleſs in his miniſterial work; and which he hints for the uſe of theſe Corinthians, who boaſted of their knowledge, and made an imprudent uſe of their chriſtian liberty, to the hurt of weak minds; he proceeds to lay before them the caſe of the Jewiſh fathers, who, notwithſtanding the many favours and privileges they were bleſſed with, yet falling into luſt, fornication, intemperance, and idolatry, their carkaſſes fell in the wilderneſs, and entered not into the land of reſt; wherefore the Apoſtle would not have them be ignorant, or unmindful, or take no notice of theſe things, ſince they were for enſamples to them, and written for their admonition, and were warnings to them to take care leſt they ſhould alſo fall: particularly the Apoſtle's view is to diſſuade from the eating of things offered to idols, tho' a thing indifferent, and from their imprudent uſe of their chriſtian liberty with reſpect unto it; ſince, it was not only doing an injury to weak believers, but it likewiſe expoſed themſelves to danger, who by uſing ſuch freedom as to ſit in an idol's temple, and there publickly eat, might be drawn into idolatry itſelf; nor ſhould they depend upon their knowledge, and gifts, and attainments, ſince it is clear from theſe inſtances, that the higheſt external privileges, favours, and enjoyments, can't ſecure men from falling: for which purpoſe it was proper to call to mind, how that all our fathers were under the cloud; which was a ſymbol of the divine preſence with the Iſraelites, as it was on mount Sinai, and in the tabernacle and temple; was a protection of them, being in the day-time as a pillar of cloud to ſcreen them from the ſcorching heat of the ſun, and in the night-time as a pillar of fire to preſerve them from beaſts of prey, as well as in both to guide and direct them in the way; and was a type of Chriſt, who is a covert from the heat, as well as the wind and ſtorm; a protection of his people from the vindictive juſtice and wrath of God, and from the rage and fury of men and devils. This alſo might expreſs the ſtate and condition of the former diſpenſation, which was dark and obſcure in compariſon of the preſent one, in which ſaints, with open face, behold the glory of the Lord; and likewiſe the ſtate of the people of God in this world, even under the preſent diſpenſation, who in compariſon of the heavenly glory, and the beatific viſion the ſaints enjoy there, ſee but thro' a glaſs darkly. This cloud, which is ſometimes repreſented as a pillar, was not an erect ſolid body, which was at ſome diſtance before the Iſraelites, and merely as a guide, but was all around them; it was before them, and behind them, and on each ſide, and was over them; ſee Numb. xiv. 14. ſo that the Apoſtle rightly ſays they were under it. And to diſtant beholders in the day-time it looked like a pillar of cloud; and in the night-time, the ſun being down, it looked like a pillar of fire; for one and the ſame thing is meant by both: and ſo the Jews ſay [z], that "the pillar of "cloud, סובבו, encompaſſed the camp of Iſrael, "as a wall encompaſſes a city, nor could the enemy "come at them." Hence thoſe alluſions to it in Iſ. iv. 5. Zech. ii. 5. The Jews indeed ſpeak of ſeveral clouds of glory; nor are they agreed about the number of them: "when the people of Iſrael were "travelling in the wilderneſs, they ſay [a], they had "clouds of glory, מסחרן, that ſurrounded them, "four at the four winds of the world, that the evil "eye might not rule over them, וחד מן עלויהון, "and one above them, that the heat and ſun, as "alſo the hail and rain, might not have power "over them; and one below them, which carried "them as a nurſe carrieth her ſucking child in her "boſom; and another ran before them at the diſtance of three days journey, to level the mountains, and elevate the plains, and it ſlew all the "fiery ſerpents and ſcorpions in the wilderneſs." And elſewhere [b] 'tis ſaid, "how many were the "clouds of glory, מקיפין, that encompaſſed Iſrael "in the wilderneſs? R. Hoſhea and R. Joſiah are "divided. R. Joſiah ſays five, four at the four "winds, and one went before them. R. Hoſhea "ſays ſeven, four at the four winds of the heavens, "and one, מלמעלן, above them, and one below "them, and one ran before them;" to which he aſcribes the above effects: but the ſcripture ſpeaks but of one cloud, which departed at the death of Moſes: and all paſſed thro' the ſea; the red ſea, in a very miraculous manner; Moſes by a divine order lift up his rod, and ſtretched out his hand over it, and the Lord by a ſtrong eaſt wind cauſed it to go back, and made it dry land; the waters were divided, and roſe up as a wall, on the right hand, and on the left, ſo that the children of Iſrael paſſed thro' it on dry ground, and all came ſafe to ſhore, and not one periſhed; and yet but two of theſe entered into the land of Canaan. Origen [c] ſays, "he had heard it as a tradition from the ancients, "that in the paſſage thro' the ſea, to every tribe "of Iſrael were made ſeparate diviſions of water, "and that every tribe had its own way open in "the ſea." And indeed this is a tradition of the Jews, whom he means by the ancients, or at leaſt ſuch who had received it from them; by which it appears to be a very ancient one. "R. Eliezer "ſays [d], that in the day in which the waters flowed, and were congealed together, there were "twelve paths made, according to the twelve "tribes, and the waters became a wall." The ſame is related by others [e]: Mahomet has it in his Alcoran [f], in which he was aſſiſted by a Jew, and from whom he doubtleſs had it. He obſerves, it was ſaid to Moſes, "ſmite the ſea with thy rod, "and when he had ſmitten it, it became divided "into twelve parts, between which were as many "paths, and every part was like a vaſt mountain." But be this as it will, it is certain that they all paſſed thro' it, and came ſafe to ſhore.

Ver. 2. And were all baptized unto Moſes, &c.] In or by Moſes; and ſo the Syriac verſion renders it, ביד מושא, by the hand of Moſes; by his means and direction, he going before, they followed after him into the ſea, and paſſed through on dry land, and came out on the ſhore, which carried in it a reſemblance of baptiſm; when they believed the Lord, and his ſervant Moſes, Exod. xiv. 31. and gave up themſelves to him as their leader and commander thro' the wilderneſs: and this their baptiſm was in the cloud, and in the ſea; which may be conſidered either as together or ſeparately; if together, the agreement between them and baptiſm lay in this; the Iſraelites when they paſſed thro' the red ſea, had the waters on each ſide of them, which ſtood up as a wall higher than they, and the cloud over them, ſo that they were as perſons immerſed in and covered with water; and very fitly repreſented the ordinance of baptiſm as performed by immerſion; and which is the way it was adminiſtred in the Apoſtles time, to which he refers; and is the only way it ought to be adminiſtred in; and in which only the Iſraelites paſſage thro' the ſea, and under the cloud, could be a figure of it: or this may be conſidered ſeparately, they were baptized in the cloud; which was either, as Gataker [g] thinks, when the cloud went from before the face of the Iſraelites, and ſtood behind them, and was between the two camps, to keep off the Egyptians from them, which as it paſſed over them let down a plentiful rain upon them, whereby they were in ſuch a condition as if they had been all over dipp'd in water; or their being all under the cloud, and all over covered with it, was a repreſentation of the ordinance of baptiſm, in which a perſon is all over covered with water; and then they were baptized in the ſea, as they paſſed thro' it, the waters ſtanding up above their heads, they ſeemed as if they were immerſed in it. Very great is the reſemblance between that paſſage of theirs, and baptiſm. For inſtance, their following Moſes into the ſea, which is meant by their being baptized into him, was an acknowledgment of their regard unto him, as their guide and governour, as baptiſm is a following of Chriſt, who has left us an example that we ſhould tread in his ſteps; and is an owning him to be our prophet to teach us, and lead us the way; and it is a profeſſion of our faith in him, as our ſurety and ſaviour, and a ſubjection to him as our king and governour. This their baptiſm in the ſea was after their coming out of Egypt, and at their firſt entrance on their journey to Canaan's land, as our baptiſm is, or ſhould, be after a perſon is brought out of worſe than Egyptian bondage and darkneſs, and has believed on the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and at the beginning of his profeſſion of him, and entrance on his chriſtian race. The deſcent of the Iſraelites into the ſea, when they ſeemed as buried in the waters, and their aſcent out of it again on the ſhore, has a very great agreement with baptiſm, as adminiſtred by immerſion, in which the perſon baptized goes down into the water, is buried with Chriſt therein, and comes up out of it as out of a grave, or as the children of Iſrael out of the red ſea; and as they, when they came out of it, could rejoice and ſing in the view of their ſalvation and ſafety, and of the deſtruction of all their enemies, ſo the believer can, and does rejoice in this ordinance, in the view of his ſalvation by Chriſt, and ſafety in him, and of all his ſins being buried and drowned in the ſea of his blood; witneſs the inſtances of the eunuch and jailor. But tho' the Iſraelites were all in this ſenſe baptized, yet they did not all inherit the land of Canaan.

Ver. 3. And did all eat the ſame ſpiritual meat.] Meaning the manna; and which the Jews alſo call [h], 'מאכל רוחני, ſpiritual food, as alſo their ſacrifices [i], 'לחם רוחני, ſpiritual bread: not that the manna was ſo in its own nature; it was corporal food, and ſerved for the nouriſhment of the body; but either becauſe it was prepared by angels, who are miniſtring ſpirits, at the command of God, and hence called angels food, Pſ. lxxviii. 25. or rather, becauſe it had a myſtical and ſpiritual meaning in it; it was not the true bread, but was typical of Chriſt, who is ſo: it reſembled Chriſt in its original; it was prepared of God, as Chriſt is, as his ſalvation prepared before the face of all his people; it was the free gift of God, as Chriſt is to the myſtical Iſrael; it came down from heaven, as Chriſt, the true bread of life did: it anſwered to him in its nature; it was in form round, expreſſive of his being from everlaſting to everlaſting, and of the perfection both of his divine and human natures; it was in colour white, ſignifying his purity of nature, and holineſs of life and converſation; it was in quantity ſmall, ſetting forth his outward meanneſs and deſpicableneſs in the eyes of men; and in quality it was ſweet in taſte, as Chriſt, and all the bleſſings and fruits of his grace are to believers. The uſefulneſs of the manna was very great, a vaſt number, even all the Iſraelites, were ſupplied with it, and ſupported by it for forty years together, as all the elect of God, and the whole family of Chriſt are by the fulneſs of grace which is in him; and as in order that it might be proper and ſuitable food, it was ground in mills, or beaten in a mortar, and baked in pans; ſo Chriſt was bruiſed, and wounded, and endured great ſufferings, and death itſelf, that he might be agreeable food for our faith: and as the Iſraelites had all an equal quantity of this food, none had more or leſs than others, ſo all the ſaints have an equal ſhare and intereſt in Chriſt, in his blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice; as they have the ſame like precious faith, they have the ſame object of it. To ſay no more, as the manna was the food of the wilderneſs, or of the people of Iſrael, whilſt travelling in it, ſo Chriſt, and the fulneſs of grace that is in him, are the food and ſupply of the ſpiritual Iſrael, and church of God, whilſt they are paſſing thro' this world to the heavenly glory. Now tho' all the Iſraelites did not eat of Chriſt, the true bread, which was typified by the manna; yet they all eat the ſame food, which had a ſpiritual meaning in it, and a reſpect to Chriſt, but did not all enter into the land flowing with milk and honey.

Ver. 4. And did all drink the ſame ſpiritual drink, &c.] By which is meant the water out of the rock, which was typical of the blood of Chriſt, which is drink indeed, and not figurative, as this was, for which reaſon it is called ſpiritual; or of the grace of Chriſt, often ſignified by water, both in the Old and New Teſtament; and is what Moſes and the law could not give; for righteouſneſs and life, grace and ſalvation, could never be had by the works of the law: and very unpromiſing it was, and is to carnal men, that theſe ſhould come by a crucified Chriſt, as it was to the Iſraelites, that water, in ſuch plenty, ſhould guſh out of the rock in Horeb; but as thoſe waters did not flow from thence without the rock being ſtricken by the rod of Moſes, ſo the communication of the bleſſings of grace from Chriſt, is thro' his being ſmitten by divine juſtice with the rod of the law; thro' his being ing ſtricken for the tranſgreſſions of his people, and being made ſin, and a law-curſe in their room and ſtead. And as thoſe waters continued thro' the wilderneſs as a conſtant ſupply for them, ſo the grace of Chriſt is always ſufficient for his people; a continual ſupply is afforded them; goodneſs and mercy follow them all the days of their lives: for they drank of that ſpiritual rock that followed them; by which the Apoſtle means not Chriſt himſelf, for he went before them as the angel of God's preſence, but the rock that typified him; not that the rock itſelf removed out of its place, and went after them, but the waters out of the rock ran like rivers, and followed them in the wilderneſs whereever they went, for the ſpace of eight and thirty years, or thereabout, and then were ſtopp'd, to make trial of their faith once more; this was at Kadeſh when the rock was ſtruck again, and gave forth its waters, which, as the continual raining of the manna, was a conſtant miracle wrought for them. And this ſenſe of the Apoſtle is entirely agreeable to the ſentiments of the Jews, who ſay, that the Iſraelites had the well of water all the forty years [k]. The Jeruſalem Targum [l] ſays of the "well "given at Mattanah, that it again became unto "them violent overflowing brooks, and again aſ"cended to the tops of the mountains, and de"ſcended with them into the ancient vallies." And to the ſame purpoſe the Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel [m], "that it again aſcended with them "to the higheſt mountains, and from the higheſt "mountains it deſcended with them to the hills, "and encompaſſed the whole camp of Iſrael, and "gave drink to every one at the gate of his own "dwelling-place; and from the high mountains it "deſcended with them into the deep vallies." Yea, they ſpeak of the rock in much the ſame language the Apoſtle does, and ſeem to underſtand it of the rock itſelf, as if that really went along with the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs. Thus one of their writers [n] on thoſe words, muſt we fetch you water out of this rock? makes this remark: "for they knew it not, "לפי שהלך הסלע, for that rock went, and re"mained among the rocks." And in another place 'tis ſaid [o], "that the rock became in the "form of a bee-hive; (elſewhere [p] it is ſaid to be "round as a ſieve) and rolled along, ובאת עמהם, "and came with them, in their journies; and when "the ſtandard-bearers encamped, and the taber"nacle ſtood ſtill, the rock came, and remained in "the court of the tent of the congregation; and "the princes came and ſtood upon the top of it, "and ſaid, aſcend, O well, and it aſcended." Now, tho' in this account there is a mixture of fable, yet there appears ſomething of the old true tradition received in the Jewiſh church, which the Apoſtle has here reſpect to. And the rock was Chriſt; that is, it ſignified Chriſt, it was a type of him. So the Jews [q] ſay, that the Shekinah is called, סלע קדוש, the holy rock; and Philo the Jew ſays [r] of this rock, that the broken rock is, η σοφια τȣ Θεȣ, the wiſdom of God. Chriſt may be compared to the rock for his outward meanneſs in his parentage and education, in his miniſtry and audience, in his life and death; and for his height alſo, being made higher than the kings of the earth, than the angels in heaven, and than the heavens themſelves; and for ſhelter and ſafety from the wrath of God, and from the rage of men; and for firmneſs, ſolidity, and ſtrength, which are ſeen in his upholding all things by his power, in bearing the ſins of his people, and the puniſhment due unto them, in the ſupport of his church, and bearing up his people under all afflictions and temptations, and in preſerving them from a total and final falling away: and a rock he appears to be, as he is the foundation of his church, and every believer, againſt which hell and earth can never prevail; and to it he may be likened for duration, his love being immoveable, his righteouſneſs everlaſting, his ſalvation eternal, and he, as the foundation of his church, abiding for ever.

Ver. 5. But with many of them God was not well pleaſed, &c.] As he is with none but thoſe that are in Chriſt; and with none of the ſervices of men, but what are done in faith, which become acceptable to him thro' Jeſus Chriſt; for in him only perſons and ſervices are accepted with God; and this was the way of acceptance in the Old, as in the New Teſtament-diſpenſation: how many of the Jewiſh fathers God was not well pleaſed with, or took no delight in, but hated and abhorred, which is the ſenſe of the phraſe here, whether they were the greateſt part or not is not certain; however, they were not all, excepting Joſhua and Caleb, as ſome interpreters underſtand it; for not all that died in the wilderneſs, were out of the ſpecial grace and favour of God, witneſs Moſes, Aaron, Miriam, and it is to be ſuppoſed and hoped, hundreds and thouſands more; but the Apoſtle has reſpect to ſuch who were the inſtances of God's direful vengeance and diſpleaſure, as appears from the reaſon given; for they were overthrown in the wilderneſs: he does not ſay merely that they died there, for many with whom God was well pleaſed died there; but theſe, their carkaſſes fell in the wilderneſs, being ſtricken, thrown down, and overthrown by the immediate hand of God; they did not die a common death, according to the ordinary courſe of nature; but by the plague, or by the ſword, or by fire from heaven, or by fiery ſerpents, or by a deſtroying angel, or by one judgment or another, as hereafter-mentioned.

Ver. 6. Now theſe things were our examples, &c.] Or types; that is, theſe puniſhments which were inflicted on theſe perſons for their ſins, were deſigned as inſtructions for others to avoid the like ſins, that they may eſcape the ſame puniſhment; juſt as the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, being condemned with an overthrow, as theſe men were, were made enſamples to all that ſhould hereafter live ſuch vitious lives and converſations; and in a very lively manner, as in a type or print, theſe exhibited the diſpleaſure of God againſt ſin, what ſuch muſt expect who commit it; ſo men are called out of Babylon, leſt partaking of her ſins, they alſo receive of her plagues. The Jews have a common ſaying [s], שאירע לאבות סימן לבנים, that what happened to the fathers is a ſign unto the children; to which the Apoſtle may have reſpect: to the intent that we ſhould not luſt after evil things. The Apoſtle proceeds to enter into particular inſtances, in which theſe things were examples, teaching us to avoid ſin, and ſo puniſhment; and begins with luſt, which is the root and foundation of all ſin; all the evil in the world ariſes from it, and the world itſelf is full of it, and is in God's account the ſame as action: and here he particularly ſtrikes at thoſe Corinthians, that luſted after the feaſts in the idols temples; and hints that that aroſe rather from a carnal ſenſual appetite which ought not to be indulged, than from any other principle: as they alſo luſted; that is, after evil things, the fiſh, the cucumbers, the melons, the leeks, onions, and garlick of Egypt, Numb. xi. 4, 5, 6. which tho' they were not evil in themſelves, yet the Iſraelites ſinned in luſting after them, in not being content with the manna; the food which God had prepared for them; and beſides, their deſire after theſe things did not ariſe from want, but from a ſenſual appetite, and was attended with murmuring againſt the Lord and his ſervants, and was highly reſented; for tho' the Lord gave them fleſh according to their deſire, yet while it was between their teeth, he ſent a plague among them, by which multitudes were taken off, and the name of the place was called, קברות התאוה, Kibroth Hataavah, the graves of luſts; the people that luſted being buried there, Numb. xi. 34.

Ver. 7. Neither be ye idolaters, &c.] To which they ſeemed inclined to be, at leaſt there was great danger that ſuch they would be, by carrying their liberty to ſuch a pitch, as to ſit in an idol's temple, and there eat things ſacrified unto them; and which the Apoſtle cautions againſt, and uſes arguments to diſſuade them from in the following part of this chapter: as were ſome of them, as it is written, the people ſat down to eat and drink, and roſe up to play; referring to Exod. xxxii. 6. when the Iſraelites, whilſt Moſes was in the mount, made a molten calf, and worſhipped it, built an altar before it, and inſtituted a feaſt and a play; and which was performed by dancing about the calf, and ſinging to the honour of it, ver. 18, 19. for their ſitting down to eat and drink, is not to be underſtood of an ordinary meal, but of a feaſt kept in honour of the golden calf, and which they covered by calling it a feaſt to the Lord; and their playing alſo was on the ſame account, in imitation of the heathens, who made feaſts, and appointed plays to the honour of their deities: ſome indeed, interpret [t] this laſt action of uncleanneſs, which they committed after their feaſt was over, and which alſo was ſometimes done in the heathen temples, the word being ſometimes uſed in this ſenſe; ſee Gen. xxxix. 14, 17. but others underſtand it of the act of idolatry; ſo two of the Chaldee paraphraſes interpret the words in Exodus [u]; they roſe up to play, בפולחנא נוכראה, in ſtrange ſervice, i. e. idolatry; and tho' the Apoſtle does not mention their puniſhment, yet it was a very great one, three thouſand perſons fell by the ſword on that account, ver. 28.

Ver. 8. Neither let us commit fornication, &c.] To which the Corinthians were much addicted: hence the Apoſtle elſewhere, in this epiſtle, makes uſe of arguments to diſſuade from it, as he does here, they judging it to be no evil: as ſome of them committed; i. e. fornication; as they did at Shittim, with the daughters of Moab, Numb. xxv. 1. which was a ſtratagem of Balaam's, and the advice he gave to Balak king of Moab, to draw them into that ſin, which made way for their commiſſion of idolatry, which they committed by eating the ſacrifices of their Gods, and bowing down unto them; particularly they joined themſelves to Baal Peor, the ſame with Priapus, one part of whoſe religious rites lay in acts of uncleanneſs, and this brought the divine diſpleaſure on them: and fell in one day, three and twenty thouſand; in Numb. xxv. 9. the number is ſaid to be twenty and four thouſand; and ſo ſay all the three Targums on the place [w], and both the Talmuds [x], and others [y]; on the other hand, all the Greek copies of this epiſtle, and the Oriental verſions agree in the number of twenty and three thouſand; ſo that it does not appear to be any miſtake of copies, in either Teſtament. To reconcile this matter, or at leaſt to abate the difficulties of it, let the following things be obſerved; as that the Apoſtle does not write as an hiſtorian, and ſo not with that exactneſs as Moſes did; beſides, he does not ſay that there fell only three and twenty thouſand, and this being a leſſer number than Moſes's, is contained in his, and ſo a certain truth; moreover, Moſes and the Apoſtle uſe different words in their account; Moſes ſays there died ſo many, including the heads of the people that were hanged up againſt the ſun, and all that periſhed by the ſword; the Apoſtle ſays, that there fell ſuch a number, referring only to the latter, who only could be properly ſaid to fall, and not thoſe that were hanged up: now the heads of the people that ſuffered the firſt kind of death, might, as is very probable be a thouſand; and they that died in the other way, three and twenty thouſand, which make the ſums to agree, and both are expreſſed by Moſes, under the general name of a plague or ſtroke; add to all this, that the Apoſtle uſes a limiting clauſe, which Moſes does not, and ſays that theſe three and twenty thouſand fell in one day. So that it is very likely that the heads of the people, ſuppoſed to be a thouſand, were hanged up in one day; and the three and twenty thouſand that fell by the ſword, died the next, which the Apoſtle only takes notice of. Hence the Jew [z] has no reaſon to charge the Apoſtle with an error.

Ver. 9. Neither let us tempt Chriſt, &c.] As all ſuch perſons do, who preſuming on the power and grace of Chriſt to keep them, or upon what they have received from him, unneceſſarily expoſe themſelves to ſnares and temptations, and ſo to danger; and as many of the Corinthians did, who are here chiefly reſpected, who truſting to their gifts and attainments, their knowledge and chriſtian liberty, would go into an idol's temple, ſit down at meat there, and expoſed themſelves to great and imminent danger; which was a tempting Chriſt, whether he would preſerve them or no: as ſome of them alſo tempted; that is, as ſome of the Iſraelites tempted, which they did more than once; but what is referred to here, is the time they ſpake againſt God and Moſes, in Numb. xxi. 5, 6. as appears from the puniſhment annexed, their being deſtroyed by ſerpents. The Arabic verſion adds him, meaning Chriſt, which is a right interpretation of the text; otherwiſe there would be no force in the Apoſtle's reaſoning; for Chriſt was the angel that went before the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs, the angel of God's preſence, that bore, and carried, and ſaved them; he is the Jehovah they tempted at Maſſah, and Meribah, and elſewhere, and God they ſpake againſt at this place referr'd to; hence it is clear that our Lord exiſted before his incarnation, and that he is truly and properly God; the Alexandrian copy reads, neither let us tempt God, and ſo the Ethiopic verſion: and were deſtroyed of ſerpents; fiery ones, which were ſent among them by the Lord Chriſt, they tempted and ſpoke againſt, which bit them, and of which bitings many of them died. This might lead to the conſideration of the original cauſe of man's ſin and fall, and the ruin of human nature, by the means of a ſerpent; and may be an emblem of the future deſtruction of the wicked, which will be everlaſting fire, prepared for the devil, the old ſerpent, and his angels.

Ver. 10. Neither murmur ye, &c.] Againſt the true Apoſtles of Chriſt, and faithful miniſters of the word; nor againſt the laws and ordinances of Chriſt, or providences of God; ſo ſome of the members of this church did, or were inclined to do: as ſome of them alſo murmured; as againſt the Lord, ſo againſt Moſes and Aaron. The people of Iſrael were very prone unto, and often guilty of this ſin; but what the Apoſtle here has reſpect unto, is either their murmuring upon the report the ſpies made of the good land, Numb. xiv. or that of Korah and his company againſt Moſes and Aaron, as principal officers, who were for ſetting all upon a level; and of all the people againſt them, for the death of theſe men, Numb. 16. and were deſtroyed of the deſtroyer; meaning either ſome judgment of God upon them, as the earth's opening and ſwallowing up Korah and all that belonged unto him; and the fire that came down from heaven, and conſumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incenſe; and the plague which ſwept away fourteen thouſand and ſeven hundred of thoſe that murmured againſt Moſes and Aaron, on the account of the death of the ſaid perſons; and any other judgment by which the carkaſſes of thoſe fell in the wilderneſs, that murmured upon the report of the ſpies; or elſe ſince angels were uſually employed by God, in inflicting ſuch judgments, by the deſtroyer may be meant an angel, ſuch an one as ſmote the firſt-born in Egypt, and bears the ſame name, Heb. xi. 28. and as ſmote Iſrael with a peſtilence upon David's numbring the people, and was about to have deſtroyed Jeruſalem, had he not been reſtrained, 2 Sam. xxiv. 15, 16. and as ſmote an hundred fourſcore and five thouſand in the camp of the Aſſyrians, in one night, 2 Kings xix. 35. So that tho' an angel may be intended, it is not neceſſary on account of the character given him, to underſtand an evil angel; 'tis true indeed, that ſatan is by the Jews[a] called, המשחית, the deſtroyer; and Samael the ſame with ſatan, is called the angel of death; to which the alluſion is in Heb. ii. 14. and evil angels are frequently ſtiled, מלאכי חבלה, deſtroying angels[b]; as diſtinct from miniſtering ones, and to which ſome think the Apoſtle here refers.

Ver. 11. Now all theſe things happened unto them, &c.] All theſe puniſhments came upon them in various ways, not by chance, but by the will of God, and as their ſins deſerved: and were for enſamples; to others, to their future poſterity, and to the churches of God in all ages: and they are written for our admonition; that men in a church-ſtate particularly may take warning, by theſe inſtances of their ſin and puniſhment, to avoid the one and eſcape the other, and not preſume upon their external priviledges and favours: upon whom the ends of the world are come; or in whom the ends of ages are met; for the Apoſtle does not mean this material viſible world, the univerſe and all things in it, which has continued ſince the writing of this, about ſeventeen hundred years; but the Jewiſh ages, or times of the Moſaic œconomy, which begun when theſe inſtances of ſin and puniſhment were, and which now in the times of the Apoſtles were at an end; every thing in thoſe periods that were figurative and emblematical, having their fulfilling end and accompliſhment, and alſo were now abrogated: likewiſe the ages or times of Gentile darkneſs and ignorance may be intended, which now were come to an end, thro' the light of the Goſpel, and the power of God attending the miniſtration of it; and hence the ends both of the Jewiſh and Gentile ages may be ſaid to come upon, or meet in the Apoſtles and their times, who had the advantage of looking back on former ones, and of receiving inſtruction from thence.

Ver. 12. Wherefore let him that thinketh he ſtandeth, &c.] Since the Jewiſh fathers who enjoyed ſuch peculiar favours and eminent priviledges, had ſuch various judgments inflicted on them; ſince they ſtood not, but many of them were viſible inſtances of God's diſpleaſure; they were overthrown and caſt down, their carkaſſes fell in the wilderneſs, and entered not into the land of reſt; therefore all ſuch perſons who think themſelves ſafe and ſure, truſting to themſelves, or depending upon the knowledge and gifts they have, the favours and priviledges they enjoy; every one of theſe ſhould take heed leſt he fall. This advice was exceeding proper, whether it be conſidered as ſpoken to true believers, or formal profeſſors; for true believers may fall into temptation, into ſin, from a degree of ſtedfaſtneſs in the Goſpel, and from a lively and comfortable exerciſe of grace; but not finally, totally, and irrecoverably; ſince they are encloſed in the arms of everlaſting love, ſecured in the hands of Chriſt, built on a foundation that will never fail, and are kept by an almighty power which can never be overcome; but yet, ſince they may fall to the diſhonour of God, the reproach of the Goſpel of Chriſt, the grieving of the Spirit of God, the wounding of their own ſouls, the ſtumbling of weak believers, and the ſtrengthening of the hands of the wicked; ſuch an exhortation is not ſuperfluous, even to ſuch; and many, and ſtrong are the reaſons and arguments, why they ſhould take heed leſt they fall; nor are admonitions needleſs to that which God's decree and promiſe ſecure; ſince theſe are often the means, in and by which God executes his decree, and makes good his promiſe; ſee Acts xxvii. 22, 24, 31. Moreover, if this exhortation be conſidered as given to formal profeſſors, it is very pertinent; for ſuch as theſe may fall, as they often do, from that which they ſeemed to have, from the truths of the Goſpel, and a profeſſion of them, and into ſcandalous ſins, and at laſt into condemnation; and the rather ſince the apoſtacy of ſuch perſons, is injurious to the honour and intereſt of true religion; hereby the ways of God are evil ſpoken of, the name of Chriſt blaſphemed, profane ſinners hardened, and weak believers ſtumbled, as by the falls of real chriſtians: beſides, it muſt be worſe for themſelves, who hereby bring upon themſelves a ſevere puniſhment; ſee 2 Pet. ii. 21. and indeed, theſe ſeem to be the perſons the Apoſtle chiefly reſpects; not ſuch who truly thought they ſtood, and did really ſtand; for ſuch ſtand in the true grace and love of God, in Chriſt, in whom they are choſen, and by whom they are redeemed and ſaved, and by that faith which he is the author and finiſher of; and ſo ſhall never finally and totally fall away; but ſuch that thinketh, ο δοκων, who ſeemeth, to himſelf and others, that he ſtandeth; and manifeſtly deſigns ſuch who were ſwelled with a vain opinion of themſelves, their gifts and knowledge; who tempted God, and truſted to themſelves, as the Ethiopic verſion reads it, and deſpiſed weak believers; but leſt real believers ſhould be hereby diſcouraged, the Apoſtle adds,

[a] T. Bab. Beracot, fol. 16. 2.

[b] T. Bab. Kidduſhin, fol. 72. 1. Beracot, fol. 51. 1.

Ver. 13. There hath no temptation taken you, &c.] Some indeed, underſtand theſe words by way of reproof, that whereas their trials and exerciſes which had attended them, were very light ones, and comparatively trivial; and yet they had given way to theſe temptations, and had ſunk under them, and fallen by them, for which they were greatly to be blamed; or as threatning them with ſomething more ſevere than any thing as yet had befallen them, ſignifying that tho' they had as yet ſtood, and thought they ſtill ſhould; yet they ought not to preſume on their own ſtrength, or depend on outward things; ſince the temptations that as yet had come upon them were ſuch as men might eaſily bear; there was no great trial or experiment of their grace and ſtrength by them; they had not yet reſiſted unto blood; there were heavier and ſeverer trials they might expect; and therefore ſhould not be too ſecure in themſelves, but take heed leſt when theſe things ſhould come upon them, in ſuch a time of great temptation, they ſhould fall away: but I rather think the words are ſpoken by way of comfort to the ſaints; intimating that as no temptation or affliction had befallen them, ſo none ſhould, but what either came from men, or was common to men, or which men by divine aſſiſtance, and under divine influence might bear; and therefore ſhould not diſtreſs themſelves with the apprehenſions of it, as if it was ſome ſtrange or unuſual thing, and as if they muſt unavoidably periſh and be deſtroyed by it: but ſuch as is common to man; or is humane. There are divine temptations, or ſuch as come from God; God may be ſaid to tempt his people, as he did Abraham, by enjoining them things very hard and diſagreeable to nature; and by afflicting them either in body or eſtate; and by withdrawing his preſence, and withholding the communications of his grace, to try their faith, ſhew them their weakneſs and need of himſelf. There are alſo diabolical temptations, or ſuch as come from ſatan; who tempts by ſoliciting to ſin, by ſuggeſting blaſphemous thoughts, and filling with doubts and fears; and by diſſuading from the uſe of means, as attending at the throne of grace, and on the word and ordinances: but the Apoſtle here ſpeaks of human temptations, ſuch as come from men; meaning reproaches and perſecutions, for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel; and which are temptations or trials of grace, as of faith and patience, and under which there is great danger of falling away: now when the Apoſtle ſays that none but ſuch temptations had befallen them, he does not mean that they had been, or were, or would be entirely free from other temptations; but that thoſe which they moſtly dreaded, and were in danger by, were but human, ſuch as came from men, and were, as our verſion ſuggeſts, common to chriſtian men, their brethren, who were in the fleſh as they, and might be endured by men, ſtrengthened by the grace of God; wherefore they had nothing to fear from hence, eſpecially when they conſidered the faithfulneſs, care, and power of God next obſerved: but God is faithful, who will not ſuffer you to be tempted above that ye are able: no man can be tempted, afflicted, or perſecuted by men, but by a divine permiſſion, and that voluntary; nor more than, or above that meaſure which God hath determined; who proportions the affliction to the ſtrength he determines and promiſes to give, and does give, and the ſtrength of his people, to the temptation or affliction he ſuffers to befal them; for which his faithfulneſs is engaged, having promiſed that as their day is, their ſtrength ſhall be; that he will never leave them nor forſake them, and that he will bear, and carry, and ſave them unto the uttermoſt, and that they ſhall hold on and out unto the end: but will with the temptation make a way to eſcape; for as he by his permiſſion makes way for the temptation or affliction, which otherwiſe could not come; and as he knows how, in what manner, and at the beſt time, to deliver his people out of temptations; ſo he does and will, in his providence, open a way that they may eſcape out of them, at leaſt ſo as not to be over-preſſed and deſtroyed by them: that ye may be able to bear it; for God does not always think fit to remove at once an affliction or temptation, tho' at the earneſt requeſt of his people, as in the caſe of Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 7, 8. yet he gives them grace ſufficient to endure and ſtand up under it, yea, to get the victory of it, to be more than conquerors, and triumph over it.

Ver. 14. Wherefore my dearly beloved, &c.] Some copies add, brethren; as do the Complutenſian edition, and Ethiopic verſion; all which endearing epithets, are uſed to perſuade to attend to the exhortation enforced upon the foregoing conſiderations; ſince the Jewiſh fathers, who were idolaters, fell ſo much under the divine diſpleaſure; and ſince ſuch who thought they ſtood were ſo liable to fall, and the temptation to which they expoſed themſelves, was of ſuch a dangerous conſequence; therefore, flee from idolatry; as what is moſt diſhonourable, pernicious, and abominable: the Apoſtle's meaning is, not only that they would not worſhip idols, or commit plain downright acts of idolatry; but that they would ſtand at the greateſt diſtance from idols, not ſo much as go into an idol's temple, and there ſit down and eat; which if not a real act of idolatry, had at leaſt the ſhew of one; and his ſenſe is, that they would abſtain from all appearance of idolatry, from every occaſion of it, and whatſoever led unto it; particularly he means, that they would not eat of things ſacrificed to idols as ſuch, and in an idol's temple; which he conſiders as a ſpecies of idolatrous worſhip, and by a ſimilar inſtance he after proves it to be ſo, even a partaking of the table of devils.

Ver. 15. I ſpeak as to wiſe men, &c.] That is, what he was now going to ſay concerning the Lord's ſupper, and the communion which believers have with Chriſt in it, which they as chriſtians muſt have knowledge of; and concerning the participation of the altar the Iſraelites had, who eat of the ſacrifices of it, which many of them, being Jews, as ſuch muſt know; and therefore being fully perſuaded of the propriety and pertinency of the inſtances he was about to produce, and of the juſtneſs of his reaſoning upon them; he appeals to the Corinthians, as men of wiſdom and underſtanding in theſe things, and makes them themſelves judges thereof: judge what I ſay; conſider and weigh the matter well, and you will diſcern and judge that what I ſay is proper and pertinent, juſt and right.

Ver. 16. The cup of bleſſing, which we bleſs, &c.] Meaning the cup of wine uſed in the Lord's ſupper, which being ſet apart for that ſervice, is taken up, and the name of the Lord called upon over it; and he is bleſſed and praiſed for his wondrous love and grace, in the gift and miſſion of his ſon, to ſhed his precious blood for us, for the remiſſion of our ſins; the whole church joining with the adminiſtrator, both in the act of bleſſing and praiſe over the cup, and in the participation of it. This cup is ſo called in alluſion to the cup of wine uſed at common meals, or at the paſſover among the Jews, which they uſed to take and bleſs God with, and give him thanks for their mercies, and was commonly called, כוס של ברכה, the cup of bleſſing[c]. "Three things ſays R. Judah[d], ſhorten a man's days and years; when they give him the book of the law to read, and he does not read, כוס של ברכה לברך, the cup of bleſſing to bleſs with, and he does not bleſs, and when he accuſtoms himſelf to government." Again, ſo they comment on Gen. xxi. 8.[e] "what's the meaning of the day that Iſaac was weaned? the holy bleſſed God will make a feaſt for the righteous, in the day that he weans the people of the ſeed of Iſaac, and after they eat and drink, they give to Abraham, כוס של ברכה לברך, the cup of bleſſing to bleſs with; he ſays to them, I will not bleſs, becauſe Iſhmael ſprung from me; they give it to Iſaac, he ſays to them, I am not fit to bleſs, for Eſau came from me; they give it to Jacob, he ſays unto them I will not bleſs, for I married two ſiſters in their life-time, which the law forbids me; they ſay to Moſes, take it and bleſs, he ſays to them I will not bleſs, for I was not worthy to enter into the land of Iſrael, neither in life nor in death; they ſay to Joſhua, take it and bleſs, he ſays I cannot bleſs, for I am not worthy of a ſon, as it is written, Nun his ſon, Joſhua his ſon; they ſay to David, take thou it and bleſs, he ſaith unto them I will bleſs, and it is comely for me to bleſs; as it is ſaid, I will take the cup of ſalvation, and call upon the name of the Lord." Once more they aſk[f], "what is a beautiful cup? כוס של ברכה, the cup of bleſſing;" and which they[g] obſerve, ought to hold the fourth part of a log of wine. Theſe inſtances clearly ſhew from whence the Apoſtle borrowed this expreſſion, and which he chuſes to make uſe of becauſe well known to the Jews, and as being very appoſite to the cup in the Lord's ſupper, he is ſpeaking of: is it not the communion of the blood of Chriſt? it is; that is, it is a ſign, ſymbol, and token of fellowſhip with Chriſt in his death; it is a means of having communion with him, and of enjoying the bleſſings of grace which come thro' his blood; ſuch as righteouſneſs, peace, pardon, and atonement; all which true believers are made partakers of; and this part of the Lord's ſupper, the cup being drank of, is a teſtimony and an indication of the ſame: the bread which we break; which is the other part of the ordinance, which tho' performed firſt, is mentioned laſt, becauſe of the argument the Apoſtle purſues upon it. The act of breaking the bread, does not only deſign the diſtribution and eating of it; but the manner alſo in which it is prepared for diſtribution and eating, namely by breaking it into pieces; and which is aptly expreſſive of the body of Chriſt, which was wounded, bruiſed, and broken for us: is it not the communion of the body of Chriſt? it is; for not only believers by this act have communion with his myſtical body the church, but with his natural body which was broken for them; they in a ſpiritual ſenſe and by faith eat his fleſh, as well as drink his blood, and partake of him, of his ſufferings and death, endured in his body, and of all the bleſſings of grace conſequent thereon. The Apoſtle's view in this inſtance, and his argument upon it is this, that if believers by eating the bread and drinking the wine in the Lord's ſupper, ſpiriritually partake of Chriſt, of his body and of his blood, and have communion with him; then ſuch who eat of things ſacrificed unto idols, have in ſo doing communion with them, and partake of the table of devils, and ſo are guilty of idolatry, which he would have them avoid.

Ver. 17. For we being many, are one bread and one body, &c.] The ſeveral members of the church of Chriſt; particular believers are indeed many, conſidered in themſelves, in their own perſons; yet by virtue of their union to Chriſt, which is manifeſted by their communion with him, they are one bread with him, the bread of life, and one body with his, ſignified by the bread; they are of one and the ſame maſs and lump, they are incorporated together, they are fleſh of his fleſh, and one ſpirit with him: or they are one bread and body among themſelves; as bread conſiſts of many grains of corn which have been ground and kneaded together, and make up one loaf; and as the members of an human body are many, and make up one body; ſo believers, tho' they are many, yet are one body, of which Chriſt is the head; one in union with him and one another, and one in their communion together at the Lord's table; and ſo the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions read, as therefore the bread is one, ſo we all are one body; having communion with Chriſt and one another: for we are all partakers of that one bread; in the ſupper, which is all of the ſame nature and kind, and is a ſymbol of the body of Chriſt, and our fellowſhip with him and each other. The application deſigned is this, that as believers by partaking of the ſame bread, appear to be the ſame body, and of the ſame maſs and lump with one another; ſo ſuch as eat things ſacrificed unto idols, appear to be of the ſame maſs and lump with heathen idolaters: Dr. Lightfoot has very pertinently produced ſome paſſages out of Maimonides, concerning mixing, aſſociating, or communion of neighbours in courts on ſabbath eves, that ſo they may enter into each others houſes on the ſabbath-day, for the illuſtration of this paſſage; of which mixing the Jews have a whole treatiſe in their Miſna and Talmud, which they call Erubin; and of which they ſay[h], "but how is this mixture or aſſociation? it is thus, they mix together, במאכל אחד, in one food, which they prepare on the eve of the ſabbath; and it is as if they ſhould ſay, for we are all mixed together, and have all one food; nor does any one of us divide the right from his neighbour——they don't mix in courts, but בפת שלימה, with a whole loaf only; tho' the maſs or lump baked may be the quantity of a Seah, yet if it is broken, they don't aſſociate with it; but if it is whole, tho' it be but the value of a farthing, they mix with it——how do they mix or aſſociate together in the courts? they collect חלה אחת שלימה, one whole cake, out of every houſe, and put all in one veſſel, in one of the houſes of the court—and the whole aſſociation being gathered together, bleſſes the Lord—and eats?" upon which the above learned writer obſerves, that if it were cuſtomary among the Iſraelites, to join together in one political or œconomical body, by the eating of many loaves collected from this, and that, and the other man; we are much more aſſociated together into one body, by eating one and the ſame bread, appointed us by our ſaviour.

[h] Maimon. Hilch. Erubin, c. 1. §. 6, 8, 16.

Ver. 18. Behold Iſrael after the fleſh, &c.] So the Apoſtle calls them, to diſtinguiſh them from the Iſrael of God, the ſpiritual Iſrael, whether Jews or Gentiles; who are born again, believe in the true Meſſiah, worſhip God in a ſpiritual manner, rejoice in Chriſt Jeſus, and have no confidence in fleſhly things; but theſe were the deſcendants of Jacob or Iſrael by carnal generation, were carnal men, in the fleſh, in a ſtate of unregeneracy, and were employed in a carnal worſhip, in the obſervance of carnal commandments and ordinances; theſe the Apoſtle directs to, to ſee, conſider, and take notice of what they were doing; from whence ſome inſtruction might be taken, for the further clearing of the preſent point: are not they which eat of the ſacrifices, partakers of the altar? yes, they are. The prieſts and Levites who waited at the altar, and miniſtred about holy things there, who brought the ſacrifices and laid them upon the altar of the burnt-offerings, where the altar conſumed and devoured one part by fire, and that which was left they eat among themſelves; and ſo as they had communion with one another in eating, they partook of the altar, of the things, or ſacrifices of the altar, and ſhewed themſelves to be of the Jewiſh religion, and profeſſed and declared that they worſhipped the God of Iſrael, and would be thought to have communion with him in ſo doing; in like manner, ſuch who eat of things ſacrificed to idols, declared themſelves to be idolaters, to be of the pagan religion, to be worſhippers of idols, and to have fellowſhip with them.

Ver. 19. What ſay I then? &c.] Or may be objected to, or inferred from, what I ſay; that an idol is any thing, or that which is ſacrificed to idols is any thing? to which muſt be anſwered, as the Syriac verſion reads, לא, no, by no means; by running the parallel between chriſtians having communion with the body and blood of Chriſt, in the Lord's ſupper, thro' eating the bread and drinking the wine, the Iſraelites partaking of the altar, by eating of the ſacrifices of it, and mens joining with idols and idolaters, by eating things ſacrificed to idols; it follows not that an idol has any thing of deity in it, and is to be ſet upon a level with God, when as he had ſaid before, an idol was nothing, and what he now ſaid did not at all contradict that; or that things offered to idols are to be had in the ſame account, or to be equalled to, or be thought to have any thing in them, as the elements of the bread and wine in the Lord's ſupper, or the ſacrifices that were offered by the Iſraelites on the altar, according to the divine command; he meant no ſuch thing, but only argued from the greater to the leſſer, and his ſenſe is more fully declared in the next words.

Ver. 20. But I ſay, &c.] This is my ſenſe and meaning, that the things which the Gentiles ſacrifice, they ſacrifice unto devils, and not to God; reference is had to Deut. xxxii. 17. for what the Gentiles ſacrificed, tho' they did not ſacrifice intentionally to the idols of gold, ſilver, wood, and ſtone, but to God in them, as they pretended; yet inaſmuch as in ſuch worſhip and ſacrifices, they were directed, inſtigated, influenced, and aſſiſted by devils, who took up their reſidence in theſe idols, and gave forth their oracles from them, they ſacrificed to them; and which ſome have done, as in India and China, profeſſedly and openly, and all other idolaters, eventually, virtually, and covertly: and I would not that ye ſhould have fellowſhip with devils; as all wicked men have, in the commiſſion of any luſt, ſin, or immorality; and as all idolaters have in their ſuperſtitious practices, and idolatrous worſhip; and if grace prevent not, will have to all eternity in everlaſting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels; wherefore the Apoſtle would have the Corinthians flee from idolatry, and all appearance of it, and abſtain from eating things offered to idols, of which they could not eat without having fellowſhip with devils; this he ſays, to deter them from ſuch practices, which muſt be very horrible and ſhocking, and beſpeaks in him great care of them, and affection for them.

Ver. 21. Ye cannot drink the cup of the Lord, and the cup of devils, &c.] Not only they ought not, but they could not rightly, truly, and really drink the cup of wine in the Lord's ſupper, in the true faith of Chriſt's bloodſhed, and his ſacrifice offered up for them, in remembrance of his love, and to the honour of his name; and alſo the cup of wine of libations, poured out and drank to the honour of the Heathen deities; theſe things are utterly inconſiſtent; no man can ſerve two maſters, God and mammon, or God and Baal; nor is there any concord between Chriſt and Belial, or agreement between the temple of God and idols: ye cannot be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils; no man can ſpiritually, however, he may externally partake of the entertainment provided, on the table of the Lord, at his ſupper inſtituted and kept in commemoration of him; and alſo with guſt and pleaſure, and without any concern for the peace of weak minds, and the honour of God, eat things ſet upon a table in an idol's temple, and before the idol, and as ſacrificed unto it.

Ver. 22. Do we provoke the Lord to jealouſy? &c.] As they do who are guilty of idolatry in any ſhape: nothing is more highly reſented by God, or ſtirs him up more to wrath and fury, and to inflict puniſhment; he cannot bear, nor will he admit of a rival in religious worſhip; he is a God jealous of his own honour; nor will he give, or ſuffer to be given by others, his praiſe and glory to graven images: are we ſtronger than he? to give into idolatrous practices, is to proclaim and enter into a war againſt God; and what madneſs muſt this be? who can be ſo ſottiſh and ſtupid as to think of ſucceeding? when God is omnipotent, and man a poor feeble impotent creature, a worm, and but duſt and aſhes: thus the Apoſtle diſſuades from idolatry, and every ſpecies and branch of it; partly from its ill effect, in bringing men into fellowſhip with devils; and partly from the impoſſibility of practiſing it, in conſiſtence with a true and real participation of the cup and table of the Lord; and from the abſurdity and ſtupidity of it, and its dangerous conſequence, in expoſing men to the vengeance of an almighty incenſed Being.

Ver. 23. All things are lawful for me, &c.] All ſorts of food are lawful to be eaten, every creature of God is good, there is nothing common or unclean in itſelf, polluted or polluting; and ſo things offered to idols may be lawfully eaten, but not as ſuch, or in an idol's temple, or before a weak brother; to do which is contrary to the honour of God, and the edification of the ſaints: and therefore all things are not expedient; to be done always, and in all places, and before all perſons. The Apoſtle ſuggeſts, that tho' they might be lawful to him, and he might make uſe of his liberty in eating them; yet they might not be expedient, or of ſervice, but on the contrary hurtful to others; and which therefore ought to be judged a ſufficient reaſon for the omiſſion of them: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not; tho' things of an indifferent nature may be lawfully uſed, yet they don't always tend to the edification of others, which ſhould be conſulted; and when this is the caſe, they ought to be diſuſed. This is obſerved in anſwer to an objection taken from the doctrine of chriſtian liberty, allowing the free uſe of all the creatures, and diſengaging men from an obſervance of the diſtinction of meats and drinks which the Apoſtle grants; and yet argues from his own example, and the edification of the ſaints, that this is not always to be cloſely purſued; but believers ſhould forego what they have a right to uſe, when the peace and welfare of their fellow-chriſtians require it.

Ver. 24. Let no man ſeek his own, &c.] His carnal pleaſure and private advantage in eating things ſacrificed to idols, to the hurt and diſadvantage of his brethren; otherwiſe it is lawful for a man to ſeek his own good, temporal, ſpiritual, and eternal, to ſeek for the neceſſaries of life, his ſpiritual peace and comfort, and his everlaſting welfare and happineſs; but then he ſhould not only ſeek his own, but every man another's wealth, or that which is another's; for the word wealth is not in the original text. The Apoſtle's meaning is, that a man in the uſe of things indifferent, ſhould not ſeek the gratifying of his ſenſual appetite or other paſſions, what may be pleaſing or profitable to himſelf; but ſhould conſult the profit and edification of others.

Ver. 25. Whatſoever is ſold in the ſhambles, &c.] The word μακελλον, rendered Shambles, here uſed, is a Latin word, and is made uſe of by Latin writers in the ſame ſenſe as here, for a place where food was ſold [i]. The original of the name is ſaid [k] to be this, one Macellus a very wicked and prophane man, being for his robberies and filthy life condemned to die, a place was built in his houſe by Æmylius and Fulvius cenſors, for ſelling of proviſions, and which from his name was called Macellum. The Syriac verſion retains the word here, and ſo do the Talmudiſts, and Rabbins [l] frequently; who ſay [m], "מקולין, the ſhambles, and the butchers "of Iſrael, tho' fleſh of them is found in the hand "of a ſtranger, it is free:" into theſe places the prieſts ſent to be ſold what was offered to their idols, which they could not diſpenſe with themſelves, or thought not lawful to make uſe of; for the Egyptians, as Herodotus ſays [n], uſed to cut off the heads of their beaſts that were ſacrificed, and carry them into the market and ſell them to the Greeks, and if there were no buyers they caſt them into the river. Now the Apoſtle allows, that ſuch meat that was ſold in the ſhambles might be bought and eat of, but not in an idol's temple; there was a difference between an idol's temple, and eating things ſacrificed to idols there, and buying them in ſhambles, and eating them at home: that eat; buy, carry home, dreſs and eat, in your own houſes: aſking no queſtion; whether it was ſacrificed to idols, or no: for conſcience ſake; either a man's own, which may be hurt, wounded and defiled, by eating contrary to it, ſhould he know that what he eats had been offered to an idol; whereas if he aſks no queſtions, and knows nothing of the matter, his conſcience will not be afflicted: or elſe another man's that may ſtand by whilſt the meat is bought, and ſold; and who hearing queſtions aſked and anſwered, and yet obſerves the meat, tho' ſacrificed to idols, dreſſed and eat by the buyer, his conſcience being weak, may be offended and grieved.

Ver. 26. For the earth is the Lord's, and the fulneſs thereof.] Which words are taken out of Pſal. xxiv. 1. and to be underſtood of Chriſt, who by creation and preſervation is Lord of the whole earth, and as mediator has all in his poſſeſſion; and having broken down the middle wall of partition, gives his people the free uſe of all creatures, of the beaſts of the field, the fowls of the air, the fiſhes of the ſea, and the trees, fruits, and plants of the earth, which are the fulneſs thereof; and therefore as the ſaints have a full right from Chriſt, to make uſe of all the creatures in a moderate way, and with thankfulneſs, they need not fear being defiled by any of them; provided they do not act contrary to the honour of God, and in favour of an idol, or againſt their own conſcience, and the peace of weak believers.

Ver. 27. If any of them that believe not, &c.] In Chriſt, and make no profeſſion of faith in him; but are infidels to his perſon, office, grace, righteouſneſs, Goſpel and ordinances, as there were many ſuch at Corinth: bid you to a feaſt; invite you to dine or ſup with them in their own houſes: and ye be diſpoſed to go; the Apoſtle does not lay any commands upon them to go, or not go, but leaves them to their own will, inclination and diſcretion; for as circumſtances might be, it might be either proper or improper to liſten to an invitation from ſuch a quarter; but if they were inclined, and did think fit to go, which they might without ſin; for as it is lawful to trade, ſo to eat and drink with unbelievers; then his advice is, whatſoever is ſet before you, eat, aſking no queſtion for conſcience ſake; that is, as before, as whether it is offered to idols or no; leſt either their own, or another's conſcience ſhould be hurt thereby.

Ver. 28. But if any man ſay unto you, &c.] Either a weak believer, to prevent the doing of what he thought to be ſinful; or the unbeliever, that invites to try the integrity of his chriſtian gueſt, and to draw him into a ſnare: this is offered in ſacrifice unto idols; the meat that is in that diſh, or that portion of food which ſtands in ſuch a part of the table, came out of an idol's temple, and was ſacrificed to idols; which with the Jews were forbidden [o]: for "every thing that came out of "an idol's temple was forbidden, and was reckoned "as the ſacrifices of the dead; for it was not "thought poſſible it could be there, and not of"fered to idols:" now when any one at the feaſt, either believer or unbeliever, ſhould thus point at any particular diſh, and affirm this of it; then the Apoſtle's advice is, eat not for his ſake that ſhewed it; who, if a weak believer, will be grieved and wounded; and if an infidel will be hardened in his impiety, and be furniſhed with an opportunity of reproaching the chriſtians, as variable, inſincere, and unfaithful in their religion: and for conſcience ſake; which is explained in the following verſe: the earth is the Lord's, and the fulneſs thereof; which words are neither in the Syriac verſion, nor in the Vulgate Latin, nor in the Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, and are thought by ſome to be added, from ver. 26. tho' the repetition of them is far from being impertinent; ſince they contain a very good reaſon why ſuch a man ſhould abſtain from things ſacrificed to idols, ſeeing there is ſuch a plenty and variety of creatures for his uſe, which he has a right to eat of; and therefore is under no neceſſity to eat of ſuch ſacrifices, nor is it any hardſhip upon him to forbear the uſe of them.

Ver. 29. Conſcience I ſay, not thine own, &c.] Which is well informed about theſe things, and is fully perſuaded that an idol is nothing, and that things ſacrificed to idols are nothing; and as they cannot profit a man, or help forward his comfort, peace, and happineſs, ſo they can't hinder them: but of the others; either the weak brother, or the unbelieving maſter of the feaſt; 'tis for the ſake of their conſciences, ſuch food muſt not be eaten, leſt either the one ſhould be grieved, or the other reproach: for why is my liberty judged of another man's conſcience? this is not an objection of the Corinthians, ſetting forth the unreaſonableneſs of being condemned, for the uſe of their chriſtian liberty by another's conſcience, be he who he will, believer or unbeliever, when they had an undoubted right to ſuch an uſe, and their own conſciences did not condemn them: but they are the words of the Apoſtle, expreſſing his own ſenſe, that it was not right and fitting that he ſhould make uſe of his liberty, and eat under ſuch a circumſtance as here pointed out, and ſo his liberty ſhould be condemned as ſinful by another man's conſcience; ſince the weak believer would be apt to cenſure, judge and condemn him as a libertine, and the unbeliever, as an atheiſt, or one that had no regard to any religion at all; and therefore he reaſons, that it was beſt to abſtain from eating, rather than expoſe his liberty to ſuch a cenſure and condemnation.

Ver. 30. For if I by grace be a partaker, &c.] Either of chriſtian liberty, thro' the grace of God; or of the creatures God has given men to eat of thro' his goodneſs, and which are enjoyed by the ſaints with thankfulneſs: why am I evil ſpoken of for that for which I give thanks? that is, why ſhould I expoſe myſelf to evil tongues, the blaſphemies and reproaches of men, by eating things of this kind, under this circumſtance, when there are ſo many creatures I can uſe without offence, and be thankful for? or why ſhould my liberty be reproached thro' an imprudent uſe of it, for which I have the utmoſt reaſon to be thankful? wherefore upon the whole 'tis beſt to deny ones ſelf in ſuch a caſe, rather than riſque ones character, the glory of God, and the honour of religion.

Ver. 31. Whether therefore ye eat or drink, &c.] Which may principally refer to eating things ſacrified to idols, and drinking the libations of wine offered to them, ſince this is the ſubject of the Apoſtle's diſcourſe; in doing of which he directs them to have the glory of God in view, and ſo to conduct, that that end may be anſwered: and it may alſo be applied to common eating and drinking, or to ordinary meals upon food, about which there is no diſpute; and which common actions of life are done to the glory of God, when every mercy is conſidered and owned as coming from him; and when we confeſs ourſelves unworthy of any; and when we aſcribe all we have to the free and unmerited goodneſs of God; and enjoy every mercy of this kind, as a fruit of our father's love to us, as a bleſſing of the covenant, and as coming to us thro' the blood of Chriſt; when we are contented and ſatisfied with what we have, and act faith continually on God for future freſh ſupplies, and give thanks for all we receive: and if this, then much more eating and drinking in an ordinance-way ſhould be directed to the glory of God and Chriſt, as eating the bread, and drinking the wine in the Lord's ſupper; and which is ſo done, when it is done in a decent and reverend manner, in the exerciſe of faith, diſcerning the Lord's body, eating his fleſh, and drinking his blood in a ſpiritual manner, without dependance on the actions done, and in remembrance of the love of God and Chriſt. Or whatſoever ye do; in a natural, civil, or religious reſpect, in preaching, hearing, praying, faſting, giving of alms, &c. whatever in the cloſet, in the family, in the church, or in the world, in private, or in publick: do all to the glory of God; God's glory is the end of all his works and actions; in creation, providence, and grace; in election, in the covenant, in the bleſſings and promiſes of it, in redemption, in effectual vocation, and in bringing many ſons to glory. The ſame is the end of all Chriſt's actions, as man and mediator, of his doctrines and miracles, of his obedience, ſufferings, and death in this world, and of his interceding life in the other; who as he lives to make interceſſion for us, lives unto God, to the glory of God; and therefore the glory of God ſhould be the end of all our actions: beſides, without this no action can be truly called a good one; if a man ſeeks himſelf, his own glory, and popular applauſe, or has any ſiniſter and ſelfiſh end in view in what he does, it cannot be ſaid, nor will it be accounted by God to be a good action. The Jews have a ſaying much like this, כל מעשך יהיו לשם שמים, let all thy works be done to the glory of God[p]; which one of their commentators[q] explains thus: "even "when thou art employed in eating and drinking, "and in the buſineſs of life, thou ſhalt not deſign "thy bodily profit, but that thou may'ſt be ſtrong "to do the will of thy creator."

Ver. 32. Give none offence, &c.] Avoid every thing that may be the occaſion of offence, of the ſtumbling and falling of others; whether things indifferent, when they are offenſive to weak minds, and grieve, and wound, and ſtumble them; eſpecially things ſinful, which as they offend God, and are therefore called offences, ſo they are offenſive to the churches of Chriſt, and are cognizable by them; they are ſtaggering and ſtumbling to weak believers, when committed by profeſſors of religion; are the means of inducing others to ſin, and of hardening prophane ſinners in their iniquities, and give occaſion to the enemy to blaſpheme: but things that are good, and are made our incumbent duty, are not to be avoided, tho' perſons may be offended thereat; ſuch as the pure preaching of the Goſpel, the profeſſion of it, and ſubmiſſion to the ordinances thereof; for an offence is either taken or given; to give offence is one thing, which we ſhould carefully avoid; and to take it, when there is no juſt reaſon for it, is another, and not to be regarded: neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the church of God; which may be conſidered as having a peculiar reſpect to the people of God: the two firſt of theſe, namely, Jews and Gentiles, being what conſtituted the firſt churches, and this at Corinth, ſo that they may be thought to be the parts, and the church the whole; and the Apoſtle firſt mentions the one, and then the other, ſignifying, that they were not to give offence neither to ſingle perſons, nor to the whole church; and particularly in the caſe of eating things offered to idols, care was to be taken that neither Jews nor Gentiles were offended, being both members of the church. Or theſe may be conſidered as including all ſorts of perſons; for Jews and Gentiles include the whole world, and may here mean all that are without, that have no true faith in Chriſt, nor any ſpiritual knowledge of him; and the church, all ſuch as know him, believe in him, and profeſs his name: ſo that the Apoſtle's ſenſe is, that care ſhould be taken that no offence be given to any ſort of men, neither to the men of the world, of whatſoever character, nor to profeſſors of religion, and more eſpecially the latter; ſince offending one of the leaſt of them that believe in Chriſt, is diſpleaſing to him; and ſince he was ſo careful to guard againſt the offence of them, and will, by his angels, at the laſt day, gather out of his kingdom all ſuch as offend; and has ordered his churches to mark them which cauſe offences and diviſions; and ſince it is ſo hard a thing to reconcile an offended brother, who is harder to be won than a ſtrong caſtle; tho' that is not his excellency, yet as it makes the caſe ſo difficult, it ſhould be guarded againſt.

[p] Pirke Abot, c. 2. §. 12.

[q] Bartenora in ib.

Ver. 33. Even as I pleaſe all men in all things, &c.] The Apoſtle ſets himſelf as an example, tho' he was far from being a man-pleaſer, in the bad ſenſe of that phraſe; nor muſt theſe all things, in which he is ſaid to pleaſe all men, be taken in the largeſt ſenſe; but are to be underſtood of things indifferent, which might be lawfully done or avoided, without breaking the law of God, or contradicting the Goſpel of Chriſt, or any of its rules and ordinances, to all which the Apoſtle was inviolably attached; nor did he in theſe things ſeek to pleaſe men, but in all to act the part of a faithful ſervant of Chriſt, and ſteward of the myſteries of grace; ſee ch. ix. 19, 20, 21, 22. Moreover, it is not to be thought that in fact he pleaſed all men; it is certain he did not; but he ſtudied to pleaſe them; he did all that in him lay; he took the moſt proper methods to do it, tho' they were ſometimes ineffectual. Not ſeeking my own profit; worldly profit and advantage, riches, wealth, the emoluments of life, eaſe, reſt, and pleaſure; and chiefly he means the uſe of liberty in things indifferent; he was willing to forego all for the good of others: but the profit of many, that they may be ſaved; he neglected his own private advantage, and the gratifying of himſelf in any thing which was otherwiſe lawful, when he ſaw that would be an offence to others, be an hindrance of the Goſpel, and deter any from imbracing the chriſtian doctrine; that ſo he might be the means of promoting the ſpiritual profit and edification of many ſouls, that they might be ſaved in the Lord with an everlaſting ſalvation. He does not ſay all, but many, knowing that all will not be ſaved, only the elect of God; and whereas he knew not who theſe were, nor where they lay, he behaved in this manner to all men, that he might be the inſtrument of the ſpiritual good and ſalvation of the choſen ones among them, by preaching the Goſpel to them without offence.

CHAP. XI.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle blames both men and women for their indecent appearance in public worſhip, and admoniſhes them how they ſhould behave, with the reaſons of it; and alſo corrects ſome abuſes and irregularities among them, at, or before the Lord's ſupper; which leads him to give a particular account of that ordinance, of the nature, uſe, and deſign of it, and ſome directions about the performance of it, and attendance on it. He begins with an exhortation ſuitable to what he had ſaid in the latter part of the preceding chapter, to follow him, as he followed Chriſt, ver. 1. and praiſes them for their remembrance of him, and for the keeping the ordinances as they were delivered to them; that is, as many of them, and as far as they did ſo, ver. 2. And in order to make way for what he had on his mind to reprove them for, and admoniſh them about, he obſerves, that as God is the head of Chriſt, and Chriſt the head of every man, ſo the man is the head of the woman, ver. 3. wherefore for him to appear, and join in public worſhip, with his head covered, is to diſhonour his head, ver. 4. as, on the other hand, for a woman to have her head uncovered in divine ſervice, is to diſhonour her head, it being all one as if her head was ſhaved, ver. 5. wherefore it is concluded, that if it is a ſhame for her to be ſhaved or ſhorn, ſhe ought to be covered when attending the worſhip of God, ver. 6. The reaſon why a man ſhould be uncovered at ſuch a time is, becauſe he is the image and glory of God; and the reaſon why the woman ſhould be covered is, becauſe ſhe is the glory of the man, is made for his glory, and to be in ſubjection to him, of which the covering is a token, ver. 7. and that ſhe is ſo, is argued from the order of the creation, man being not of the woman, but the woman of the man, ver. 8. and from the end of the creation, man being not for the woman, but the woman for the man, ver. 9. Another reaſon why the woman ſhould be covered at the time of public worſhip, is, becauſe of the angels then preſent, ver. 10. but leſt on this account the woman ſhould be treated with contempt by the man, the Apoſtle obſerves, that they are not, and cannot be without one another; and that they are from each other in different ſenſes, and both from the Lord, ver. 11, 12. and then proceeds to other arguments, ſhewing that women ſhould not appear uncovered in the houſe of God: one is taken from the uncomelineſs of it, which muſt be ſo judged by every one, ver. 13. and another is taken from nature and cuſtom, and the contrary in men, which is diſagreeable and ſhameful; for if, by the dictates of nature, it is ſhameful in men to wear long hair, it muſt be comely and decent in women, and what is for their glory, to wear ſuch hair, ſince it is their covering, ver. 14, 15. But if after all the Apoſtle had ſaid on this ſubject, there ſhould be any contentious perſons diſpoſed to wrangle about it, he obſerves, that they were not proper perſons to be continued in the church, ver. 16. and then proceeds to take notice of ſome ill conduct of many in the Corinthian church, at, or before the eating of the Lord's ſupper; partly thro' ſchiſms and factions, they meeting in parties for that purpoſe; which he had heard of, and had reaſon to believe, and could not praiſe them for; their coming together in ſuch a manner, being for the worſe, and not the better, ver. 18, 19. and the rather he gave credit to this report, ſince there were hereſies among them, which iſſue in ſchiſms and diviſions, and which muſt be expected, that hereby Chriſt's faithful ones might be diſtinguiſhed from others, ver. 19. when he goes on to ſhew, how they abuſed the ordinance of the ſupper, not only by meeting together in parties, but by indulging their ſenſual appetites in eating and drinking, which was the principal end in coming together, and not the Lord's ſupper, ver. 20. for they ſtaid not one for another, but one took his ſupper before the other, and ſo the one was full, and the other hungry, ver. 21. the evil of which the Apoſtle expoſes by obſerving the indecency of ſuch a conduct, when they had houſes of their own to feaſt in; the contempt which they caſt upon the church of God, and the ſhame they expoſed the poor and hungry unto, all which was far from being praiſe-worthy, ver. 22. upon which he gives a particular account of the Lord's ſupper, as he had it from Chriſt himſelf, the time when, the manner in which it was inſtituted and celebrated by him, the ſignificancy of its ſeveral parts, its uſe, and end, and the continuance of it until the ſecond coming of Chriſt, ver. 23, 24, 25, 26. and then he proceeds to ſhew the evil of an unworthy partaking of this ordinance, how that ſuch are guilty of, and vilify and reproach the body and blood of Chriſt, ver. 27. wherefore previous to a participation of it a man ſhould examine himſelf as to his repentance towards God, and faith in Chriſt, ver. 28. ſeeing ſuch that are unworthy communicants bring condemnation on themſelves, not having ſpiritual judgment to diſcern the Lord's body in the ordinance, ver. 29. and ſo become liable to diſeaſes and death itſelf, which was the caſe of ſeveral in the Corinthian church, ver. 30. whereas, if perſons would but examine and judge of themſelves before-hand, they would not be expoſed to ſuch judgments, ver. 31. tho' the people of God, when they are afflicted, ſhould look upon their afflictions, not as puniſhments, but as chaſtizements inflicted on them, for this end, that they might not be condemned with the world of the ungodly hereafter, ver. 32. Wherefore the Apoſtle's advice is, that when they came to the Lord's table they would not form themſelves into factions and parties, and one part of them eat before, and ſeparate from the reſt, but that they would tarry till they all come together, and then join as one body, and one bread, ver. 33. and that if any man was an hungry, he ſhould eat at home, and not have an ante-ſupper in the houſe of God, indulging his appetite there to his condemnation, and thoſe that joined with him, ver. 34. and the chapter is concluded with an intimation, that beſides theſe irregularities, there were others in this church which the Apoſtle ſignifies he would correct, when he ſhould be in perſon with them.

Ver. 1. Be ye followers of me, even as I alſo am of Chriſt.] Theſe words more properly cloſe the preceding chapter, than begin a new one, and refer to the rules therein laid down, and which the Apoſtle would have the Corinthians follow him in, as he did Chriſt: that as he ſought, both in private and publick, and more eſpecially in his miniſterial ſervice, to do all things to the glory of God, and not for his own popular applauſe, in which he imitated Chriſt, who ſought not his own glory, but the glory of him that ſent him; ſo he would have them do all they did in the name of Chriſt, and to the glory of God by him: and that as he ſtudied to exerciſe a conſcience void of offence to God and man, in doing which he was a follower of Chriſt, who was holy in his nature, and harmleſs and inoffenſive in his converſation; ſo he was deſirous that they ſhould likewiſe be blameleſs, harmleſs, and without offence until the day of Chriſt: and that whereas he endeavoured to pleaſe men in all things lawful and indifferent, wherein he copied after Chriſt, who by his affable and courteous behaviour, and humble deportment, ſought to pleaſe and gratify all with whom he converſed; ſo he would have them not to mind high things, but condeſcend to men of low eſtates, and become all things to all, that they might gain ſome, as he did: and once more, that as he ſought not his own pleaſure and advantage, but the ſalvation of others, in imitation of Chriſt, who pleaſed not himſelf, but took upon him, and bore chearfully the reproaches of men, that he might procure good for them; ſo the Apoſtle ſuggeſts, that it would be right in them not to ſeek to have their own wills in every thing, but rather to pleaſe their neighbour for good to edification.

Ver. 2. Now I praiſe you, brethren, &c.] The Apoſtle prefaces what he had to ſay by way of commendation of them; tho' ſome think that this is ſaid in an ironical way, becauſe there are many things both in this chapter, and in the following part of this Epiſtle, delivered in a way of reproof; but whoever conſiders the change of ſtile in ver. 17. will eaſily ſee, that this muſt be ſpoken ſeriouſly here, and is deſigned to raiſe the attention to what he was about to ſay, and to prepare their minds to receive, and take in good part, what he ſhould ſay by way of rebuke; who could not well be angry when he praiſed them for what was praiſe-worthy in them, and reproved them for that which was blameable. The things he commends them for, are as follow, that ye remember me in all things; that is, either that they were mindful of him, tho' at a diſtance from them, and had ſuch a veneration for him, and paid ſuch reſpect to him, and to his judgment, as to write to him, to have his ſenſe about any point of doctrine, or caſe of conſcience which had any difficulty in them; or that they bore in memory the doctrines of the Goſpel which he had delivered among them; ſee ch. xv. 2. The Arabic verſion reads, that ye remember my ſayings and deeds; the doctrines he preached among them, and the examples he ſet them: and keep the ordinances as I delivered them to you; meaning, among the reſt, if not principally, baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper, which he received from Chriſt, and delivered unto them; ſee ver. 23. and which they, at leaſt many of them, kept and obſerved in the faith of Chriſt, from a principle of love to him, and with a view to his glory, and that as to the form and manner in which they were delivered to them by the Apoſtle, agreeable to the mind of Chriſt; but was the Apoſtle alive now, would, or could he praiſe the generality of thoſe that are called chriſtians on this account? no; neither of theſe ordinances in common are kept as they were delivered: as to baptiſm, it is not attended to either as to ſubject or mode, both are altered, and are different from the original inſtitution; and the Lord's ſupper is proſtituted to the vileſt of men; and what is monſtrum horrendum, is made a teſt and qualification for employment in civil and military offices under the government.

Ver. 3. But I would have you to know, &c.] Tho' they were mindful of him, and retained in memory many things he had declared among them, and kept the ordinances as delivered to them; yet there were ſome things in which they were either ignorant, or at leaſt did not ſo well advert to, and needed to be put in mind of, and better informed about: and as the Apoſtle was very communicative of his knowledge in every point, he fails not to acquaint them with whatſoever might be inſtructive to their faith, and a direction to their practice: that the head of every man is Chriſt; Chriſt is the head of every individual human nature, as he is the creator and preſerver of all men, and the donor of all the gifts of nature to them; of the light of nature, of reaſon, and of all the rational powers and faculties; he is the head of nature to all men, as he is of grace to his own people: and ſo he is as the governour of all the nations of the earth, who whether they will or no are ſubject to him; and one day every knee ſhall bow to him, and every tongue confeſs that he is the Lord of all. Moreover, Chriſt is the head of every believing man; he is generally ſaid to be the head of the church, and ſo of every man that is a member of it: he is a common publick head, a repreſentative one to all his elect; ſo he was in election, and in the covenant of grace; ſo he was in time, in his death, burial, reſurrection, and aſcenſion to, and entrance into heaven; and ſo he is now as an advocate and interceſſor there: he is the political head of his people, or an head in ſuch ſenſe, as a king is the head of his nation: he is alſo an œconomical head, or in ſuch ſenſe an head as an huſband is the head of his wife, and as a parent is the head of his family, and as a maſter is the head of his ſervants; for all theſe relations Chriſt ſuſtains: yea, he is a natural head, or is that to his church, as an human head is to an human body: he is a true and proper head, is of the ſame nature with his body, is in union to it, communicates life to it, is ſuperior to it, and more excellent than it. He is a perfect head, nothing is wanting in him; he knows all his people, and is ſenſible of their wants, and does ſupply them; his eye of love is always on them; his ears are open to their cries; he has a tongue to ſpeak to them, and for them, which he uſes; and he ſmells a ſweet ſavour in them, in their graces and garments, tho' they are all his own, and perfumed by himſelf: there are no vicious humours in this head, flowing from thence to the body to its detriment, as from Adam to his poſterity, whoſe head he was; but in Chriſt is no ſin, nothing but grace, righteouſneſs, and holineſs ſpring from him. There's no deformity nor deficiency in him; all fulneſs of grace dwells in him to ſupply the members of his body; he is an one, and only head, and an ever-living and everlaſting one. And the head of the woman is the man. The man is firſt in order in being, was firſt formed, and the woman out of him, who was made for him, and not he for the woman, and therefore muſt be head and chief; as he is alſo with reſpect to his ſuperior gifts and excellencies, as ſtrength of body, and endowments of mind, whence the woman is called the weaker veſſel; likewiſe with regard to pre-eminence or government, the man is the head; and as Chriſt is the head of the church, and the church is ſubject to him, ſo the huſband is the head of the wife, and ſhe is to be ſubject to him in every thing natural, civil, and religious. Moreover, the man is the head of the woman to provide and care for her, to nouriſh and cheriſh her, and to protect and defend her againſt all inſults and injuries. And the head of Chriſt is God; that is, the Father, not as to his divine nature, for in reſpect to that they are one: Chriſt, as God, is equal to his Father, and is poſſeſſed of the ſame divine perfections with him; nor is his Father the head of him, in that ſenſe; but as to his human nature which he formed, prepared, anointed, upheld, and glorified; and in which nature Chriſt exerciſed grace on him, he hoped in him, he believed and truſted in him, and loved him, and yielded obedience to him; he always did the things that pleaſed him in life; he prayed to him; he was obedient to him, even unto death, and committed his ſoul or ſpirit into his hands: and all this he did as to his ſuperior, conſidered in the human nature, and alſo in his office-capacity as mediator, who as ſuch was his ſervant; and whoſe ſervice he diligently and faithfully performed, and had the character from him of a righteous one; ſo that God is the head of Chriſt, as he is man and mediator, and as ſuch only.

Ver. 4. Every man praying or propheſying, &c.] This is to be underſtood of praying and propheſying in publick, and not in private; and not to be reſtrained to the perſon that is the mouth of the congregation to God in prayer, or who preaches to the people in the name of God; but to be applied to every individual perſon that attends public worſhip, that joins in prayer with the miniſter, and hears the word preached by him, which is meant by propheſying; for not foretelling future events is here meant, but explaining the word of God, the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, or any part of ſcripture, unleſs ſinging of pſalms ſhould rather be deſigned, ſince that is ſometimes expreſſed by propheſying: ſo in 1 Sam. x. 5. thou ſhalt meet a company of prophets coming down from the high place, with a pſaltery, and a tabret, and a pipe, and a harp before them, and they ſhall propheſy. The Targum renders it thus, ואנון משבחין, and they ſhall ſing praiſe; upon which Kimchi obſerves, that it is as if it was ſaid, their prophecy ſhall be, שירות, ſongs and praiſes to God, ſpoken by the Holy Ghoſt. So in 1 Sam. xix. 23, 24. it is ſaid of Saul, that he went on and propheſied. The Targum is, he went on, ומשבח, and praiſed. And again, he ſtripp'd off his clothes alſo, and propheſied. Targum, ושבח, and praiſed, or ſung praiſe. Once more, in 1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2, 3. it is ſaid of Aſaph, and others, that they ſhould propheſy with harps, with pſalteries, and with cymbals; which Kimchi explains of Aſaph's ſinging vocally, and of his ſons playing upon muſical inſtruments. Having his head covered; which, it ſeems, was the cuſtom of ſome of them ſo to do in attendance on public worſhip: this they either did in imitation of the heathens [r], who worſhipped their deities with their heads covered, excepting Saturn and Hercules, whoſe ſolemnities were celebrated with heads unveiled, contrary to the prevailing cuſtoms and uſages in the worſhip of others; or rather in imitation of the Jews, who uſed to vail themſelves in public worſhip, thro' a ſpirit of bondage unto fear, under which they were, and do to this day; and with whom it is a rule [s], that "a man might "not ſtand and pray, neither with his girdle on, "ולא בראש מגולה, nor with his head uncovered; "nor with his feet uncovered." Accordingly 'tis ſaid [t] of Nicodemus ben Gorion, "that he went into "the ſchool grieved, and נתעטף, vailed himſelf, "and ſtood in prayer;" and a little after that "he went into the ſanctuary and vailed himſelf, "and ſtood and prayed;" tho' the Targum on Jud. v. 2. ſuggeſts, "that the wiſe men ſit in the "ſynagogues, בריש גלי, with the head uncovered, "to teach the people the words of the law;" and on ver. 9. has theſe words, "Deborah in prophecy "ſaid, I am ſent to praiſe the ſcribes of Iſrael, [t] T. Bab. Taanith, fol. 20. 1.

" who when they were in tribulation did not ceaſe " from expounding the law; and ſo it was beautiful for them to ſit in the ſynagogus, with the " head uncovered, and teach the people the words " of the law, and bleſs and confeſs before the " Lord;" but it ſeems, that a different cuſtom had now prevailed; now from this Gentile or judaizing practice, the Apoſtle would diſſuade them by obſerving, that ſuch an one that uſes it, diſhonoureth his head; meaning either in a figurative ſpiritual and myſtical ſenſe, his head Chriſt, in token of the liberty received from him, and becauſe he is above in heaven, and clear of all ſin, the head muſt be uncovered in publick worſhip; or otherwiſe the reverſe is ſuggeſted of him, which is highly to diſhonour him, and is the ſenſe many interpreters give into: rather the reaſon ſhould be, becauſe Chriſt, the believers head, appears for him in heaven, opens a way of acceſs for him, gives him audience and acceptance in his perſon, and thro' his blood and righteouſneſs; and therefore ſhould appear with open face and head uncovered, as a token of freedom and boldneſs; otherwiſe he diſhonours his head as if his blood and ſacrifice were not effectual, and his interceſſion not prevalent: but the natural head, taken in a literal ſenſe, is rather meant; and the ſenſe is, that by covering it, it looks as if he was guilty, and aſhamed, and in ſubjection; whereas to appear uncovered expreſſes freedom, boldneſs, and ſuperiority, like himſelf, who is the head of the woman; whereas to be covered, as with a woman's vail or hood, is effeminate, unmanly, and diſhonourable.

Ver. 5. But every woman that prayeth or propheſieth, &c.] Not that a woman was allowed to pray publickly in the congregation, and much leſs to preach or explain the word, for theſe things were not permitted them; ſee 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35. 1 Tim. ii. 12. but it deſigns any woman that joins in public worſhip with the miniſter in prayer, and attends on the hearing of the word preached, or ſings the praiſes of God with the congregation, as we have ſeen, the word propheſying ſignifies, with her head uncovered. It may ſeem ſtrange from whom the Corinthian women ſhould take up this cuſtom, since the Jewiſh women were not allowed to go into the ſtreets, or into any open and publick place, unvailed [u]. It was a Jewiſh law, that they ſhould go out no where bare-headed [w]: yea, it was reckoned ſcandalous and ignominious to do ſo. Hence 'tis ſaid [x], שגלוי הראש גנאי להם, that uncovering of the head is a reproach to the daughters of Iſrael: and concerning the adulterous woman, it is repreſented as ſaid by the prieſt [y], " thou haſt ſeparated " from the way of the daughters of Iſrael; for " the way or cuſtom of the daughters of Iſrael is, " לִהיות מכֻוסות ראשיהן, to have their heads covered; " but thou haſt gone in the ways of the Gentiles, " who walk with their head bare." So that it ſhould ſeem that theſe Corinthians followed the examples of the heathens: but then, though it might be the cuſtom of ſome nations for women to go abroad bare-headed; yet at their ſolemnities, where and when they were admitted, for they were not every where, and always, they uſed to attend with their heads vailed and covered [z]. Mr. Mede takes notice indeed of ſome Heathen prieſteſſes, who uſed to perform their religious rites and ſacrifices with open face, and their hair hanging down, and locks ſpreading, in imitation of whom theſe women at Corinth are thought to act. However, whoever behaved in this uncomely manner, whoſe example ſoever ſhe followed, the Apoſtle ſays, diſhonoureth her head; not her huſband, who is her head in a figurative ſenſe, and is diſhonoured by her not being covered; as if ſhe was not ſubject to him, or becauſe more beautiful than he, and therefore ſhows not herſelf; but her natural head, as appears from the reaſon given: for that is even all one as if ſhe were ſhaven; to be without a vail, or ſome ſort of covering on her head, according to the cuſtom of the country, is the ſame thing as if her head was ſhaved; and every one knows how diſhonourable and ſcandalous it is for a woman to have her head ſhaved; and if this is the ſame, then it is diſhonourable and ſcandalous to her to be without covering in publick worſhip. And this ſhews, that the natural head of the man is meant in the preceding verſe, ſince the natural head of the woman is meant in this.

Ver. 6. For if the woman be not covered, &c.] That is, if her head is not covered with ſome ſort of covering, as is the cuſtom of the place where ſhe lives, let her alſo be ſhorn; let her hair be cut ſhort; let her wear it as men do theirs; and let her ſee how ſhe will look, and how ſhe will like that, and how ſhe will be looked upon, and liked by others; every body will laugh at her, and ſhe'll be aſhamed of herſelf: but if it be a ſhame for a woman to be ſhorn or ſhaven; as it is accounted in all civilized nations: the very Heathens [a] ſpeak of it as a thing abominable, and of which there ſhould not be one ſingle dreadful example: then let her be covered; with a vail, or any ſort of covering in common uſe.

Ver. 7. For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, &c.] The Ethiopic verſion adds, whilſt he prays; which is a proper interpretation of the words, though a wrong verſion; for the Apoſtle's meaning is not, that a man ſhould not have his head covered at any time, but whilſt he is in publick worſhip, praying, propheſying, or ſinging of pſalms: the reaſon is, foraſmuch as he is the image and glory of God. The Apoſtle ſpeaks of man here as in his firſt creation, in his ſtate of innocence before his fall; but now he has ſinned and defaced this image, and come ſhort of this glory; which lay partly in his body being made after the exemplar of the body of Chriſt, the idea of which God had in his eternal mind, and according to which he ſhaped the body of Adam; and partly in his ſoul, in that righteouſneſs and holineſs, wiſdom and knowledge, and all other excellent gifts in which it was formed. So the Jews [b] ſay, the underſtanding is, כבוד השם, the glory of God. And it chiefly lay in the power and dominion he had over all the creatures, and even over the woman when made; at leaſt this is principally reſpected here, in which there is ſuch a ſhine and repreſentation of the glory and majeſty, power and dominion of God; and therefore man ought to worſhip him with his head uncovered, where this image and glory of God is moſt illuſtriouſly diſplayed: not but that the woman is the image and glory of God alſo, and was made as man, after his image and likeneſs, with reſpect to internal qualities, as righteouſneſs, holineſs, knowledge, &c. and with regard to her power over the other creatures, tho' in ſubjection to man; but yet man was firſt originally and immediately the image and glory of God, the woman only ſecondarily and mediately through man. The man is more perfectly and conſpicuouſly the image and glory of God, on account of his more extenſive dominion and authority: but the woman is the glory of the man; being made out of him, and for his help and aſſiſtance, and to be a crown of honour and glory to him. The Apoſtle ſpeaks the ſenſe, and in the language of the Jews. The words in Iſa. xliv. 13. After the figure of a man, according to the beauty of a man, are by the Targum rendered, after the likeneſs of a man, after the glory of a woman; and the note of a famous [c] interpreter of theirs upon the laſt clauſe is, this is the woman, שהיא תפארת בעלה, who is the glory of her huſband; but why is ſhe to be covered for this reaſon, when the man is to be uncovered? it is to be obſerved, that it is in the preſence and worſhip of God, that the one is to be uncovered, and the other covered; the one being the glory of God, and therefore to be uncovered before him; and the other the glory of man, and therefore to be covered before God; and eſpecially, ſince being firſt in the tranſgreſſion, ſhe who is man's glory, has been the means of his ſhame and diſgrace. The Jews ſeem to make this the reaſon of the difference; they aſk [d], "why does a man "go out with his head uncovered, and a woman "with her head covered? it is anſwered, it is like "to one that has committed a ſin, and he is "aſhamed of the children of men, therefore ſhe "goes, וראשה מכוסה, with her head covered."

Ver. 8. For the man is not of the woman, &c.] In the preſent ſtate of things, and according to the ordinary courſe of generation and propagation of mankind, man is of the woman, though not without the means of man; he is conceived in her, bore by her, and born of her; but the Apoſtle reſpects the original formation of man, as he was immediately made by God out of the duſt of the earth, before the woman was in being, and ſo not of her: but the woman of the man; ſhe was made out of his rib, and took both her name and nature from him; God was the author, and man the matter of her being; her original under God, is owing to him; and therefore as he was firſt in being, he muſt be ſuperior to her: this ſerves to prove all that has been as yet ſaid; as that man is the head of the woman, the woman is the glory of man, what he may glory in as being from him; and therefore there ſhould be this difference in their appearance at publick worſhip.

Ver. 9. Neither was the man created for the woman, &c.] To be ſubſervient to her; for ſhe was not in being when he was created; and though it is the proper buſineſs of man to provide for, take care of, and defend the woman, as the weaker veſſel, yet theſe were not the original ends of his creation; he was made for God, for his ſervice and glory: but the woman for the man; to be an help-meet for him, who was already created; to be a companion and aſſociate of his, both in religious worſhip and in civil life; and for the procreation and education of children.

Ver. 10. For this cauſe ought the woman to have power on her head, &c.] The generality of interpreters by power, underſtand the vail, or covering on the woman's head, as a ſign of the man's power over her, and her ſubjection to him; which Dr. Hammond endeavours to confirm, by obſerving that the Hebrew word רדיד, which ſignifies a woman's veil, or hood, comes from a root which ſignifies power and dominion; but in that he's miſtaken, for the word is derived not from רדה, to rule, govern, or exerciſe power and authority, but from רדד, to expand, ſtretch out, or draw over, as a woman's veil is drawn over her head and face. The Greek word εξȣσια, more properly ſignifies the power ſhe had of putting on and off her covering as ſhe pleaſed, according as times, places, and perſons, made it neceſſary: becauſe of the angels; various are the ſenſes given of theſe words, ſome taking them in a proper, others in a figurative ſenſe; ſome in a proper ſenſe of angels, and theſe either good or bad. Tertullian [e] underſtands them of evil angels, and that a woman ſhould cover her head in time of worſhip, leſt they ſhould luſt after her; though much rather the reaſon ſhould be, leſt they ſhould irritate and provoke luſt in others: but it is better to underſtand them of good angels, who attend the aſſemblies of the ſaints, and obſerve the air and behaviour of the worſhippers; wherefore women ſhould cover their heads with reſpect to them, and not give offence to thoſe pure ſpirits, by an indecent appearance: it is agreeable to the notions of the Jews, that angels attend publick prayers, and the expounding of the word; they often ſpeak [f] of an angel, הממונה על התפלות, that is appointed over prayers; hence [g] Tertullian ſeems to have took his notion of an angel of prayer: and of angels being preſent at expounding of the ſcriptures, take the following ſtory [h]; "it happened to Rabban Jochanan ben Zaccai, that he "was riding upon an aſs, and as he was journeying, R. Eleazar ben Arach was leading an aſs "after him; he ſaid to him, Rabbi, teach me one "chapter in the work of Mercavah (Ezekiel's viſions) he replied to him, not ſo have I taught "you, nor in the Mercavah a ſingle man, unleſs "he was a wiſe man by his own induſtry; he anſwered him, Rabbi, give me leave to ſay one "thing before thee, which thou haſt taught me; "immediately Rabban Jochanan ben Zaccai alighted "from his aſs and vailed himſelf, and ſat upon "a ſtone under an olive-tree; he ſaid to him, "Rabbi, why doſt thou alight off from the aſs? "he replied, is it poſſible that thou ſhouldſt expound in the work of Mercavah, and the Shekinah be with us, ומלאכי השרת מלוין אותנו, and the miniſtring angels join us, and I ride upon an "aſs?" And a little after, "R. Joſhua and R. Joſe the prieſt were walking on the road, they "ſaid, yea, let us expound in the work of Mercavah; R. Joſhua opened and expounded, and "that day was the ſolſtice of Tammuz, and the "heavens were thickened with clouds, and there "appeared the form of a bow in the cloud, and the miniſtring angels gathered together, ובאין לשמוע, "and came to hear; as the children of men gather "together, and come to ſee the rejoicings of the "bridegroom and bride." Moreover, this vailing of the woman in publick worſhip becauſe of angels, may be in imitation of the good angels, who when they ſung the praiſes of God, and adored and glorified his perfections covered their faces and their feet with their wings, Iſa. vi. 1, 2, 3. Many underſtand theſe words in a figurative ſenſe, and in this alſo they are not agreed; ſome by angels think young men are meant, who for their graceful neſs and comelineſs, are compared to angels; others good men in general, that attend religious worſhip; others miniſters of the word, called angels often in the book of the Revelations; which laſt ſeems to be moſt agreeable of any of theſe ſenſes; and the women were to cover their heads, that they might not offend either of theſe, or ſtir up any impure deſires in them; ſee Eccleſ. v. 6. but as theſe words follow the account given of the creation of the woman from the man, and for his ſake; this may have no reference to her conduct in publick worſhip, but to the power ſhe had of uſing her covering, or taking it off, or putting it on at the time of her eſpouſals to a man; which was ſometimes done by proxy, or meſſengers, whom the Jews call, שלוחים, angels [i]; their canon is, "a man "may eſpouſe (a wife) by himſelf, ובשלוחו, or by "his angel, or meſſenger; and a woman may be "eſpouſed by herſelf, or by her angel, or meſſen"ger:" wherefore becauſe of theſe angels, or meſſengers, that came to eſpouſe her to ſuch, ſhe had power over her head to take off her veil, and ſhew herſelf, if ſhe thought fit; or to keep it on, as expreſſing her modeſty; or juſt as ſhe pleaſed, when ſhe by them was eſpouſed to a man, for whoſe ſake ſhe was made; which ſenſe after Dr. Lightfoot, many learned men have given into, and ſeems probable.

Ver. 11. Nevertheleſs, neither is the man without the woman, &c.] This is ſaid, partly to repreſs the pride and inſolence of man, that he might not be too much elated with himſelf, and his ſuperiority over the woman, and look with any degree of diſdain and contempt upon her, and treat her with indifference and neglect; and partly to comfort the woman, that ſhe might not be dejected with the condition and circumſtances in which ſhe was, ſince the one is not without the other; nor can they be ſo truly comfortable and happy, as not the man without the woman, who was made for an helpmeet for him, ſo neither the woman without the man in the Lord. The phraſe in the Lord is added, to ſhew that it is the will of God, and according to his ordination and appointment, that the one ſhould not be without the other; or it may deſign that lawful conjunction and copulation, of one man and one woman together, according to the will of the Lord, which diſtinguiſhes it from all other impure mixtures and copulations. The Arabic verſion reads it, in the religion of the Lord; and the ſenſe is, that the one is not without the other in religious worſhip, and in the enjoyment of religious privileges; that though the woman may not pray publickly and expound the ſcriptures, yet ſhe may join in prayer, and hear the word preached, ſing the praiſes of God, and enjoy all ordinances; for in Chriſt, no diſtinction of ſex is regarded, men and women are all one in him, and equally regenerated, juſtified, and pardoned, and will be glorified together.

Ver. 12. For as the woman is of the man, &c.] Originally; ſo Eve was of Adam, made out of one of his ribs: even ſo is the man alſo by the woman; now man is born of a woman, he is conceived of one, and brought into the world by one. This is the way in which mankind is propagated, the ſpecies preſerved, continued, and increaſed; and therefore there is no reaſon why the woman ſhould be deſpiſed, or the man ſhould be lifted up with himſelf above her, ſince they are ſo dependant upon, and ſo uſeful to each other: but all things of God. The Arabic verſion reads it, all creatures are of God; which is true, but not the truth of theſe words, which are to be reſtrained to the ſubject of the diſcourſe; as that both the man and the woman are of God; they are made by him, and after his image and likeneſs; that the man is the glory of God, and the woman the glory of the man; the authority of the man over the woman, and the ſubjection of the woman to the man, are of God; and according to his conſtitution and appointment; as alſo that the woman ſhould be of the man, and for his ſake, and that the man ſhould be by the woman, and neither ſhould be without the other: theſe are not things of human conſtitution, but are ſettled by the wiſe counſel of God, and therefore to be chearfully ſubmitted to, as the beſt order of things.

Ver. 13. Judge in yourſelves, &c.] The Apoſtle having gone through a variety of reaſoning and arguments, ſhewing the ſuperiority of the man to the woman, by which he would prove, that the one ſhould be covered, and the other uncovered, returns to his ſubject again, and appeals to the common ſenſe and underſtanding of the Corinthians, and makes them themſelves judges of the matter; ſuggeſting that the thing was ſo clear, and he ſo certain of what he had advanced being right, that he leaves it with them, not doubting but that they would, upon a little reflection within themſelves, join with him in this point: is it comely that a woman pray unto God uncovered? in your judgment you can never think ſo, however pleaſing and gratifying ſuch a ſight may be, to the luſt of the fleſh, and to the luſt of the eye; he does not mention propheſying, only inſtances in praying; but it is to be underſtood of one, as of another; and his meaning is, that it is an uncomely thing in a woman to appear in publick ſervice with her head uncovered, whether it be in joining in the publick prayers, or in ſinging of pſalms, or in hearing the word expounded; and though the Apoſtle does not put the caſe of the man's praying to God, or propheſying in his name with his head covered, yet his ſenſe is the ſame of that, as of the woman's.

Ver. 14. Doth not even nature itſelf teach you, &c.] By nature is either meant, the law and light of nature, reaſon in man, common ſenſe, or rather cuſtom, which is ſecond nature; and which in this caſe, muſt be reſtrained to the Greeks and Jews; for though among the Grecians the men cut their hair, and did not ſuffer it to grow long, as alſo did the Jews, yet there were many nations [k] who did not, even at that time, obſerve ſuch a rule or cuſtom; but as the Jews and Greeks were the perſons chiefly, if not ſolely known to the Corinthians, the Apoſtle ſignifies, that the uſages of theſe people might direct and inform them in this matter: that if a man have long hair it is a ſhame unto him; he looks unmanly and womaniſh, and expoſes himſelf to ridicule and contempt.

Ver. 15. But if a woman have long hair, &c.] And wears it, without cutting it, as men do: it is a glory to her; it is comely and beautiful; it is agreeable to her ſex, ſhe looks like herſelf; it becomes and adorns her: for her hair is given her for a covering; not inſtead of a covering for her head, or any other part of her body, ſo that ſhe needs no other: we read indeed of the daughter of Nicodemus ben Gorion, that ſhe was obliged to make uſe of her hair for a covering in ſuch a ſenſe [l]; "it happened to "R. Jochanan ben Zaccai that he rode upon an aſs, "and went out of Jeruſalem, and his diſciples went "after him; he ſaw a young woman gathering "barley-corns out of the dung of the Arabian cattle; "when ſhe ſaw him, נתעטפה בשערה, ſhe covered "herſelf with her hair, and ſtood before him:" but this covering was made uſe of, not of choice, but by force, through her poverty, ſhe having no other; this was not the cuſtom of the nation, nor was was the hair given to women for a covering in this ſenſe, nor uſed by them as ſuch, unleſs by Eve before the fall; but is rather an indication that they want another covering for their head, it not being ſo decent that their long hair ſhould be ſeen. The Jewiſh women uſed to eſteem it an immodeſt thing for their hair to be ſeen, and therefore they took care, as much as poſſible, to hide it under another covering; "one woman whoſe name was Kimchith "had ſeven ſons, and they all miniſtred in the "high-prieſthood; the wiſe men ſaid unto her, "what haſt thou done, that thou art ſo worthy? ſhe "replied to them, all my days the beams of my houſe "never ſaw קלעי שערי, the plaits of my hair [m];" that is, they were never ſeen by any perſon, even within her houſe.

Ver. 16. But if any man ſeem to be contentious, &c.] That is, if any one will not be ſatisfied with the reaſons given, for mens praying and propheſying with their heads uncovered, and womens praying and propheſying with their heads covered; but will go on to raiſe objections, and continue carping and cavilling, ſhowing that they contend not for truth, but victory, can they but obtain it any way; for my part, as if the Apoſtle ſhould ſay, I ſhall not think it worth my while to continue the diſpute any longer; enough has been ſaid to ſatiſfy any wiſe and good man, any one that is ſerious, thoughtful, and modeſt; and ſhall only add, we have no ſuch cuſtom, nor the churches of God; meaning, either that men ſhould appear covered, and women uncovered in publick ſervice, and which ſhould have ſome weight with all thoſe that have any regard to churches and their examples; or that men ſhould be indulged in a captious and contentious ſpirit; a man that is always contending for contention ſake, and is continually cavilling and carping at every thing that is ſaid and done in churches, and is always quarrelling with one perſon or another, or on account of one thing or another, and is conſtantly giving uneaſineſs, is not fit to be a church-member; nor ought he to be ſuffered to continue in the communion of the church, to the diſturbance of the peace of it. This puts me in mind of a paſſage in the Talmud [n]. "The Rabbans teach, that after the "departure of R. Meir, R. Judah ſaid to his diſciples, don't let the diſciples of R. Meir enter "here, מפני שקנתרנין הן, becauſe they are contentious."

Ver. 17. Now in this that I declare unto you, &c.] The Syriac verſion reads, this is what I command; which ſome refer to what he had been diſcourſing of, adding to his arguments and the examples of the church, his own orders and command, that men ſhould worſhip God publickly, uncovered, and women covered; tho' it ſeems rather to reſpect what follows, what the Apoſtle was about to declare unto them; concerning which he ſays, I praiſe you not; as he did in ver. 2. that they were mindful of him, remembred his doctrines, and kept the ordinances in the manner he had delivered them to them: and it ſhould ſeem by this, that the greater part of them were not to be blamed, tho' ſome few were, for their irregular and indecent appearance in public worſhip, men with a covering on their heads, and women without one; but in what he was about to ſay, he could not praiſe them at all: that you come together; to the houſe of God, to pray unto him, to ſing his praiſes, to hear his word, and attend his ordinances, particularly the Lord's ſupper: not for the better; for edification and inſtruction, for the quickning and comforting of your ſouls; that you may grow in grace and knowledge, become more holy, zealous, fruitful, and uſeful: but for the worſe; to indulge luxury and intemperance, to encourage hereſies, ſchiſms, and diviſions, and ſo grow more carnal, ſcandalous, and uſeleſs.

Ver. 18. For firſt of all, when ye come together in the church, &c.] The place where the church met together to perform divine ſervice, called one place, ver. 20. and is diſtinguiſhed from their own houſes, ver. 22. and the firſt thing he took notice of as worthy of diſpraiſe and reproof, in their religious aſſemblies, were their animoſities and factions: I hear that there be diviſions among you; ſchiſms and parties, either about their miniſters, one being for Paul, another for Apollos, and another for Cephas; or in the celebration of the Lord's ſupper, and that which went before it, they going into ſeparate bodies, and partook by themſelves, and each took his own ſupper before another, one eat, and another did not. This the Apoſtle had heard from the houſe of Chloe: and I partly believe it; meaning, either that this was the practice of a part of the church to do ſo, tho' not of them all; or that part of the report that had been made to him was true; tho' he hoped in that charity which hopeth all things, that it was not quite ſo bad as was feared or repreſented, ſince things are generally heightened and increaſed by fame; but yet he had it from ſuch good hands, that he could not but believe there was ſomething in it. So the Syriac verſion renders it, ומדם מדם, and ſomething, or ſomething I believe.

Ver. 19. For there muſt be alſo hereſies among you, &c.] This is a reaſon, why he was ready to believe there might be ſomething of truth, in the report he had received of the diviſions among them; for if there were hereſies, falſe doctrines, and bad principles among them, ſuch as were ſubverſive of the fundamentals of chriſtianity, as the denial of the reſurrection of the dead, &c. it was no wonder that there were ſchiſms and factions among them, ſince hereſies generally iſſue in them. Theſe the Apoſtle ſays, muſt be; becauſe God has decreed they ſhall, whoſe counſel is immutable, and his purpoſe unalterable; and ſince this always was the caſe, that there were falſe prophets under the former diſpenſation, it muſt be expected that falſe teachers will ariſe in the churches now, bringing in damnable hereſies; and ſince ſatan is always buſy to ſow the tares of falſe doctrine; and human nature being both weak and wicked, is ſo ſuſceptible thereof, and ſo eaſily impoſed upon and deceived, it cannot be thought that it ſhould be otherwiſe; which by the goodneſs and wiſdom of God, are over-ruled to a very good purpoſe: that they which are approved; who ſincerely believe in Chriſt, are found in the faith, and have a well grounded experience of it; who have themſelves tried things that differ, and approve of them that are excellent, and have been tried by others, and found to be ſincere, upright, and faithful, and are approved of God and good men: may be made manifeſt among you; by their ſtedfaſtneſs in the faith, their zealous attachment to it, earneſt contention for it, and warm and honeſt vindication of it; and by the departure of thoſe from them who oppoſe it, and go on the ſide of error and hereſy; by which means it is known, who are the ſincere followers of the lamb, in doctrine, diſcipline, and converſation, and who not.

[m] T. Bab. Yoma, fol. 47. 1.

[n] T. Bab. Nazir, fol. 49. 2. & Kiddushin, fol. 52. 2.

Ver. 20. When ye come together therefore into one place, &c.] Tho' ἐπι το αὐτο does not ſignify ſo much the unity of the place, as of the perſons meeting together, and their conjunction; ſo the phraſe is uſed by the Septuagint, in Deut. xxv. 11. Joſh. xi. 5. yet it ſuppoſes a place, where the church were wont to aſſemble for divine worſhip; this is not to eat the Lord's ſupper; their view in coming together, was not ſo much to celebrate the ſupper of the Lord, as to partake of their own ſupper, which was either the Paſchal ſupper, or ſomething like it; which many of them judaizing obſerved before the Lord's ſupper, in imitation of Chriſt, as they pretended, who firſt eat the paſſover, and then inſtituted the ſupper. Now there being a great deal of good eating and drinking in this ante-ſupper, many of them came together for no other end, but to partake of that, at leaſt, this was their chief view, and not the Lord's ſupper; or when they did meet together on this account, it was in ſuch an irregular and diſorderly manner, and they confounded theſe ſuppers together, and behaved ſo ill at them, and eat the Lord's ſupper ſo unworthily, that it could not be rightly called eating of it; or when they had eat their ante-ſupper in ſuch an indecent way, neither ſtaying for one another, nor keeping within the bounds of temperance and ſobriety; at leaſt having indulged their carnal appetites to ſuch a degree, and raiſed themſelves to ſuch a pitch of gaiety and chearfulneſs; it was not fit for them to eat the Lord's ſupper, to go from ſuch a full meal to the table of the Lord. This was called the Lord's ſupper, becauſe he was the author of it; and he is the ſubject of it; and for him, the remembrance of him, it is appointed, kept up, and continued. The Syriac verſion underſtands it, of the Lord's day, and reads it thus, when therefore ye meet together, not as is fit for, or becomes ליומה דמרן, the day of our Lord, do ye eat and drink.

Ver. 21. For in eating, &c.] Not at the Lord's table, but at tables ſpread for them in the place of divine worſhip, where every one brought his own food, under a pretence that others, particularly the poor, ſhould eat with him; but inſtead of that, he ſat down and eat it himſelf, and would not ſtay till the reſt came, to eat together: but every one taketh before other his own ſupper; that is, without tarrying till all came together, in order to eat a friendly meal with each other, to encourage and increaſe brotherly love, one would ſit down and fill himſelf before another came; ſo that ſome went without, whilſt others had too much; and thus the deſigned end was not anſwered; and the whole was a piece of confuſion and diſorder: and one is hungry, and another drunken; he that came late had nothing to eat, and ſo was hungry; when he that was firſt either eat and drank to exceſs, or at leaſt very plentifully, ſo that he was very chearful, and more diſpoſed to carnal mirth, than in a ſerious and ſolemn manner to partake of the Lord's ſupper; and who is thought to be the rich man, who brought his own proviſions, and eat them himſelf when he had done; as the poor may be meant by the hungry, who having no food to bring with them, and none being communicated to them by the rich, were in want, and ſtarving; ſo that here were many abuſes, juſtly chargeable on them. Dr. Lightfoot is of opinion, that by him that was drunken, is meant the Jew that eat the paſchal ſupper, of which he eat and drank freely; and by him that was hungry, the Gentile, who was ſo not out of poverty and neceſſity, but becauſe he refuſed and avoided eating of the ante-ſupper, as ſavouring of Judaiſm; and ſo here was a ſchiſm and diviſion among them.

Ver. 22. What have ye not houſes to eat and drink in? &c.] This ſhows that one taking his ſupper before another, was not in their own houſes, before they came to the place of divine worſhip, but in the houſe of God; and the Apoſtle ſuggeſts, that if they muſt have their ante-ſuppers, and were diſpoſed to eat and drink freely, before they partook of the Lord's ſupper, it was more decent and orderly, and leſs reflected upon the honour of religion and the ordinances of Chriſt, to eat and drink in their own houſes; in which they were not only more private and retired, but which they had for ſuch purpoſes; whereas the houſe of God was not for any ſuch uſe, nor ſhould they meet together there on ſuch an account; at leaſt, ſuch diſorderly, unequal, and intemperate feaſts there, were very ſcandalous and reproachful: and it was contrary to a Jewiſh canon, to eat and drink in the ſynagogues, which runs thus[o], "in the ſynagogues "they don't uſe a light behaviour, nor do they "eat and drink in them;" tho' they ſometimes ſpeak of travellers eating and drinking and lodging in the ſynagogues[p], yet they interpret theſe of places adjoining to them: or deſpiſe ye the church of God; that is, expoſe it to contempt and ſcorn; meaning either the community, the people of God gathered together in a Goſpel-church-ſtate; or the place where they met for publick worſhip, which the Ethiopic verſion calls, the houſe of God; which was rendered very contemptible, by ſuch diſorderly practices: and ſhame them that have not; no houſes to eat in, or ſupper to eat, or any of this world's goods, or money to purchaſe food for themſelves; who muſt be confounded and put to ſhame, when coming in expectation of being fed, the proviſions were eaten up by the rich before they came, or however were not allowed to partake when they did come; this was ſuch a reſpecting of perſons, as was juſtly culpable in them by the Apoſtle.

Ver. 23. For I have received of the Lord, &c.] The Apoſtle obſerves unto them, the rule, uſe, and end of the Lord's ſupper; his view in it is, to correct the diſorders among them, and to bring them to a ſtrict regard to the rule which had ſuch a divine authority inſtamped upon it; and to obſerve to them, that in that ſupper all equally eat and drank; and that the end of it was not a paſchal commemoration, but a remembrance of Chriſt, and a declaration of his ſufferings and death. The divine authority of the Lord's ſupper is here expreſſed; it was not only inſtituted by him as Lord, having all power and authority in and over his churches, to appoint what ordinances he pleaſes; but the plan and form of adminiſtration of it, were received from him by the Apoſtle. This was not a device of his, nor an invention of any man's, nor did he receive the account from men, no not from the Apoſtles; but he had it by revelation from Chriſt, either when he appeared to him at his firſt converſion, and made him a miniſter of the Goſpel; or when he was caught up into the third heaven, and heard things unſpeakable and unutterable: that which alſo I delivered unto you; for whatever he received from Chriſt, whether a doctrine or an ordinance, he faithfully delivered to the churches, from whom he kept back nothing that was profitable, ble, but declared the whole counſel of God unto them: now this he refers the Corinthians to, as a ſure rule to go by, and from which they ſhould never ſwerve; and whatever ſtands on divine record as received from Chriſt, and delivered by his Apoſtles, ſhould be the rule of our faith and practice, and ſuch only: that the Lord Jeſus, the ſame night in which he was betrayed; or delivered; as he was by the determinate counſel and foreknowledge of God the father, and as he was by himſelf, who voluntarily gave himſelf up into the hands of men, juſtice and death, for our offences; and ſo the Arabic verſion reads it here, in the night in which he delivered up himſelf; as he did in the garden to Judas and his company: it was in the night when he came in ſearch of him with officers, and a band of ſoldiers, and when he betrayed him and delivered him into their hands; and that ſame night a little before, our Lord inſtituted and celebrated the ordinance of the ſupper with his diſciples. The time is mentioned partly with regard to the paſſover it followed, which was killed in the evening and eat the ſame night in commemoration of God's ſparing the firſt-born of Iſrael, when at midnight he deſtroyed all the firſt-born of Egypt, and ſo was a night to be obſerved in all generations; and becauſe this feaſt was to be a ſupper, and therefore it is beſt to obſerve it in the evening, or decline of the day. The circumſtance of Judas's betraying him, is mentioned not only becauſe it was in the night, and a work of darkneſs; but being in the ſame night he inſtituted the ſupper, ſhews the knowledge he had of his death by the means of the betrayer, and his great love to his diſciples, his church and people, in appointing ſuch an ordinance in remembrance of him, and his death, when he was juſt about to leave them: took bread; from off the table, out of the diſh, or from the hands of the maſter of the houſe; an emblem of his body, and of his aſſumption of human nature; of his taking upon him the nature of the ſeed of Abraham, of that body which his father prepared for him, in order to its being broken; or that he might in it, endure ſufferings and death for his people.

Ver. 24. And when he had given thanks, &c.] So Luke, chap. xxii. 19. but Matthew, chap. xxvi. 26. and Mark, chap. xiv. 22. ſay he bleſſed; not the bread, but his father; for to bleſs and give thanks is one and the ſame thing with the Jews: ſo we often read of their bleſſing for the fruits of the earth, for wine and bread; concerning which they have theſe rules[r], "he that bleſſeth for the wine, before "food, frees the wine that is after food; he that "bleſſeth for the deſſert before food, frees the "deſſert after food; ברך על הפת, he that bleſſeth "for the bread, frees the deſſert, for the deſſert "does not free the bread;" or excuſe from a bleſſing for that again: "if they ſit at eating every "one bleſſes for himſelf, if they lie (upon couches) "אחד מברך לכלם, one bleſſes for them all; when "wine is brought to them whilſt they are eating, "every one bleſſes for himſelf; if after food, one "bleſſes for them all:" our Lord conformed to theſe rules, he bleſſed and gave thanks for the bread ſeparately, and he afterwards bleſſed, or gave thanks for the wine; and as he and his diſciples lay at table, he bleſſed and gave thanks for them all: for this is not to be underſtood of any conſecration of the bread by a certain form of words, changing its nature and property, and converting it into the body of Chriſt; but either of aſking a bleſſing of his Father upon it, that whilſt his diſciples were eating of it, their faith might be led to him, the bread of life, and to his broken body, and ſpiritually feed and live on him, and receive ſpiritual nouriſhment from him; or elſe of giving thanks to his Father for what was ſignified by it, for the true bread he gave unto his people, meaning himſelf; and for that great love he ſhewed in the gift and miſſion of him; and for the great work of redemption, and all the benefits of it he had ſent him to procure, and which were juſt on finiſhing; and for all the might, ſtrength and aſſiſtance, he gave to him as man and mediator, in compleating the buſineſs of ſalvation for his people; which was the joy ſet before him, and which filled his heart with pleaſure and thankfulneſs: both theſe ſenſes may be joined together, and may direct us as to the matter of bleſſing and giving thanks at the ſupper; for no form of words is pointed out to us; what were the expreſs words our Lord uſed we know not: he brake it; as a ſymbol of his body being wounded, bruiſed, and broken, thro' buffetings, ſcourgings, platting of a crown of thorns, which was put upon his head, and piercing his hands and feet with nails, and his ſide with a ſpear; for which reaſon, the rite of breaking the bread in this ordinance, ought literally and ſtrictly to be obſerved: Chriſt himſelf took the bread and brake it, denoting his willingneſs to lay down his life, to ſuffer and die in the room of his people; and this action of breaking the bread was uſed in order to be diſtributed, and that every one might partake, as all the Iſraelites did at the paſſover, and not as theſe Corinthians at their ante-ſuppers, when one was full and another hungry; but Chriſt broke the bread that every one might have a part, as every believer may and ought, who may eat of this bread, and drink of the wine, and feed by faith on Chriſt, and take every bleſſing procured by him to themſelves: and ſaid, take, eat; that is, to his diſciples, to whom he gave the bread, when he had took it and given thanks and brake it, bidding them take it; receive it into their hands, as an emblem of their receiving him, and the bleſſings of his grace in a ſpiritual ſenſe, by the hand of faith; and eat the bread put into their hands, as a ſymbol of their eating and living by faith on Chriſt as crucified, as having loved them, and given himſelf for them: this is my body; in oppoſition to, and diſtinction from, גופו של פסח, the body of the paſſover, as the lamb was called[s]; meaning not his myſtical body the church, of which he is head, tho' this is one bread, and one body, chap. x. 17. but his natural body, and that not properly, as if the bread was really changed into it; for the bread in the ſupper after the bleſſing over it, and thanks given for it, retains its ſame nature, properties, form, and figure, only is ſet apart for the uſe of commemorating the broken body of Chriſt; and therefore this phraſe is to be underſtood in a figurative ſenſe, that it was a ſign and ſymbol of his body; it being broken into pieces repreſented his wounds, bruiſes, ſufferings, and death; juſt in ſuch ſenſe as the rock is ſaid to be Chriſt, in chap. x. 4. not that that was really Chriſt, but was a type and ſign of him: which is broken for you; for tho' a bone of him was not broken, but inaſmuch as his ſkin and fleſh were torn and broke by blows with rods and fiſts, by whipping and ſcourgings, by thorns, nails, and ſpear; and body and ſoul were torn aſunder, or divided from each other by death; and death in ſcripture is expreſſed by שבר, breaking; ſee Jer. xix. 11. his body might be truly ſaid to be broken, and that for his people; not merely to confirm his doctrine, or ſet an example of patience, tience; or only for their good; but in their room and ſtead, as their ſurety and ſubſtitute: this do in remembrance of me; ſignifying that it was not a paſſover-commemoration, or a remembrance of the Iſraelites going out of Egypt; which becauſe done in the night as that was, and following upon the paſſover, the judaizing chriſtians among the Corinthians, took it to be in remembrance of that; having imbibed that notion which the Jews then had, and ſtill retain, that their deliverance from Egypt will be remembered in the days of the Meſſiah[t]: "מזכירין, they commemorate the going out of Egypt in the nights; ſays R. Eleazer ben Azariah, lo, I am about ſeventy years of age, and I never was worthy to ſay, that the going out of Egypt was recited in nights, till Ben Zoma expounded what is ſaid, Deut. xvi. 3. that thou may'ſt remember the day when thou cameſt forth out of the land of Egypt, all the days of thy life; days of thy life, mean days, all the days of thy life, nights; but the wiſe men ſay, the days of thy life, mean this world, and all the days of thy life, include the days of the Meſſiah:" now the Apoſtle mentions theſe words of our Lord, to ſhew that the deſign of the inſtitution of this ordinance of the ſupper, was not in commemoration of the deliverance of the Jews out of Egypt; but it was in remembrance of himſelf, of what he did and ſuffered on the behalf of his people: particularly the eating of the bread, was intended to bring to remembrance how the body of Chriſt was wounded, bruiſed, and broken for them; how he bore their ſins in his own body on the tree, and ſuffered, and made ſatisfaction for them; and which was ſpiritual food for their faith when they reflected on it, and could not fail of bringing to their remembrance the love of Chriſt in all, when this was the caſe.

Ver. 25. After the ſame manner alſo he took the cup, &c.] That is, off from the table, or out of the hands of the maſter of the houſe, and bleſſed or gave thanks, as he did before when he took the bread; ſee Matt. xxvi. 27. Mark xiv. 23. when he had ſupped; the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions read, when they had ſupped; which give a true ſenſe, tho' not a literal tranſlation; for both Chriſt and his diſciples had ſupped, having both eaten the paſſover ſupper, and the bread, the principal part in the Lord's ſupper, when he took the cup, gave thanks and gave it to them: ſaying, this cup is the New Teſtament, or covenant, in my blood; alluding to the old covenant which was ratified and confirmed by the blood of bulls, and which was called, the blood of the covenant, Exod. xxiv. 8. but the new covenant was eſtabliſhed with Chriſt's own blood, of which the wine in the cup was a ſign and ſymbol; for neither the cup, nor the wine in it, can be thought to be the covenant or teſtament itſelf, by which is meant the covenant of grace, as adminiſtred under the Goſpel-diſpenſation; called new, not becauſe newly made, for it was made from everlaſting; or lately revealed, for it was made known to our firſt parents immediately after the fall, and to other ſaints in ſucceeding ages, tho' more clearly exhibited by Chriſt under the preſent diſpenſation; but it is ſo called in diſtinction from the old covenant, or former mode of adminiſtration of it, under the Moſaic œconomy; and it is always new, and will be ſucceeded by no other; and it provides for and promiſes new things, and which are famous and excellent, and preferable to all others. Now this is ſaid to be in the blood of Chriſt; that is, it is ratified, and all its bleſſings and promiſes are confirmed by his blood: hence his blood is called, the blood of the everlaſting covenant, Heb. xiii. 20. pardon and righteouſneſs, peace and reconciliation, and entrance into the holieſt of all, all come thro' this blood, and are ſecured by the ſame; and to which the faith of the ſaints is directed in this ordinance, to obſerve, receive, and enjoy for themſelves: this do ye as oft as ye drink it, in remembrance of me; of his ſoul's being poured out unto death; of his blood being ſhed for the remiſſion of ſins; and of his great love in giving himſelf an atoning ſacrifice to divine juſtice, and laying ſuch a foundation for ſolid peace and joy in the hearts of his people.

Ver. 26. For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, &c.] Not any bread, or any cup; but what is eat and drank in an ordinance-way, and according to the inſtitution and appointment of Chriſt, and with a view to the end propoſed by him; and tho' there is no ſet, fixed time for the adminiſtration of this ordinance, yet this phraſe ſeems to ſuggeſt that it ſhould be often; and very plainly ſignifies, that the bread and wine after the bleſſing or thankſgiving, remain ſuch, and are not converted into the real body and blood of Chriſt; but are only outward elements, repreſenting theſe to faith: ye do ſhew the Lord's death till he come; or rather, as it may be rendered in the imperative mood, as an exhortation, direction or command, ſhew ye the Lord's death till he come; ſince every one that eats and drinks at the Lord's table, does not ſhew forth his death, which is the great end to be anſwered by it; for the deſign of the inſtitution of it, is to declare that Chriſt died for the ſins of his people; to repreſent him as crucified; to ſet forth the manner of his ſufferings and death, by having his body wounded, bruiſed, and broken, and his blood ſhed; to expreſs the bleſſings and benefits which come by his death, and his people's faith of intereſt in them; and to ſhew their ſenſe of gratitude, and declare their thankfulneſs for them; and all this, till he come; which ſhews the continuance of this ordinance, which is to laſt till Chriſt's ſecond coming, when the carnal ordinances of the former diſpenſation were ſhaken and removed; and alſo the continuance of Goſpel-miniſters to the end of the world, to adminiſter it, and of churches to whom it is to be adminiſtred: this aſſures of the certainty of Chriſt's ſecond coming; as it leads back to his coming in the fleſh, ſuffering and dying in our ſtead, and thereby obtaining redemption for us; it leads forward to expect and believe he will come again, to put us into the full poſſeſſion of the ſalvation he is the author of; when there will be no more occaſion for this ordinance, nor any other, but all will ceaſe, and God will be all in all. The Apoſtle here refers to a cuſtom uſed by the Jews in the night of the paſſover, to ſhew forth the reaſon of their practice, and that inſtitution to their children; when either[u] "the ſon aſked the father, or if the ſon had not underſtanding (enough to to aſk) then the father taught him, ſaying, how different is this night from all other nights? for in all other nights we eat leavened and unleavened bread, but in this night only unleavened; in all other nights we eat the reſt of herbs, but in this night bitter herbs; in all other nights we eat fleſh roaſted, broiled, and boiled, in this night only roaſted; in all other nights we waſh once, in this night twice; and as elſewhere[w] 'tis added, in all other nights we eat ſitting or lying,

"in this night all of us lie; and according to the "capacity of the child, the father teaches him:" particularly, he was to inform him what theſe ſeveral things ſhewed forth, or declared [x]; as that "the "paſſover מגיד, declared, or ſhewed forth, that the "Lord paſſed over the houſes of our fathers in "Egypt; the bitter herbs ſhewed forth, that the "Egyptians made the lives of our fathers bitter in "Egypt; and the unleavened bread, declared that "they were redeemed; and all theſe things are "called, הגדה, the declaration, or ſhewing forth:" and there is a treatiſe called, הגדה של פסח, the ſhewing forth of the paſſover; in which, beſides the things mentioned, and many others, 'tis obſerved [y], that it was commanded the Jews לספר, to declare the going out of Egypt, and that every one that diligently declares the going out of Egypt, is praiſeworthy: now the Apoſtle obſerves this end of the Lord's ſupper, to ſhew forth his death, in oppoſition to the notion of the judaizing chriſtians at Corinth, who thought of nothing elſe but the ſhewing forth of the paſſover, and the declaration of that deliverance and redemption, wrought for the people of Iſrael; whereas the true and only intent of it, was to ſhew forth the death of Chriſt, redemption by him, and the greatneſs of his love expreſſed therein, and which is to be continued till his ſecond coming; whereas the time was come when it ſhould be no more ſaid, the Lord liveth, that brought up the children of Iſrael out of the land of Egypt, Jer. xvi. 14.

Ver. 27. Wherefore, &c.] Since this is the plain inſtitution of the Lord's ſupper, the form and manner of adminiſtering of it; and ſince the bread and wine in it are repreſentations of the body and blood of Chriſt, and the deſign of the whole is to remember Chriſt, and ſhew forth his death; it follows, that whoſoever ſhall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, ſhall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord. The bread and cup are called, the bread and cup of the Lord; becauſe eat and drank in remembrance of him, being ſymbols of his body and of his blood, tho' not they themſelves; theſe may be eaten and drank unworthily, when they are eaten and drank by unworthy perſons, in an unworthy manner, and to unworthy ends and purpoſes. The Lord's ſupper may be taken unworthily, when it is partook of by unworthy perſons. This ſenſe is confirmed by the Syriac verſion, which renders it, ולא שוא לה, and is not fit for it, or is unworthy of it, and ſo the Ethiopic verſion; now ſuch are all unregenerate perſons, for they have no ſpiritual life in them, and therefore can't eat and drink in a ſpiritual ſenſe; they have no ſpiritual light, and therefore can't diſcern the Lord's body; they have no ſpiritual taſte and reliſh, no ſpiritual hungrings and thirſtings, nor any ſpiritual appetite, and can receive no ſpiritual nouriſhment, or have any ſpiritual communion with Chriſt: and ſo are all ſuch perſons who tho' they may profeſs to be penitent ones, and believers in Chriſt, and to have knowledge of him, and love to him; and yet they have not true repentance, neither do they bring forth fruits meet for it, and ſo as they are improper ſubjects of baptiſm, they are unworthy of the Lord's table; nor have they faith in Chriſt, at leaſt, only an hiſtorical one, and ſo cannot by faith eat the fleſh, and drink the blood of the Son of God, nor perform the ordinance in a way well pleaſing to God; nor have they any ſpiritual knowledge of Chriſt, only what is ſpeculative and notional, and ſo cannot diſcern the Lord's body; nor any real love to him, and therefore very improper perſons to feed on a feaſt of love; nor can they affectionately remember Chriſt, or do what they do from a principle of love to him, and therefore muſt be unworthy receivers: as likewiſe are all ſuch profeſſors, whoſe lives and converſations are not as become the Goſpel of Chriſt; ſuch crucify Chriſt afreſh, and put him to open ſhame, and therefore unfit to ſhew forth his crucifixion and death; they bring a reproach on the Goſpel and ordinances of Chriſt, and cauſe his name, and ways, and truths to be blaſphemed, and grieve the members of the churches of Chriſt, and therefore ought not to be admitted to the table of the Lord: indeed, no man is in himſelf worthy of ſuch an ordinance, none but thoſe whom Chriſt has made ſo by the implantation of his grace, and the imputation of his righteouſneſs; and whom he, tho' unworthy in themſelves, invites and encourages to come to this ordinance, and to eat and drink abundantly. Moreover, this ordinance may be attended upon in an unworthy manner; as when it is partook of ignorantly, perſons not knowing the nature, uſe, and deſign of it; or irreverently, as it was by many of the Corinthians, and it is to be feared by many others, who have not that reverence of the Majeſty of Chriſt, in whoſe preſence they are, and who is both the author and ſubject of the ordinance; or without faith, and the exerciſe of it on Chriſt, the bread of life, and water of life; or unthankfully, when there is no grateful ſenſe of the love of God in the gift of his ſon, nor of the love of Chriſt, in giving himſelf an offering and ſacrifice for ſin; or when this feaſt is kept with the leaven of malice and wickedneſs, and with want of brotherly love, bearing an ill will to, or hatred of, any of the members of the church. To all which may be added, that this bread and cup are eat and drank unworthily, when they are partook of to unworthy ends and purpoſes; as to qualify for any ſecular employment, and to gain any worldly advantage; or to be ſeen of men, and to be thought to be devotional and religious perſons; or to commemorate any thing beſides Chriſt, as the judaizing Corinthians did the paſchal lamb; or to procure eternal life and happineſs thereby, fancying that the participation of this ordinance gives a meetneſs for, and a right to glory: now ſuch unworthy eaters and drinkers are guilty of the body and blood of the Lord; not in ſuch ſenſe as Judas, Pontius Pilate, and the people of the Jews were, who were concerned in the crucifixion of his body, and ſhedding of his blood, the guilt of which lies upon them, and they muſt anſwer for another day; nor in ſuch ſenſe as apoſtates from the faith, who after they have received the knowledge of the truth deny it, and Chriſt the Saviour; and ſo crucify him afreſh, and put him to open ſhame, count the blood of the covenant a common or unholy thing, and tread under foot the Son of God; at leaſt, not every unworthy receiver of the Lord's ſupper is guilty in this ſenſe; tho' there might be ſome among the Corinthians, and is the reaſon of this awful expreſſion, who looked upon the body and blood of Chriſt as common things, and made no more account of them, than of the body and blood of the paſſover lamb; but in a lower ſenſe, every unworthy communicant, or that eats and drinks unworthily, may be ſaid to be guilty of the body and blood of Chriſt, inaſmuch as he ſins againſt, and treats in an injurious manner, an ordinance which is a ſymbol and repreſentation of theſe things; for what reflects diſhonour upon that, reflects diſhonour on the body and blood of Chriſt ſignified therein.

[y] P. 5, 6. Ed. Rittangel. & Seder. Tephillot. Ed. Baſil. fol. 243. 1.

Ver. 28. But let a man examine himſelf, &c.] Whether he has a true ſenſe of ſin, ſorrow and repentance for it; otherwiſe he will ſee no need of a ſaviour, nor will he look to Chriſt for ſalvation, or be thankful to him for redemption by him; all which are neceſſary in a due obſervance of this ordinance; alſo, whether he is in the faith, whether he is a partaker of the true grace of faith, which is attended with good works, and ſhews itſelf by love to Chriſt, and to the ſaints; whereby a man goes out of himſelf to Chriſt for ſpiritual food and ſtrength, peace, and comfort, righteouſneſs, life, and ſalvation; and by which he receives all from Chriſt, and gives him all the glory: this is abſolutely neceſſary to his right and comfortable partaking of the Lord's ſupper, ſince without faith he cannot diſcern the Lord's body, nor, in a ſpiritual ſenſe, eat his fleſh, and drink his blood, nor attend on the ordinance in a manner acceptable unto God. Let him alſo examine and try, whether he is ſound in the doctrine of faith; or let him prove himſelf to be ſo, or ſhew that he is one that is approved thereby; to whom the word of faith has come with power, and who has received it in the love of it, and firmly believes it; ſince an heretick is to be rejected from the communion of the church, and to be debarr'd the ordinances of it: let him examine himſelf, whether Chriſt is in him, whether he is revealed to him, and in him, as God's way of ſalvation, and the hope of glory; whether he is formed in his ſoul, his ſpirit put, and his grace implanted there; ſince if Chriſt is not within, it will be of no avail to partake of the outward ſymbols of his body and blood. But if a man upon reflection, under the influence and teſtimony of the Spirit, can come to a ſatisfaction in theſe things, however mean and unworthy he may ſeem in his own ſight, let him come to the table of the Lord, and welcome. And ſo let him eat of that bread, and drink of that cup; none ſhould diſcourage or hinder him; nor ſhould he deprive himſelf of ſuch a privilege, to which he has an undoubted right. There ſeems to be an alluſion in theſe words to what the maſter of the family uſed at the paſſover, when he ſaid [*], "every one that is hungry, יתי ויכול, "let him come and eat, and every one that hath "need or ought, let him keep the paſſover."

Ver. 29. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, &c.] As before explained, ver. 27. eateth and drinketh damnation to himſelf; or guilt, or judgment, or condemnation; for by either may the word be rendered; nor is eternal damnation here meant; but with reſpect to the Lord's own people, who may thro' unbelief, the weakneſs of grace, and ſtrength of corruption, behave unworthily at this ſupper, temporal chaſtiſement, which is diſtinguiſhed from condemnation with the world, and is inflicted in order to prevent it, ver. 32. and with reſpect to others it intends temporal puniſhment, as afflictions and diſeaſes of body, or corporal death, as it is explained in ver. 30. This they may be ſaid to eat and drink, becauſe their unworthy eating and drinking are the cauſe and means of it. Juſt as Adam and Eve might be ſaid to eat condemnation to themſelves and poſterity, becauſe their eating of the forbidden fruit was the cauſe of it. So the phraſe, does not eat condemnation, is uſed in the Perſic verſion of John iii. 18. for is not condemned. And let it be obſerved, that ſuch an one is ſaid to eat and drink this judgment or condemnation to himſelf, and not another; he is injurious to no body but himſelf: this may ſerve to make the minds of ſuch eaſy, who are not ſo entirely ſatisfied with ſome perſons who ſit down with them at the Lord's table, when they conſider that it is to their own injury, and not to the hurt of others they eat and drink: not diſcerning the Lord's body. This is an inſtance of their eating and drinking unworthily, and a reaſon why they eat and drink condemnation to themſelves, or contract guilt, or expoſe themſelves either to chaſtiſement or puniſhment; becauſe they diſtinguiſh not the Lord's ſupper from an ordinary and common meal, but confound them together, as did many of the Corinthians, who alſo did not diſtinguiſh the body of Chriſt in it from the body of the Paſcal lamb; or diſcern not the body of Chriſt, and diſtinguiſh it from the bread, the ſign or ſymbol of it; or diſcern not the dignity, excellency, and uſefulneſs of Chriſt's body, as broken and offered for us, in which he bore our ſins on the tree, and made ſatisfaction for them; a commemoration of which is made in this ordinance.

Ver. 30. For this cauſe many are weak and ſickly, &c.] Becauſe of their unworthy participation of the Lord's ſupper, many in the Corinthian church were attended with bodily infirmities and diſeaſes; either by way of fatherly chaſtiſement and correction in ſuch who were truly the Lord's people, tho' they had behaved unworthily; or by way of puniſhment to ſuch who were not, and had ſinned very groſly: and many ſleep; that is, die a corporal death, which is often in ſcripture ſignified by ſleep, and frequently uſed of the ſaints, and their death, and may intend and include ſome of them here; for tho' the Lord might reſent ſo far their unworthy conduct and behaviour at his table, as to remove them out of this world by death, yet their ſouls may be ſaved in the day of the Lord Jeſus.

Ver. 31. For if we would judge ourſelves, &c.] Examine, try, and prove ourſelves as above directed, before we eat and drink; or condemn ourſelves, by confeſſing, acknowledging, and mourning over ſin, and by repentance for it; or ſeparate ourſelves from the company of prophane ſinners, come out from among them, and touch not their unclean things; or join with them in their unfruitful works of darkneſs: we ſhould not be judged; by the Lord; he would not inflict theſe diſeaſes, ſickneſſes, and death.

Ver. 32. But when we are judged, &c.] This is ſaid by way of conſolation to the ſaints, that when the hand of the Lord is upon them, and he is afflicting them, they ſhould conſider theſe things, not as the effects of his vindictive wrath and juſtice, as proper puniſhments for their ſins, but as fatherly chaſtiſements for their good: we are chaſtened of the Lord; as children by a father, in love and kindneſs, in order to bring to a ſenſe of ſin, repentance for it, and acknowledgment of it, and behave the better for the future: that we ſhould not be condemned with the world; the world of ungodly men, the men of the world, carnal, worldly, and Chriſtleſs ſinners. There is a world, a multitude of them that will be condemned. So far has Chriſt been from dying for the redemption and ſalvation of every individual perſon in the world, that there is a world of men that will be righteouſly condemned at the laſt day. Now the preſent afflictions and chaſtiſements of the ſaints are laid upon them, and bleſſed to them for their ſpiritual good, that they may not be adjudged to the ſecond death, to everlaſting fire, to endleſs damnation, or be puniſhed with everlaſting deſtruction along with them.

[*] Haggadah Shel Peſach, p. 4.

Ver. 33. Wherefore, my brethren, &c.] Though he had ſaid ſome very awful and awakening things to bring them to themſelves, to reclaim them, and rectify diſorders among them; yet he hoped well of them in general, and ſoftens the ſevere things he had ſaid, by calling them brethren; and hereby prepares them to attend to, and receive the more kindly what he had further to ſay: when ye come together to eat; that is, when ye come to the place of publick worſhip at the uſual ſtated time, in order to eat the Lord's ſupper, tarry one for another; don't begin to celebrate the ordinance until the church is met together in general, or at leaſt till as many are got together as may be expected will come; for a church is not obliged to tarry for every individual perſon; nor can it be thought that every member can attend, there being various providences which may detain them: the Apoſtle's view is to promote unity, chriſtian reſpect, and brotherly love in the ordinance; that they would ſit down and join together, according to the rule of Chriſt, without reſpect to perſons, or going into parties, factions, and diviſions.

Ver. 34. And if any man hunger let him eat at home, &c.] Whereby the Apoſtle ſhows his diſlike of their ante-ſuppers in the place of publick worſhip, at which they behaved in ſo indecent a manner, neglecting the poor, and too freely indulging themſelves; and therefore if any one was hungry, and could not wait till the Lord's ſupper was over, let him eat at home before he come to the place of worſhip, and ſatisfy his appetite, that he might with more eaſe and decency attend the table of the Lord: that ye come not together unto condemnation or judgment; that is, that you may ſo behave when ye come together, that you may not bring upon you the judgment of the Lord, either by way of puniſhment or chaſtiſement; that is to ſay, bodily diſeaſes or death. And the reſt will I ſet in order when I come; meaning, not doctrines of faith, but things reſpecting eccleſiaſtical order and polity, which were amiſs among them.

CHAP. XII.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle diſcourſes concerning ſpiritual gifts, ſhewing the author, nature, uſe, and excellency of them; compares the church to an human body, and in a beautiful manner ſets forth the ſymmetry and ſubſerviency of the members of it to one another, being ſet in different places, and having different gifts; and enumerates the ſeveral offices and gifts in the church, and yet ſuggeſts there is ſomething more excellent than them. He intimates, that ſpiritual gifts are valuable things, and ſhould be taken notice of; nor would he have the ſaints ignorant of them, and therefore gives the following account, ver. 1. and yet he would not have thoſe that have them be proud of them, and lifted up with them; for which reaſon he puts them in mind of their former ſtate in heatheniſm, to make and keep them humble, ver. 2. and points out ſuch who have the Spirit of God, the author of all gifts and grace; not ſuch who call Jeſus accurſed, but they that call him Lord, ver. 3. which Holy Ghoſt, who is called Spirit, Lord, and God, is the author of the different gifts beſtowed upon men, ver. 4, 5, 6. the end of beſtowing which gifts is the profit of others, ver. 7. of which gifts there is an enumeration in nine particulars, ver. 8, 9, 10. of each of which the Spirit of God is the worker and giver, according to his ſovereign will and pleaſure, ver. 11. and which are all for the good of the whole community; which is illuſtrated by the ſimile of an human body, which as it conſiſts of many members, and is but one, ſo Chriſt myſtical, or the church, tho' it conſiſts of divers perſons, yet they are all one in Chriſt, and all their gifts are for the ſervice of each other, ver. 12. which unity is proved and confirmed by the ſaints being baptized by one ſpirit into one body, the church, and by drinking of him, or partaking of the ſame grace, ver. 13. and in order to ſhew the uſefulneſs and profit of every ſpiritual gift, even the meaneſt, to the churches of Chriſt, and that none might be deſpiſed, he enlarges upon the metaphor of the human body he had compared the church to, and by it illuſtrates the unity of the church, and the members of it, ver. 14. and ſhews, that the inferior members ſhould not envy the ſuperior ones, or be dejected becauſe they have not the ſame gifts; and conclude from hence, that they are not, or deſerve not to be of the ſame body, ver. 15, 16. ſeeing it is convenient and abſolutely neceſſary that there ſhould be many members, and theſe ſet in different places, and have different gifts and uſefulneſs; and particularly what ſhould make them eaſy is, that God has placed them according to his will and pleaſure, ver. 17, 18, 19, 20. And, on the other hand, he ſhews, that the more noble, and excellent, and uſeful members, ought not to deſpiſe the lower, meaner, and more ignoble ones, partly becauſe of the uſefulneſs and neceſſity of them, they can't do without them, ver. 21, 22. and partly becauſe of the honour put upon them, ver. 23, 24. and all this is ſo ordered, that there be no ſchiſm, but that there ſhould be a mutual care of one member for another, and that they ſhould ſympathize with each other, ver. 25, 26. This ſimile the Apoſtle more plainly and particularly accommodates, and applies to the church, the body of Chriſt, and the members of it, and of one another, ver. 27. and gives an enumeration of the ſeveral officers and offices in the church, ſet there by God himſelf; and there are no leſs than eight of them, ſome greater than others, moſt of them proper and peculiar to the primitive church, though ſome perpetual, and which ſtill continue, ver. 28. but in the times in which they were all of them in being and uſe, every member of the church were not poſſeſſed of them, only ſome, tho' all had more or leſs the advantage of them, ver. 29, 30. Wherefore, he concludes with an exhortation to the ſaints to covet the beſt of thoſe gifts; and yet obſerves that there was ſomething more excellent than them, and preferable to them, which he was about to ſhew them, ver. 31. and hereby he makes an eaſy tranſition to the next chapter, in which he recommends charity, and prefers it to gifts.

Ver. 1. Now concerning ſpiritual gifts, &c.] Tho' the word gifts is not in the original text, 'tis rightly ſupplied by our tranſlators, as it is in the Arabic verſion; for the Apoſtle does not mean ſpiritual graces, nor ſpiritual words, or doctrines, nor ſpiritual meats and drinks, nor ſpiritual men, each of which are mentioned before in this Epiſtle; tho' the latter is thought by ſome to be here intended, and that the Apoſtle's view is to ſhew the difference between thoſe that are ſpiritual, and thoſe that are not; but as ſpiritual gifts are the ſubject of the Apoſtle's diſcourſe throughout this chapter, and the two following, they ſeem very manifeſtly to be deſigned here. The Apoſtle having gone thro' various heads of diſcourſe, which he either of himſelf, or at the requeſt of others, wrote upon, proceeds to a new ſubject, that of ſpiritual gifts, which he ſeems to have been deſired to give his thoughts upon, and advice about; ſince there were ſome in this church who were diſcouraged, becauſe they had not the gifts which ſome had; and others that had them were elated and puffed up with them, and treated thoſe below them with neglect and contempt: and with a view to both theſe the Apoſtle writes as follows, brethren, I would not have you ignorant; neither of the author of theſe gifts, who is the Spirit of God, who diſpenſes them according to his ſovereign will and pleaſure, and not according to the deſerts of men, and are not acquired by the induſtry, or thro' the merit of any, but are his free-grace gifts; nor of the nature of them, for there are differences and diverſities of them, ſome have one, and ſome another, but no man all; nor of the deſign and uſe of them, which is the edification of the whole body; and every gift, though ever ſo mean, is of ſervice; and therefore as on the one hand, none ought to be diſcouraged, ſo on the other hand, none ſhould be lifted up with pride, or give way to a boaſting ſpirit.

Ver. 2. Ye know that ye were Gentiles, &c.] That is, by religion; hence the Syriac verſion renders it, חנפא, prophane perſons, given up to wickedneſs, bigotry, and ſuperſtition; for by nation they were Gentiles ſtill; and which muſt be underſtood of one part of this church only; for ſome of them were Jews, as is clear from many paſſages in the Epiſtle to this church, and practices referr'd to. This the Apoſtle obſerves to humble them, by putting them in mind of what they had been formerly; they were born and brought up in the Heathen religion, when they knew not the true God, much leſs had any knowledge of Chriſt, and ſtill leſs of the Spirit of God; and therefore if they were favoured with any of his gifts, theſe muſt be owing to his grace, and not to their deſerts, and therefore ought not to glory: he adds, with the ſame view, carried away unto theſe dumb idols; to idols that were nothing in the world, had no divinity in them, as he had before aſſerted; to dumb ones, that had mouths, but could not ſpeak, the oracles that were delivered from them, being ſpoken not by them, but were either ſatanical deluſions, or the jugglings of a prieſt; to theſe they were carried by the power of ſatan, the influence of their prieſts, and the orders of their magiſtrates, to conſult them as oracles, to pay their devotions to them, and do them ſervice: even as ye were led; that is, to theſe dumb idols; the Syriac adds, דלא פורשן, without any difference, not being able to diſtinguiſh between theſe and the true God; and to whom they were led as brute beaſts were, that were ſacrificed unto them, or as blind men are led by the blind, as they were by their blind and ignorant prieſts; and therefore, if they had now received the Spirit, and his gifts, they ought to aſcribe the whole to the free grace of God, and be humble under a ſenſe of their unworthineſs.

Ver. 3. Wherefore I give you to underſtand, &c.] Or I make known unto you; what I am about to ſay are certain truths, and to be depended on, that no man ſpeaking by the Spirit of God calleth Jeſus accurſed; or anathema, as did the unconverted Gentiles, who knew nothing of Jeſus but by report; which report they had from the Jews, his enemies; and by that report he appeared to them to be a very wicked and deteſtable perſon, who was put to death by the means of his own countrymen, was hanged upon a tree, and ſo to be counted and called accurſed: the Apoſtle ſeems to have reference to the ſenſe theſe Corinthians had of Jeſus, and what they called him before their converſion; whence it appeared that they ſpoke not by, nor were they poſſeſſed of the Spirit of God then, and therefore their having of him now was an inſtance of pure grace; or elſe reſpect is had to the Jews, who not only, whilſt Jeſus was living, blaſphemed him, but continued to call him accurſed after his death, whilſt they were in their own land; and after the deſtruction of their city and temple, they continued, as Juſtin Martyr obſerves [a] to Trypho the Jew, to curſe Chriſt, and them that believed in him; and to this day privately call him by ſuch names as will hardly bear to be mentioned, were it not for the explanation of ſuch a paſſage: thus they [b] call him, ישו—עות, Jeſus the perverſe, or he that perverteth the law of God; and Jeſu, the name they commonly give him, they ſay is the abbreviation of ימח שמו וזכרו, let his name and memory be blotted out; and which they ſometimes explain by שקר ותועבה, Jeſu is a lye, and an abomination: they call him a ſtrange God, and vanity [c], and often by the name of תלוי [d], one that was hanged, and ſo with them accurſed; and which ſeems to be the name the Jews, in the Apoſtle's time, gave him, and to which he here refers. Now, as in the former verſe he may have regard to the Gentiles, ſo in this to the Jews in this church, who, before converſion, had ſo called Chriſt, when it was plain they had not the Spirit of God then, or they could not have ſo called him; and therefore if they were partakers of him now, they ought to admire divine grace, and not glory in themſelves, and over others. Dr. Lightfoot thinks, that Jewiſh exorciſts who ſtroled about, and pretended to do miracles by the Holy Ghoſt, and yet called Jeſus anathema, are meant, of whom the Corinthians might aſſure themſelves that they did not ſpeak, nor act, nor were acted by the Spirit of God. The words may be applied to all ſuch as deteſt and deny the doctrines of Chriſt, reſpecting his perſon and office; as that he is come in the fleſh, is the true Meſſiah, the Son of God, truly and properly God; that his death is a proper ſacrifice, and full ſatisfaction for ſin; and that juſtification is by his imputed righteouſneſs: without any breach of charity it may be ſaid, ſuch perſons do in effect call Jeſus accurſed, nullifying his perſon, ſufferings, and death, as to the dignity and efficacy of them; and cannot be thought to have, and ſpeak by, the Spirit of God, who if they had him, would teach them otherwiſe. Moreover, as the word anathema here uſed anſwers to חרם, Cherem, a form of excommunication among the Jews; it may be truly ſaid that ſuch call Jeſus accurſed, or anathema, who, if I may be allowed the expreſſion, excommunicate him out of their ſermons and faith; theſe crucify him afreſh, trample him under foot, count his blood as a common thing, and do deſpight to his Spirit; and therefore can't be thought to have him, and ſpeak by him. And that no man can ſay that Jeſus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghoſt; or Jehovah; which, with the Jews was a name ineffable, to which the Apoſtle might have reſpect. Chriſt is Lord of all, of angels, good and bad; of men, righteous and wicked; of the chief among men, the kings, princes, and lords of the earth; as he is God by right of nature, and as creator of them by virtue of that; and becauſe of his providential power and influence in the government of the univerſe: he is Lord of his church and people, by the Father's gift of them to him; by his eſpouſal of them to himſelf; by the purchaſe of his blood; and by the conqueſts of his grace; and as appears by the various relations he ſtands in to them, as father, huſband, head, king, and maſter. Now, tho' a man may hiſtorically ſay all this, as the devils may, and hypocritically, as formal profeſſors and fooliſh virgins do now, and will at the laſt day; and as all men then will by force, whether they will or no, confeſs that Jeſus is Lord, who have not the Spirit of God; yet no man can call him his Lord, can appropriate him to himſelf truly and really, as his Lord, ſaviour, and redeemer, as David, Thomas, the Apoſtle Paul, and others have done, but by the Spirit; ſince ſuch an appropriation includes ſpiritual knowledge of Chriſt, ſtrong affection to him, faith of intereſt in him, an hearty profeſſion of him, and ſincere ſubjection to him; all which cannot be without the Spirit of God: for he is the Spirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of him; and true love to Chriſt is a genuine fruit of his; faith in Chriſt, is entirely of his operation; and a ſubjection to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and to his ordinances, is thro' the influence of his grace; and it is owing to his witneſſings, that any can truly, and in faith, claim their intereſt in him. Upon the whole, the Apoſtle's ſenſe is, let a man pretend to what he will, if he does not love Jeſus Chriſt, and believe in him, he is deſtitute of his Spirit; and whoever loves Chriſt, and believes in him, and can call him his Lord in faith and fear, however mean otherwiſe his gifts may be, he is a partaker of the Spirit of God.

Ver. 4. Now there are diverſities of gifts, &c.] Of ſpiritual ones, as in ver. 1. which ſpring from the free grace, and good-will and pleaſure of God, and are not owing to the merits of men; and therefore ſuch who have the largeſt ſhare of them, ſhould not boaſt of them as acquired by themſelves, or be puffed up on account of them; and thoſe who have the ſmalleſt meaſure ſhould be content and thankful; for tho' the gifts are different, ſome have greater, and others leſſer, none have all, but all have ſome, yet not alike: but the ſame Spirit; is the author and giver of all as he pleaſes; the leſſer gifts, and the ſmalleſt degree of them, come from the Spirit of God, as well as the greater. Gifts here ſeem to be the general name for all that follow; and adminiſtrations and operations are the two ſpecies of them; and of theſe a particular account is afterwards given.

Ver. 5. And there are differences of adminiſtrations, &c.] Or miniſtries; offices in the church, miniſtred in by different perſons, as apoſtles, prophets, paſtors, or teachers and deacons; who were employed in planting and forming of churches, ordaining elders, preaching the word, adminiſtring ordinances, and taking care of the poor; for which different gifts were beſtowed on them, they not all having the ſame office. But the ſame Lord; meaning either Jeſus Chriſt, whom the believer, by the Holy Ghoſt, ſays is Lord; who as the aſcended king of ſaints, and Lord and head of the church, appoints different offices and officers in it; and having received, gives gifts unto them, qualifying them for the ſame; all which comes thro' the ſame hand, and not another's: or rather the Lord, the Spirit, who calls men to theſe ſeveral miniſtrations, ſeparates and fits them for them, and conſtitutes and inſtalls them into them, and aſſiſts them in the diſcharge of them; ſince he only, and all along is ſpoken of in the context, as the efficient of theſe ſeveral things.

Ver. 6. And there are diverſities of operations, &c.] There are ſome that are ordinary, as the good work of grace, and the ſeveral parts of it, the work of faith, the labour of love, and patience of hope, which the Spirit of God begins, carries on, and finiſhes in all the elect of God, and members of Chriſt; and there are others which are extraordinary, and are here meant, and hereafter ſpecified. But it is the ſame God which worketh all in all. Interpreters in general underſtand by God here, God the Father; as by the Lord in the preceding verſe, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, as diſtinct from the Spirit in ver. 4. and apprehend that this furniſhes out a conſiderable proof of a Trinity of perſons in the Godhead, which I will not deny; but I rather think that the Holy Ghoſt is deſigned in each verſe, by Spirit, Lord, and God; ſince the various gifts, adminiſtrations, and operations are particularly and peculiarly aſcribed to him in the following verſes; and the diſtribution of them is ſaid to be the effect of his ſovereign will; and ſo we have a moſt illuſtrious teſtimony of his proper deity and perſonality; who is the only true Jehovah with the Father and Son, to which the word Lord in the New Teſtament generally anſwers; and who is the omnipotent God, which worketh all in all; all the works of nature throughout the univerſe, and all the works of grace in the hearts of all his people, and all the extraordinary operations effected by any of them.

Ver. 7. But the manifeſtation of the Spirit, &c.] Not that which the Spirit manifeſts, as the grace and love of God, an intereſt in Chriſt, the doctrines of the Goſpel, and the things of another world; for he is a Spirit of revelation, more or leſs, in the knowledge of theſe things; but that which manifeſts that a man has the Spirit, as the fruits and graces of the Spirit, the leaſt meaſure of which, as being able to ſay, that Jeſus is Lord, ſhews that a man has the Spirit of God; or rather the gifts of the Spirit, ordinary or extraordinary, which are ſuch as manifeſtly declare their author: is given to every man; not that the ſpecial grace of the Spirit is given to every individual man in the world, nor to every member of a viſible church, for ſome are ſenſual, not having the Spirit; but as the ſame graces of the Spirit are given to every regenerate man, for all receive the ſame Spirit of faith, ſo the gifts of the Spirit, more or leſs, either ordinary or extraordinary, are given to all ſuch perſons: to profit withal; not to make gain of, as Simon Magus intended, could he have been poſſeſſed of them; nor to encourage pride or envy, or to form and foment diviſions and parties; but for profit and advantage, and that not merely private, or a man's own, but publick, the good of the whole community or church, to which the leaſt grace or gift, rightly uſed, may contribute.

Ver. 8. For to one is given by the Spirit, &c.] Now follows a diſtinct and particular enumeration of the operations of the Spirit, tho' not all of them, yet as many as the Apoſtle thought neceſſary; and which are called the manifeſtation of him, and which moſt clearly ſhew him to be the author of them to different perſons: the word of wiſdom; by which is meant the manifold wiſdom of God; the wonderful ſcheme of ſalvation through the incarnation, ſufferings, and death of Chriſt, in which God has abounded in all wiſdom and prudence; together with all other deep, myſterious, and ſublime doctrines of the Goſpel, the knowledge of which were peculiarly given to the Apoſtles in the firſt place, who have the firſt office or miniſtry in the church, by the Spirit of wiſdom; and which they had a faculty, a gift of declaring, opening, and explaining unto others. To another the word of knowledge by the ſame Spirit; meaning either knowledge of future events; or an univerſal knowledge of the ſcriptures of truth, and the doctrines contained in them, of the whole mind and will of God therein, which is a diſtinct thing from ſaving grace; ſee ch. xiii. 2, 8, 9. and is what was given to the prophets, the ſecond office in the church, by him who is the Spirit of prophecy, and by whom the prophetical writings were dictated; and therefore he is the beſt interpreter of them, and who only can lead into the true knowledge thereof.

Ver. 9. To another faith by the ſame Spirit, &c.] Not the grace of faith which is common to all believers, tho' given by the ſame Spirit; but rather the doctrine of faith, and ability to preach it, and boldneſs and intrepidity of ſpirit to aſſert and defend it in the face of all oppoſition; all which are from the Spirit of God, and are more or leſs given to paſtors and teachers, the third office in the church. Tho' generally this is underſtood of a faith of working miracles, as in ch. xiii. 2. but the working of miracles is mentioned afterwards as diſtinct, unleſs it can be thought that this is the general name for miracles, and the reſt that follow, the particulars of them. To another the gifts of healing by the ſame Spirit; of healing all manner of ſickneſſes and diſeaſes: this power Chriſt gave his diſciples, when he firſt ſent them out to preach the Goſpel, and which he repeated when he renewed and enlarged their commiſſion after his reſurrection; and which was exerciſed with effect, ſometimes only by overſhadowing the ſick with their ſhadows, as by Peter, Acts v. 15, 16. ſometimes by laying hands on them, as the father of Publius, and others, were healed by Paul, Acts xxviii. 8, 9. and ſometimes by anointing with oil, Jam. v. 14. Now theſe gifts were beſtowed in common, by the Spirit, on apoſtles, prophets, and paſtors, or elders of the church, in thoſe early times: the Alexandrian copy, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, by one ſpirit.

Ver. 10. To another the working of miracles, &c.] Or powers; mighty deeds, wonderful works, ſuch as are apparently above, and out of the reach of nature, and beyond the compaſs of human power and ſkill; ſuch as raiſing the dead, cauſing the blind to ſee, the deaf to hear, the dumb to ſpeak, the lame to walk, and the like; of which, ſee ſome inſtances in Acts iii. 6. and ix. 41. and xiv. 8. and xx. 9, 10. Tho' others underſtand by theſe the extraordinary powers the Apoſtles had of puniſhing offenders; of which the ſtriking Ananias and Sapphira dead, by Peter, the ſmiting Elymas the ſorcerer with blindneſs, by Paul, and the delivering the inceſtuous perſon, and Hymeneus, and Alexander to ſatan, by the ſame Apoſtle, are inſtances. To another prophecy; either foretelling of future events, as was given to Agabus, and the four daughters of Philip, and others, Acts xi. 27, 28. and xxi. 9, 10. or a gift of underſtanding the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and of preaching the Goſpel, which is in this Epiſtle frequently called propheſying, particularly in the two following chapters; and thoſe endowed with it are called prophets, Acts xiii. 1. Eph. iv. 11. 1 Cor. xiv. 29, 32, 37. To another diſcerning of ſpirits; by which gift ſuch that were poſſeſſed of it could, in ſome meaſure, diſcern the hearts of men, their thoughts, purpoſes, and deſigns, their ſecret diſſimulation and hypocriſy; as Peter, by this gift, diſcerned the diſſimulation and lying of Anamias and Sapphira; and by it they could alſo tell, whether a man that made a profeſſion of religion had the truth of grace in him, or not; ſo Peter knew hereby, that Simon Magus was in the gall of bitterneſs, and bond of iniquity, notwithſtanding his ſpecious pretences to faith and holineſs, whereby he impoſed upon Philip the Evangeliſt, who might not have this gift of diſcerning ſpirits; by which alſo they could diſtinguiſh the Spirit of God from the lying ſpirits in men; of which there is an inſtance, Acts xvi. 17, 18. To another divers kinds of tongues; whereby ſuch could ſpeak all manner of languages, which they had never learn'd, underſtood, and been uſed to: this Chriſt promiſed his diſciples, when he ſent them into all the world to preach the Goſpel, Mark xvi. 16, 17. and ſo anticipates an objection, they otherwiſe might have made, how they ſhould be able to preach it to all, ſo as to be underſtood, when they were not acquainted with the languages of all nations. An inſtance of which we have in the Apoſtles on the day of Pentecoſt, Acts ii. 4. and which continued many years after with them, and other perſons in the churches; ſee 1 Cor. xiii. 2. and xiv. 5, 22. To another the interpretation of tongues; one that had this gift, when a diſcourſe was delivered in an unknown tongue, uſed to ſtand up and interpret it to the people, without which it could be of no uſe to them; and ſometimes a perſon was gifted to ſpeak in an unknown tongue, and yet was not capable of interpreting his diſcourſe truly and diſtinctly in that the people underſtood; ſee 1 Cor. xiv. 13. The rules to be obſerved in ſuch caſes, and by ſuch perſons, ſee in 1 Cor. xiv. 27, 28.

Ver. 11. But all theſe worketh that one and the ſelf-ſame Spirit, &c.] Tho' theſe gifts, miniſtrations, and operations are ſo different in themſelves, and are beſtowed upon different perſons, yet they are all wrought by one, and the ſame Spirit of God, who is the true Jehovah, and properly God, as theſe his works declare; for who, but the moſt high God, could ever communicate ſuch gifts to men? Dividing to every man ſeverally as he will; giving one man this gift, and another that; imparting ſuch a meaſure to one, and ſuch a portion to another, juſt as ſeems good in his ſight. For as his ſpecial grace in regeneration is diſpenſed when and where, and to whom he pleaſes, ſignified by the blowing of the wind where it liſteth, John iii. 8. ſo his gifts, ordinary and extraordinary, are ſeverally diſtributed, according to his ſovereign will and pleaſure. This is a clear and full proof of the perſonality of the Spirit, who is not only diſtinguiſhed from his gifts, and the diſtribution of them, which is a perſonal act aſcribed to him; but this is ſaid to be done according to his will, which ſuppoſes him an intelligent agent, capable of chuſing and willing; and whoſe will agrees with the Father's, and with the Son's.

Ver. 12. For as the body is one, &c.] That is, an human body; for of this the Apoſtle ſpeaks, and takes a ſimile, and forms a compariſon from, ſhewing the union among ſaints, and their mutual participation of the various gifts of the Spirit; for an human body is but one body, and not more.

And hath many members; as eyes, ears, hands, feet, &c. And all the members of that one body being many are one body; as numerous as they may be, they all belong to, and make up but one body; performing different offices for which they are naturally fitted for the good of the whole: ſo alſo is Chriſt; not perſonal, but myſtical; not the head alone, or the members by themſelves, but head and members as conſtituting one body, the church. The church, in union with Chriſt, the head, is but one general aſſembly, and church of the firſt-born written in heaven, though conſiſting of the various perſons of God's elect, who are cloſely united one to another, and their head Chriſt; and therefore are denominated from him, and called by his name; ſee Rom. ix. 3. Jer. xxxiii. 16.

Ver. 13. For by one Spirit are we all baptized, &c.] This is to be underſtood not of water-baptiſm; for the Apoſtle ſays not in one, and the ſame water, but by, or in one Spirit, are we all baptized; the baptiſm of water, and of the Spirit, are two different things; ſee Matt. iii. 11. Beſides, all that are baptized in water, are not baptized in or by the Spirit, as the caſe of Simon Magus, and that of others, ſhew: nor does water-baptiſm incorporate perſons into the church of Chriſt; neither into the inviſible church, which is the body of Chriſt, and here meant; nor into a viſible Goſpel church-ſtate; they being indeed true believers, and baptized, are proper perſons to be received into a church; but baptiſm itſelf does not put them into it, or make them members of it: perſons may be baptized in water, and yet may never be joined to a church. There is indeed an alluſion made to water-baptiſm, but it is the grace of the Spirit in regeneration and ſanctification which is here intended; which grace both in the Old, and in the New Teſtament, is frequently ſignified by water, and called a baptiſm, or a being baptized, becauſe of the plenty, abundance, and ſuper-abundance of it, then beſtowed; and is expreſſed by floods and rivers, and a well of living water; and is what qualifies and fits perſons for the ordinance of water-baptiſm. Now this is wrought by the Spirit of God, and is owing to his divine power and energy; not to water-baptiſm, which has no regenerating virtue in it; nor to carnal generation, or a being born of blood, or of the beſt of men; nor to the will of any man, nor to the will of the fleſh, or the power of man's free will; but to God, to the Spirit, who is Lord and God, and the only ſanctifier of the ſons of men; by which ſpiritual baptiſm, or by whoſe grace in regeneration and converſion they are brought into one body; the myſtical body of Chriſt, the univerſal and inviſible church; that is, openly and manifeſtatively; for otherwiſe it is the grace of God in election, and in the everlaſting covenant, chuſing them in Chriſt, as members in their head; and conſtituting them ſuch, that puts them among that number; but ſpiritual baptiſm, or the ſanctifying grace of the Spirit, makes them appear to belong to that body, and makes them meet for, and gives them a right unto a particular Goſpel-church, and the privileges of it, which the Spirit of God directs and brings them to. Whether we be Jews or Gentiles, whether we be bond or free; it matters not of what nation, or of what ſtate and condition of life perſons be; if they are regenerated and ſanctified, they appear equally to belong to Chriſt, to be of his body, and have an equal propriety in all immunities and bleſſings belonging to his people; ſee Col. iii. 11. Gal. iii. 28. And have been all made to drink into one Spirit; are all partakers of the ſame graces of the Spirit, as faith, hope, love, &c. and daily receive under his guidance, direction, and influence, out of the ſame fulneſs of grace in Chriſt, from whence they draw and drink this water with joy; and all drink the ſame ſpiritual drink, the blood of Chriſt, whoſe blood is drink indeed: and there may be in this clauſe an alluſion to the ordinance of the ſupper, as in the former to the ordinance of baptiſm. Moreover, all new-born babes, as they deſire the ſincere milk of the word, ſo they drink of it, and are refreſhed with it, and are nouriſhed by the words of faith, and ſound doctrine, under the application of the Spirit; and being trees of righteouſneſs, and the planting of the Lord, the Spirit, they are watered by his grace under the miniſtrations of the Goſpel; and as they become one body under Chriſt, the head, ſo they are made to drink into one ſpirit, or to become of one heart and ſoul with one another, being knit together in love, the bond of perfectneſs.

Ver. 14. For the body is not one member, &c.] Not only one; nor is any one member the body, tho' ever ſo eminent, as the head or eye: thus the church of Chriſt is not one perſon only, or does not conſiſt of one ſort of perſons; as only of Jews, or only of Gentiles, or only of rich and freemen, or only of men of extraordinary gifts and abilities, or greatly eminent for grace and ſpiritual knowledge: but many; members, as the Arabic verſion adds; as eyes, ears, hands, feet, &c. ſo in the myſtical body of Chriſt, the church, there are many members, ſome in a higher ſtation, others in a lower; ſome of greater gifts, grace, and uſefulneſs, others of leſſer; ſome Jews, others Gentiles; ſome bond, others free; yet all one in Chriſt the head, and all related to each other.

Ver. 15. If the foot ſhall ſay, &c.] The loweſt member of the body, which is neareſt the earth, treads upon it, ſuſtains the whole weight of the body, and performs the more drudging and fatiguing exerciſes of ſtanding and walking; and may repreſent one that is in the loweſt ſtation in the church, a door-keeper in the houſe of God; one that is really the leaſt of ſaints, as well as thinks himſelf ſo; and has the ſmalleſt degree of heavenly affection, and knowledge of ſpiritual light and underſtanding: becauſe I am not the hand; the inſtrument of communication and of action; and may ſignify ſuch an one, that liberally imparts to the neceſſities of others, who has it both in his hand and heart, and is ready to communicate; one that is full of good works, of charity towards men, and piety towards God; who does all things, Chriſt ſtrengthening him, natural, civil, moral, and evangelical; yea, even miracles and mighty deeds are done by his hand: I am not of the body; have no part in it, am no member of it, don't belong to it: is it therefore not of the body? or it is not therefore not of the body, as the Syriac verſion renders it; that is, it is not for this word, as the Arabic, or ſo ſaying, as the Ethiopic, not of the body; it nevertheleſs belongs to it, and is a member of it, nor can it be otherwiſe: thus the meaneſt perſon in the myſtical body the church, though he ſhould ſay, that becauſe he is not ſo handy and uſeful as another, can't give ſo largely, nor do ſo much as another, therefore he's no proper member of the church; it does not follow that ſo it is, for Chriſt the head of the church, regards ſuch as members; he admires the beauty of his church's feet, and has provided for the covering, ornament, and ſecurity of them, being himſelf cloathed with a garment down to the feet, which equally covers and adorns that part of the body as the reſt; he does not break the bruiſed reed, nor quench the ſmoaking flax, or deſpiſe the day of ſmall things; he regards their prayers, and takes notice and accepts of their meaneſt ſervices; and they are, and ſhould be conſidered as members of the body, by the reſt and by themſelves.

Ver. 16. And if the ear ſhall ſay, &c.] The organ that receives ſounds, and can diſtinguiſh them, and in which member is placed the ſenſe of hearing; and may deſign ſuch as are hearers of the word of God, not merely externally, but internally; who hear ſo as to love, ſavour, and reliſh it; ſo as to underſtand and believe it, and to act in compliance with it; and diſtinguiſh it for themſelves, though they may'nt be able to give a diſtinct account of it to others, or inſtruct others in it: becauſe I am not the eye; the organ of ſeeing, in which is ſeated the viſive faculty, and which receives light, and uſes it for the good of the body, whoſe ſuperintendant it is; and may be expreſſive of the miniſters of the Goſpel, who are that to the church, as eyes are to the body; they are the light of the world, have a clear inſight into the doctrines of the Goſpel, and communicate their light to others; they are ſet in the higheſt place in the church, and as watchmen and overſeers there, to inſtruct, guide, and direct the members of it: I am not of the body, is it therefore not of the body? it certainly is: and ſo ſuch as are only hearers of the Goſpel, being affectionate, believing, underſtanding and fruitful hearers; though they have not ſuch large knowledge and clear light, ſo as to be capable of overſeeing and inſtructing others, yet are true and uſeful members of the church, are highly reſpected by Chriſt the head, and to be had in eſteem by their fellow-members, who may be ſuperior to them.

Ver. 17. If the whole body were an eye, &c.] And nothing elſe, where were the hearing? there would be no ear, and ſo no ſenſe of hearing: and if the whole were hearing; or only conſiſted of a member capable of the ſenſe of hearing, where were the ſmelling? there would be no noſe, the organ of ſmelling, and that ſenſe would be wanting: thus if the church only conſiſted of miniſters of the Goſpel, of men of eminent light and knowledge, qualified for the preaching of the word to others, there would be no hearers; and on the other hand, if it only conſiſted of hearers, of ſuch who only could hear the word to their own advantage, there would be none of a quick underſtanding, or of a quick ſmell to diſcern perverſe things, to diſtinguiſh truth from error, to diſcern ſpirits, and direct the reſt of the members to wholeſome and ſavoury food, and preſerve them from what would be hurtful and pernicious to them.

Ver. 18. But now hath God ſet the members, &c.] The members of a natural body, as they are all made and faſhioned by God in the form they be, ſo they are each of them ſet by him in the place they are: every one of them in the body as it hath pleaſed him; according to his ſovereign will, without conſulting any; and each ſtands in the beſt ſituation and poſition they could be put, and for the greateſt ſervice and uſefulneſs to the whole: ſo God and not man, hath ſet every member in the myſtical body the church, in ſuch a place and part of it, as he himſelf thought fit; ſome in a higher, others in a lower ſtation, but all for the good of the body; and therefore each member ought to be content with his place, gift, and uſefulneſs, be they what they will; ſince it is the wiſe counſel and ſovereign pleaſure of God, who works all things after the counſel of his own will, that ſo it ſhould be.

Ver. 19. And if they were all one member, &c.] As all eye, or all ear, or all hand, or all foot: where were the body? where would be the body? it would not be a body conſiſting of ſuch proper and ſuitable members, as now it is: ſo if the community of the ſaints were either all miniſters, or all hearers, &c. there would be no body, conſiſting of different perſons, to receive any benefit or uſefulneſs from either; the church of Chriſt would not be that uniform, uſeful, and conſiſtent community it is.

Ver. 20. But now are they many members, &c.] Of different make and ſhape, in different parts and places, and of different uſe and ſervice: yet but one body; all are united together, and make up one compleat body, and which without each of them, would not be perfect: ſo there are many members in the body of Chriſt, the church; ſome are teachers, others are hearers; ſome give, and others receive; but all make up but one church, of which Chriſt is the head; nor can any one of them be ſpared; was any one wanting, even the meaneſt, there would be a deficiency, and the church would not be the fulneſs of him that filleth all in all.

Ver. 21. And the eye cannot ſay unto the hand, &c.] Every member of the natural body, is uſeful and neceſſary. The eye, the ſeat of the ſenſe of ſeeing, cannot ſay to the communicating and working hand, I have no need of thee; I can do without thee: ſo the ſeers and overſeers of the church, the miniſters of the Goſpel, cannot ſay to the liberal and munificent hands, we have no need of you; for as the one ſtand in need of the light, inſtruction, comfort, advice, and direction of the other, ſo the other ſtand in need of communication from them; and as God has made it a duty, that he that is taught in the word ſhould communicate to him that teacheth in all good things; and as it is his ordinance that they which preach the Goſpel ſhould live of it; ſo he has generally ordered it in his providence, that they that teach ſhould need ſuch aſſiſtance: nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. The head, which is the ſeat of the ſenſes, and is ſuperior to, and has the command and government of all the members of the body, cannot ſay to the loweſt and moſt diſtant parts of it, the feet, you are needleſs and uſeleſs; ſo thoſe that are ſet in the firſt place in the church, are over others in the Lord, and have the rule over them, cannot ſay to thoſe that are under them, and ſubmit unto them, even the loweſt and meaneſt of them, that they are of no uſe and ſervice to them; they can no more be without them, than the head can be without the feet, or than princes can do without ſubjects, or magiſtrates without citizens, or generals without ſoldiers.

Ver. 22. Nay, much more thoſe members of the body, &c.] The Apoſtle in a beautiful gradation, proceeds to take notice of ſuch parts of the body as are more weak, diſhonourable and uncomely, ſhewing the neceſſity and uſefulneſs of them: which ſeem to be more feeble; than others, do not conſiſt of a ſtrong bony ſubſtance, and are not fenced with ſinews, as the belly and its inteſtines: yet theſe are neceſſary; nor could the body be ſuſtained, nouriſhed, and refreſhed, without them; ſo the more weak and feeble ſaints, whoſe hearts and hands are to be ſtrenghthened, whoſe infirmities are to be bore, have their uſefulneſs; and the effectual working in the meaſure of every part, even of the feeble and tender, maketh increaſe of the body, to the edifying of itſelf in love: and theſe God has ſeen fit, as neceſſary to call by his grace, and place in the body, that his ſtrength may be made perfect in their weakneſs, and to confound the mighty; and out of the mouths even of babes and ſucklings, to ordain ſtrength and praiſe.

Ver. 23. And thoſe members of the body, &c.] As the back parts of it: which we think to be leſs honourable; though greatly uſeful, upon theſe we beſtow more abundant honour: by cloathing them, for a man's garments are his honour and glory; ſee the note on Matt. vi. 29. ſo the poor members of Chriſt's church, who are thought to be, though they really are not the leſs honourable, have the more abundant honour conferred on them by God and Chriſt: God has choſen the poor of this world; Chriſt has ſent his Goſpel to them; theſe the Spirit calls and ſanctifies, and makes them all glorious within; theſe Chriſt has given his churches a particular charge to take care of now, and will own them as his brethren at the great day, before angels and men; as he now greatly honours them with his preſence, a large experience of his grace, and the ſupply of his Spirit: and our uncomely parts; which diſtinguiſh ſexes, and are appointed for generation: have more abundant comelineſs; by an external covering and ornament, to preſerve decency and modeſty. I don't know who ſhould be deſigned by theſe, unleſs backſliding believers, who have been ſuffered to fall into great ſins; theſe are the uncomely parts of the church, who when made ſenſible of their evils, are reſtored again, and received into the church; and a mantle of love is caſt over all their failings; and all poſſible care taken that their faults may not be expoſed to the world, that ſo the name of God, and ways of Chriſt, may not be blaſphemed and evil ſpoken of.

Ver. 24. For our comely parts have no need, &c.] As the face, eyes, noſe, lips, cheeks, &c. which ſtand in no need of an external covering, of any outward ornament: ſo ſuch as are bleſſed with the bounties of nature and providence, with the gifts of the holy Spirit, and are eminent for grace and holineſs, and are enabled to walk worthy of their vocation, and to have their converſations as become the Goſpel of Chriſt, holding the myſtery of the faith in a pure conſcience, theſe have no need of ſuch a covering, the former do, to hide and conceal them from the world: but God hath tempered the body together; he hath compoſed it in ſuch a form, conſtituted it in ſuch an order, mixed and united all its parts in ſuch a manner, as that they are all beneficial to each other; and ſuch is the harmonious contexture of the whole, that it is a moſt beautiful ſtructure: having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked; or as the Syriac verſion renders it, which is the leaſt; and ſuch is the temperament and conſtitution of the church, having mixed rich and poor perſons, of greater and leſſer gifts together, for mutual good.

Ver. 25. That there ſhould be no ſchiſm in the body, &c.] No complaint of one member againſt another, as uſeleſs and unneceſſary; no murmuring on that account; no tumults and rioting; no rebellion and inſurrection of one againſt another; no diſſenſion, no diviſion. The uſe Menenius[e] Agrippa made of this ſimile, applying it to the body politick, as the Apoſtle here does to the ſpiritual body, for the appeaſing of a ſedition among the people, is well known, and uſually mentioned by interpreters on this place: but that the members ſhould have the ſame care one for another; that is, they are ſo tempered and mixed together, are in ſuch cloſe union with, and have ſuch a dependance on each other, that they are neceſſarily obliged to take care of each other's good and welfare, becauſe they cannot do one without another; and ſo God has ordered it in the church, that perſons ſhould be ſo placed in it, and gifts diſpoſed of among them in ſuch a manner, that every man is obliged, not only to look on, and be concerned for his own things, that he takes care of himſelf, and performs his office, but that he looks every man on the things of others, his good and ſafety being involved in theirs.

Ver. 26. And whether one member ſuffer, &c.] Pain; even the meaneſt, loweſt, and moſt diſtant, as the foot or hand, toe or finger: all the members ſuffer with it; are more or leſs affected therewith, and bear part of the diſtreſs; as is eaſily diſcerned, by their different forms and motions on ſuch an occaſion: ſo when any one member of the myſtical body is in affliction, whether inward or outward, of body or mind, the reſt are, or ſhould be, affected with it, condole, ſympathize, help, and aſſiſt; and remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them, as if they themſelves were in bonds, and them that ſuffer adverſity, whether ſpiritual or temporal, as being in the body, not only in the fleſh, but as being part of the body, the church; and therefore ſhould weep with them that weep, and bear a part with them in their ſorrows. The Jews have a ſaying[f], that "if one brother "dies, all the brethren grieve; and if one of a "ſociety dies, תדאג כל החבורה כולה, the whole "ſociety grieves;" and alſo another[g], that "every "one that afflicts himſelf, עם הציבור, with the "congregation, is worthy to ſee or enjoy the com"fort of the congregation, or church:" or one member be honoured; by being ſet in the higheſt place, and employed to the greateſt uſefulneſs, or by being moſt richly and beautifully cloathed and adorned: all the members rejoice with it; as ſharing in the honour, or benefit of it: ſo if one member of the church of Chriſt, is honoured with an high office, with great gifts, with a large meaſure of grace, ſpiritual light, knowledge, and experience, with great diſcoveries of the love of God, with the preſence of Chriſt, and the communion of the Holy Ghoſt, or with the good things of this life, and an heart to make uſe of them for the intereſt of religion, the other members rejoice at it; for ſo it becomes the ſaints to rejoice with them that rejoice, and be glad, both at the temporal and ſpiritual proſperity of each other: and upon the whole 'tis clear, that the meaneſt have no reaſon to be diſcouraged, nor the higheſt and greateſt to be proud and elated.

Ver. 27. Now ye are the body of Chriſt, &c.] Not his natural body, which his Father prepared for him, in which he bore our ſins on the tree, and which was offered up once for all; nor his ſacramental body, or the bread in the ſupper, which is a repreſentation of his body; but his body myſtical, the church; not that the Corinthians were the whole of the body, only a part of it, as every ſingle congregational church, is of the church univerſal. This is an accommodation of the ſimile, the Apoſtle had to ſo much advantage enlarged upon: and members in particular; or in part; meaning either that they as ſingle members were part of the general body; or that only a part of them were ſo, there being ſome among them, as in all particular and viſible churches, who had not the true grace of God; and ſo are neither members of Chriſt, nor of the general aſſembly and church of the firſt-born: or the ſenſe is, that they were not only members of Chriſt, and of his body, but were particularly members one of another, in ſtrict union and cloſe communion, and of mutual uſe and ſervice to each other.

Ver. 28. And God hath ſet ſome in the church, &c.] As before the Apoſtle gives an account of the various different gifts of the Spirit, qualifying men for ſervice in the church of Chriſt, here he enumerates the ſeveral offices and officers: firſt Apoſtles; as were the twelve diſciples, and Paul the Apoſtle; men that were immediately ſent by Chriſt himſelf, and had their commiſſion and doctrine directly from him; and a power of working miracles, to confirm the truth of their miſſion and miniſtry; they were ſent into all the world to preach the Goſpel, to plant churches every where, and to ordain officers in them; they were not confined to any particular church, but had power and authority in all the churches, to preach the word, adminiſter ordinances, adviſe, counſel, direct, reprove, and cenſure: ſecondarily prophets; who either had the gift of foretelling things to come, as Agabus and others; or who had a peculiar gift by divine revelation, of explaining the prophecies of the ſacred writings, and of preaching the Goſpel: thirdly, teachers; the ſame with paſtors, elders, and overſeers; the ordinary miniſters of the word, who have a gift of expounding the ſcriptures; not by extraordinary revelation, but by the ordinary gift of the Spirit, in the uſe of means, as reading, meditation, and prayer; and whoſe work is to preach the word, adminiſter ordinances, feed and govern particular churches, over whom they are ſet: after that miracles; which is to be underſtood, not of ſome perſons, as diſtinct from Apoſtles, Prophets, and teachers, who alſo had the power of working miracles; but from perſons and officers in the church, the principal of which the Apoſtle had mentioned, he paſſes to things, which belonged at leaſt to ſome of them; unleſs it can be thought that there were in thoſe times private chriſtians, who were neither Apoſtles, nor Prophets, nor teachers, and yet had a power of doing miracles: then gifts of healing; the ſick, by anointing them with oil, which was only one ſpecies of doing miracles; and which was ſometimes performed, not only by Apoſtles, and ſuch like extraordinary perſons, but by the common elders and ordinary officers of the church: helps; meaning either the miniſters of the word in common, who are helpers of the faith and joy of the ſaints, and are means of increaſing their knowledge and ſpiritual experience, and of eſtabliſhing them in the truth; ſee Acts xviii. 27. 2 Cor. i. 24. or elſe ſuch Evangeliſts and miniſters of the word, as were aſſiſtants to the Apoſtles, ſuch as Mark, and Timothy, and Titus; or rather the deacons of churches, whoſe buſineſs it is to take care of tables; the Lord's table, the miniſter's, and the poor's, and all the ſecular affairs of the church; and ſo are helps to the miniſter, relieve him, and free him from all worldly concerns, that he may the better attend to prayer, and the miniſtry of the word. Theſe, whether one or the other, are ſo called, in alluſion to the prieſts and Levites, who were, מסעדיה, helps, or aſſiſtants to the high-prieſt, in the burning of the red heifer, and in other things[b]: governments; ſome by theſe underſtand, the ſame with paſtors and elders, who have the rule and government of the church; others lay elders, a ſort of ruling elders in the church, as diſtinct from paſtors. Dr. Lightfoot thinks ſuch are intended, who had the gift of diſcerning ſpirits. I rather think with De Dieu, that the word deſigns counſellors; ſee the Septuagint in Prov. xi. 14. and xxiv. 6. and here intends ſuch as are men of wiſdom and prudence, who are very proper perſons to be conſulted and adviſed with, by the paſtor, elder, or overſeer, in matters of moment and importance in the church: diverſities of tongues; ſuch as have the gift of ſpeaking with divers tongues; or of interpreting them, or both. The Vulgate Latin verſion and ſome copies add, intepretations of tongues.

Ver. 29. Are all Apoſtles? &c.] No; ſome are Prophets, as diſtinct from Apoſtles; and ſome are teachers, as diſtinct from them both, and ſome are neither: are all prophets? no; ſome are Apoſtles, above them, and ſome are teachers, inferior to them; and but very few there were who had that peculiar character and gift: are all teachers? no; the far greater part of the members of churches are hearers, or perſons that are taught in the word; are neither in the office of teaching, nor have they the qualifications for it. Are all workers of miracles? no; in thoſe early times, when the gift of doing miracles was beſtowed, it was not given to all, only to ſome; and now there are none that are poſſeſſed of it.

Ver. 30. Have all the gifts of healing? &c.] No; when theſe gifts were in being, all had them not. When anointing with oil, in order to heal the ſick, was in uſe, it was only performed by the elders of the church, not by the common members of it, who were to be ſent for by the ſick on this occaſion: do all ſpeak with tongues? no; it was not true in fact, as they well knew; though this was greatly coveted after, as a following chapter of this Epiſtle ſhews: do all interpret? that is, unknown tongues, ſtrange languages; or can they? no. This alſo was a peculiar gift beſtowed on ſome perſons only.

Ver. 31. But covet earneſtly the beſt gifts, &c.] Which may be rendered either indicatively as an aſſertion, ye do covet earneſtly the beſt gifts; of propheſying and teaching, of doing miracles, healing diſeaſes, ſpeaking with, and interpreting different tongues and languages; but I can, and do ſhew you ſomething that is better, and more excellent than theſe: or, by way of interrogation, do ye covet earneſtly the beſt gifts? do you zealouſly affect them? fervently deſire them? and emulate one another in your endeavours after them? I have ſomething to obſerve to you which exceeds them all, and which you would do well to follow after, and eagerly purſue; or imperatively, as an exhortation, as it is rendered by our tranſlators: and by the beſt gifts may be meant, the beſt of theſe external gifts before mentioned; and not thoſe of the higheſt claſs, and the more extraordinary, but which are the moſt uſeful and beneficial to the church, as preaching or propheſying was: the Corinthians ſeemed moſt covetous and deſirous of ſpeaking with different tongues; but the Apoſtle ſhews in the xivth chapter, by divers reaſons, that propheſying was preferable, being more ſerviceable and uſeful to the church, and ſo more eligible and to be deſired by them, to which he may have regard here: or elſe by them are meant, the internal graces of the Spirit, as faith, hope, and love, which are all of them gifts of God's grace; all uſeful and valuable, and better than all external extraordinary gifts whatever, which a man might have, and be nothing, be loſt and damned; whereas he that believes in Chriſt, has a good hope through grace, and love in his ſoul to God, Chriſt, and his people, though he is deſtitute of the other gifts, ſhall certainly be ſaved; wherefore theſe are the gifts which men ſhould be ſolicitous for and covet after, and be greatly concerned to know that they have them, and to be content without the other: and yet ſhew I unto you a more excellent way; if by the beſt gifts are deſigned, the above graces of the Spirit, then by the more excellent way, Chriſt muſt be meant, the author and object of theſe graces; who is the way to the covenant, and to a participation of all the bleſſings of it, as juſtification, pardon, adoption, and eternal life; the way into a Goſpel church, and to all the ordinances of the Goſpel diſpenſation, as baptiſm, and the Lord's ſupper; for faith in him is the prerequiſite, and proper qualification for the enjoyment of each of theſe: Chriſt is the way of ſalvation, and the way to the Father, and to heaven and eternal happineſs; and an excellent one he is, the more, yea, the moſt excellent; he is the only way to each of theſe; he is the new and living way, a plain and pleaſant one; and ſo a ſafe and ſecure one, in which all that walk, ſhall certainly be ſaved: now this way the Apoſtle ſhewed, declared, pointed out in the miniſtry of the word; it was his chief and principal buſineſs, the ſum of his doctrine, to make known Chriſt and him crucified, as the way, the truth, and the life; to direct ſouls to him, and to ſhew them the way of ſalvation by him: but if by the beſt gifts are meant, the more uſeful ones of thoſe before mentioned, as propheſying, or preaching, then the more excellent way deſigns grace, ſpecial, and internal grace; and that either grace in general, regenerating, ſanctifying grace, including all ſorts of grace; which is the way of a ſoul's paſſing from the death of ſin, to a life of faith and holineſs; and is the way to eternal glory, and which gives a meetneſs for it, and is inſeparably connected with it. This is a more excellent way than gifts; for gifts be they ever ſo great, may be loſt or taken away, through diſuſe or miſimprovement; but grace always remains, can never be loſt, nor will ever be taken away, but will iſſue in everlaſting life: men may have the greateſt gifts, and yet not ſaved, as Judas and others; but he that has the leaſt degree of faith in Chriſt, hope in him, and love to him, ſhall be ſaved by him with an everlaſting ſalvation: or particularly the grace of charity, or love to the ſaints, may be intended by the more excellent way; which is the evidence of a man's paſſing from death and life; the new commandment of Chriſt, and the fulfilling of the law; without which, a man, though he has never ſuch great gifts, he's nothing as a chriſtian, nor in the buſineſs of ſalvation; and is the greateſt of all the graces of the Spirit; and is of ſuch a nature, that when prophecies, tongues, knowledge, and all external gifts ſhall fail, and even the internal graces of faith and hope ſhall ceaſe, the one being changed for viſion, and the other ſwallowed up in enjoyment, this will continue; and the rather this grace may be thought to be meant, ſince the Apoſtle immediately paſſes to treat of it in the next chapter, and prefers it to all gifts, and even graces.

CHAP. XIII.

THIS chapter is taken up in the commendation of the grace of charity, or love, which is preferred to all gifts whatſoever; is deſcribed by its properties and effects, and particularly its duration; on which account it is repreſented, as more excellent than other principal graces. The Apoſtle prefers it to gifts, by which it appears to be the more excellent way, he ſpeaks of in the latter part of the preceding chapter: he begins with the gift of tongues, which without charity makes a man noiſy, but not ſpiritual, ver. 1. he next mentions the gifts of knowledge of the myſteries of the Goſpel, and of preaching them; and alſo the gift of working miracles, on the account of which a man thinks himſelf ſomething, and yet with all theſe, not having the grace of love, he is nothing, ver. 2. to which he adds alms-deeds and martyrdom, and obſerves, that a man may do the one in the moſt extenſive manner, and ſuffer the other in the moſt dreadful ſhape; and yet if love be wanting, from whence, as a principle, all actions and ſufferings ſhould flow, theſe will be of no avail, ver. 3. and then the Apoſtle proceeds to deſcribe and commend this grace, by its effects and properties, and that in ſixteen particulars; by which it appears to be exceeding uſeful, and what adorns and recommends the perſon poſſeſſed of it, ver. 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. and enlarges upon the laſt, namely the duration and perpetuity of it; ſhewing that the gifts of knowledge, ſpeaking with tongues, and preaching ſhall fail, but this will not, ver. 8. the failure of theſe gifts he proves, from the imperfection of them, which therefore muſt be removed in a perfect ſtate of things, ver. 9, 10. this he illuſtrates, by comparing the preſent imperfect ſtate to childhood, and the future one to manhood, which he exemplifies in himſelf, ver. 11. the imperfect knowledge of the one he compares to looking at objects through a glaſs, and to an enigma, riddle, or dark ſaying; and the perfect knowledge of the other, to ſeeing face to face, without any artificial help, ver. 12. and he concludes this excellent commendation of charity by obſerving, that it is not only preferable to gifts, but even to graces, and theſe the more eminent, and which are abiding graces too, as faith and hope; and yet charity exceeds theſe, both as to its duration and uſe, ver. 13.

Ver. 1. Tho' I ſpeak with the tongues of men, &c.] That is of all men, all languages that men any where ſpeak, or have been ſpoken by them. The number of theſe, is by ſome ſaid [l] to be ſeventy-five; but the general opinion of the Jews is, that at the confuſion of languages at Babel, they were ſeventy; for they ſay [k], that then "the holy bleſſed "God deſcended, and ſeventy angels ſurrounding "the throne of his glory, and confounded the "languages of ſeventy people, and every nation of "the ſeventy had their own language and writing, "and an angel ſet over each nation;" whether this may be the reaſon, why the tongues of angels are mentioned here with thoſe of men, let it be conſidered. Mordecai, they ſay[l], was ſkilled in all theſe ſeventy languages, ſo that when he heard Bigthan and Tereſh, who were Tarſians, talking together in the Tarſian language, he underſtood them. The ſame is ſaid[m] of R. Akiba, R. Joſhua, and R. Eliezer; yea, they ſay[n], that this was one of the qualifications of the Sanhedrim, or of ſuch that ſat in that great council, that they ſhould underſtand theſe ſeventy languages, becauſe they were not to hear cauſes from the mouth of an interpreter. It is affirmed[o] of Mithridates king of Pontus, and Bithynia, that he had twenty-five nations under his government, and that he ſo well underſtood, and could ſpeak the language of each nation, as to converſe with men of any of them, without an interpreter. Apollonius Tyaneus[p] pretended to underſtand, and ſpeak with the tongues of all men; ſuch a caſe the Apoſtle ſuppoſes here, whether attained to by learning, induſtry, and cloſe application, or by an extraordinary gift of the Spirit, which latter ſeems to be what he intends; and the rather he mentions this, and begins with it, becauſe many of the Corinthians were greatly deſirous of it: ſome that had it not, were dejected on that account; wherefore to comfort them, the Apoſtle ſuggeſts, that the grace of love which they were poſſeſſed of, was abundantly preferable to it; and others that had it were lifted up with it, and uſed it either for oſtentation or gain, or to make parties, and not to the edification of their brethren; which ſhewed want of love, and ſo were no better than what the Apoſtle hereafter aſſerts: what he ſays here and in the following verſes, is in an hypothetical way, ſuppoſing ſuch a caſe, and in his own perſon, that it might be the better taken, and envy and ill will be removed: he adds, and of angels; not that angels have tongues in a proper ſenſe, or ſpeak any vocal language, in an audible voice, with articulate ſounds; for they are ſpirits immaterial and incorporeal; tho' they have an intellectual ſpeech, by which they celebrate the perfections and praiſes of God, and can diſcourſe with one another, and communicate their minds to each other; ſee Iſ. vi. 3. Dan. viii. 13. and which is what the Jews[q] call, "דיבור הלב, the " ſpeech of the heart; and is the ſpeech, they ſay, " שהמלאכים מדברים, which the angels ſpeak " in their heart; and is the pure language, and " more excellent than other tongues; is pleaſant " diſcourſe, the ſecret of the holy Seraphim—and " is שיח המלאכים, the talk of Angels; who do the " will of their creator in their hearts, and in their " thoughts:" this is not what the Apoſtle refers to; but rather the ſpeech of angels, when they have aſſumed human bodies, and have in them ſpoke with an audible voice, in articulate ſounds; of which we have many inſtances, both in the Old Teſtament and in the New, wherein they have converſed with divers perſons, as Hagar, Abraham, Jacob, Moſes, Manoah and his wife, the virgin Mary, Zechariah, and others; unleſs by the tongues of angels, ſhould be meant the moſt eloquent ſpeech, and moſt excellent of languages; or if there can be thought to be any tongue that exceeds that of men, which if angels ſpoke, they would make uſe of. Juſt as the face of angels is uſed, to expreſs the greateſt glory and beauty of the face, or countenance, Acts vi. 15. and angels bread, is uſed for the moſt excellent food, Pſal. lxxviii. 25. Dr. Lightfoot thinks, and that not without reaſon, that the Apoſtle ſpeaks according to the ſenſe, and conceptions of the Jews, who attribute ſpeech and language to angels. They tell us[r] that R. Jochanan ben Zaccai, who was cotemporary with the Apoſtle, and lived to the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, among other things, he was well verſed in, underſtood, שיחת שדים ושיחת מלאכי שרת, the ſpeech of demons, and the ſpeech of the miniſtring angels; and which they take to be the holy tongue, or the Hebrew language; they obſerve[s], that " the children of men (by whom I ſuppoſe they " mean the Iſraelites) are in three things like " to the miniſtring angels; they have know- " ledge as the miniſtring angels, and they walk " in an erect ſtature as the miniſtring angels, " ומספרים בלשון הקדש כמלאכי השרת, and they " ſpeak in the holy tongue, as the miniſtring angels." They pretend that the angels don't underſtand the Syriac language; hence they[t] adviſe a man, " never to aſk for what he wants in the Syriac " language; for ſays R. Jochanan, whoever aſks " for what he wants in the Syriac language, the " miniſtring angels don't join with him, for they " don't know the Syriac language;" and yet in the ſame page, they ſay, that Gabriel came and taught one the ſeventy languages: but let the tongues of angels be what they will, and a man be able to ſpeak with them ever ſo well, and have not charity; by which is meant not giving of alms to the poor, for in ver. 3. this is ſuppoſed in the higheſt degree it can be performed, and yet a man be deſtitute of charity; nor a charitable opinion of men as good men, let their principles and practices be what they will; for this is not true charity, but rather uncharitableneſs, and acting the moſt unkind part to their ſouls, to conſider and careſs them as ſuch, when deſtruction and ruin are in all their ways; but the grace of love is here meant, even love to God, and love to Chriſt, and love to the ſaints, which is a grace implanted in regeneration by the Spirit of God; and which if a perſon is deſtitute of, as he may, who has never ſo great a ſhare of learning, or knowledge of the languages, or even the extraordinary gift of ſpeaking with divers tongues; all his learning is but an empty ſound, his eloquence, his diverſity of ſpeech is but like the man's nightingale, vox & præterea nihil, a voice and nothing elſe; or as the Apoſtle here ſays, ſuppoſing it was his own caſe, I am become as ſounding braſs, or a tinkling cymbal; or rather, the loud or high ſounding cymbal, as in Pſal. cl. 5. which the Septuagint there render by κυμβαλοις αλαλαγμου, a phraſe of the ſame ſignification with this: for not that little tinkling inſtrument uſed by the heathens, is here meant; tho' what is here ſaid of the cymbal agrees with that; which made a tinkling noiſe when ſhaken, or ſtruck with any thing, or with one againſt another; and was an hollow veſſel of braſs, in form of the herb called navel wort[u]; but rather that muſical inſtrument which bore this name, uſed in the Jewiſh worſhip under the Old Teſtament; and which the Jews[w] ſay, was an inſtrument that gave a very great ſound; and that the ſound of it was heard as far as Jericho[x], which was ſome miles from Jeruſalem; they ſay [y], that the cymbals were two brazen inſtruments or pieces of braſs, which they ſtruck one againſt another, and ſo made a ſound. The cymbal was alſo uſed in the worſhip of heathen deities, and the alluſion here in both the things mentioned, is either to the tinkling of braſs, and the ſounding of cymbals in the worſhip of idols [z]; which were mere empty ſounds, and of no avail, as is a man's ſpeaking with divers tongues, deſtitute of the grace of love; or to the confuſed clamours and noiſes made upon going to battle, juſt upon the on-ſet by drums and cymbals, and ηχειοις χαλκοις, hollow ſounding pieces of braſs; as appears from Polyænus, Plutarch, Appianus, and others [a]; to which confuſed noiſes, the Apoſtle compares the moſt eloquent ſpeech without love. The Greeks had a play they uſed at feaſts, I will not ſay the alluſion is to it here, but leave it to be thought of, which they call Cottabiſis; when, the liquor that was left, they caſt into cups of braſs, and ſuch whoſe liquor made the greateſt ſound in the cup, fancied himſelf to be loved again, by the perſon he loved [b]: ſounding braſs and tinkling cymbals, are inanimate things, things without life, as all ſuch perſons are deſtitute of ſpiritual life, who are devoid of the grace of love; and tho' they, by an extraordinary gift, and under a divine impulſe, ſpeak with divers tongues, they are but like hollow veſſels of braſs, and ſounding cymbals, which only make a noiſe when they are ſtricken, and what they give is a mere empty ſound, which is of no profit to themſelves; they can't hear, nor be delighted with it, but are rather hurt, being worn out thereby; nor of no great advantage to others, unleſs they give a muſical ſound, and that only delights the ear, but neither feeds nor cloaths the body; of ſuch little uſe and profit are men, ſpeaking with tongues deſtitute of the grace of love, either to themſelves or others.

Ver. 2. And tho' I have the gift of prophecy, &c.] Either of foretelling future events, as Balaam, who foretold many things concerning the Meſſiah and the people of Iſrael, and yet had no true love for either; and Caiaphas, who was high-prieſt the year Chriſt ſuffered, and propheſied of his death, and was himſelf concerned in it, being a bitter enemy to him; or of explaining the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, by virtue of an extraordinary gift which ſome perſons had; or of the ordinary preaching of the word, which is ſometimes expreſſed by propheſying, which gift ſome have had, and yet not the grace of God; ſee Phil. i. 15, 16. Matt. vii. 22. and underſtand all myſteries; either the myſteries of the kingdom of heaven, the myſterious doctrines of the Goſpel; ſuch as the Trinity of perſons in the Godhead, the incarnation of Chriſt, the unity of the two natures, human and divine in him, eternal predeſtination, the doctrines of regeneration, juſtification, ſatiſfaction, and the reſurrection of the dead; all which a man may have a ſpeculative underſtanding of, and be without love to God or Chriſt, or to his people: or elſe the myſtical ſenſe of the types, figures, and ſhadows of the old law; as the meaning of the paſſover, brazen ſerpent, and the rock in the wilderneſs, the tabernacle, temple, ſacrifices, and all things appertaining thereunto. The Jews give us an inſtance [c], of one who was no lover of Chriſt, and lived in the times of the Apoſtle; R. Jochanan ben Zaccai; of whom they boaſt, and who they ſay was the leaſt of the diſciples of Hillel, and yet "perfectly underſtood the ſcripture, the Miſna, the Gemara, the traditions, the allegorical interpretations, the niceties of the law, and the ſubtleties of the Scribes, the lighter and weightier matters of the law; (or the arguments from the greater to the leſſer, and vice verſa) the arguments taken from a parity of reaſon, the revolution of the ſun and moon, rules of interpretation by gematry, parables, &c." The Apoſtle proceeds, and all knowledge; of things natural, as Solomon had; of the heavens, and the ſtars thereof, of the earth and ſea, and all things therein, and appertaining thereunto; of all languages, arts, and ſciences; of things divine, as a ſpeculative knowledge of God, and the perfections of his nature, of Chriſt, his perſon and offices, of the Goſpel, and the doctrines of it: and tho' I have all faith; not true, ſpecial, ſaving faith, or that faith in Chriſt, which has ſalvation connected with it; for a man can't have that, and be nothing; ſuch an one ſhall be certainly ſaved; and beſides, this can't be without love, and therefore not to be ſuppoſed: but all hiſtorical faith, an aſſent to every thing that is true, to all that is contained in the ſcriptures, whether natural, civil, moral or evangelical; to all that is contained in the law, or in the Goſpel; that faith which believes every thing: ſo the Jews [d] ſay, what is faith? that in which is found כל מהימנותא, all faith: or rather the faith of miracles is meant, both of believing and doing all ſorts of miracles, one of which is mentioned; ſo that I could remove mountains; meaning either literally, a power of removing mountains from one place to another, referring to Matt. xvii. 20. ſo Gregory of Neocæſarea called Thaumaturgus, the wonder-worker, from the miracles done by him, is ſaid [e] to remove a mountain, to make more room for building a church; but whether fact, is a queſtion; or this may be underſtood figuratively, ſee Rev. viii. 8. for doing things very difficult and wonderful, and almoſt incredible. The Jews uſed to call their learned and profound doctors, ſuch as could ſolve difficulties, and do wondrous things, by the name of mountains, or removers of mountains; thus [f] "they called Rab Joſeph, Sinai, becauſe he was very expert in the Talmudic doctrines, and Rabbah bar Nachmani, עוקר הרים, a rooter up of mountains; becauſe he was exceeding acute in ſubtle diſputations." Says Rabba [g] to his diſciples, "lo, I am ready to return an anſwer ſmartly to every one that ſhall aſk me, as ben Azzai, who expounded in the ſtreets of Tiberias; and there was not in his days, ſuch a עוקר הרים, rooter up of mountains, as he." Again [h], "Ula ſaw Reſh Lekiſh in the ſchool, as if עוקר הרים, he was rooting up the mountains, and grinding them together; ſays Rabenu, does not every body ſee R. Meir in the ſchool, as if he was rooting up the mountains of mountains, and grinding them together?" They [i] elſewhere diſpute which is the moſt honourable to be called, Sinai, or a remover of mountains; "one ſays Sinai

"is the more excellent name; another ſays the "rooter up of mountains, is the more excellent; "Rab Joſeph is Sinai, and Rabbah the remover "of mountains;" the Gloſs ſays the former is ſo called, "becauſe the Miſnic laws and their explications were ordered by him, as if they had "been given on mount Sinai," tho' he was not ſo acute as Rabbah; and the latter was called the rooter up of mountains, becauſe "he was ſharp "and ſubtle in the law;" once more on thoſe words relating to Iſſachar, Gen. xlix. 15. and bowed his ſhoulder to bear, 'tis obſerved[k]; that "this intimates that he was wiſe in wiſdom, מפרק הרים, "a breaker of the mountains, a ſhatterer in pieces of "the rocks of diſſentions and diviſion, various "ways; as it is ſaid, Jer. xxiii. 29. is not my word "like as a fire, ſaith the Lord, and like a hammer "that breaketh the rock in pieces? So a wiſe man, "by the ſharpneſs of his wit, breaks the mountains "of difficulties, and divides them by the words of his "mouth: hence they uſed to call the wiſe men by "the names of Sinai, and a rooter up of mountains; becauſe they beat and brake the rocks in "pieces, the traditions that are difficult and deep." The phraſe is alſo uſed of removing difficulties in a civil and political ſenſe, as well as in a theological one[l]: but let a man be able to do ever ſuch great things, yet if he has not charity, love to God, to Chriſt and to his people, he is nothing at all; as the Apoſtle ſays of himſelf, ſuppoſing it was his own caſe, I am nothing; not nothing as a man, nor nothing as a gifted man, ſtill he would be a man, and a man of gifts; nor does the Apoſtle ſay, that his gifts were nothing, that the gift of prophecy was nothing, or the gift of underſtanding myſteries nothing, or the gift of knowledge nothing, or the gift of doing miracles nothing; for theſe are all ſomething, and very great things too, and yet a man in whom the grace of love is wanting, is nothing himſelf with all theſe; he is nothing in the account of God, of no eſteem with him; he is nothing as a believer in Chriſt, nor nothing as a chriſtian. This is alſo a Jewiſh way of ſpeaking; for they ſay[m], "as a bride that is to be adorned "with four and twenty ornaments, if ſhe wants "any one of them, אינה כלום, ſhe is nothing; ſo "a diſciple of a wiſe man ought to be uſed to the "twenty-four books (of the ſcripture) and if he is "wanting in one of them, אינו כלום, he is nothing."

Ver. 3. And tho' I beſtow all my goods to feed the poor, &c.] Of which the Jews give us inſtances; they ſay[n], that R. Iſhcab ſtood, והחליק כל נכסיו לעניים, and diſtributed all his goods to the poor; and a little after they ſay the ſame of king Monbaz, that he ſtood and gave away, or diſperſed, all his goods to the poor; and elſewhere[o] they ſay of R. Eliezer ben Judah, that the collectors of alms ran away from him, becauſe he would have given them כל מה שיש לו, all that he had; and of another, they ſay[p], that he took all that he had in his houſe, and went out to divide it among the poor; but of what avail was all this, when what theſe men did, they did not from a principle of love to God, nor to Chriſt, nor even to the poor, to whom they gave their ſubſtance; but to have honour and applauſe from men, and have and obtain eternal life hereafter; for they thought by ſo doing, that they deſerved to behold the face of God, enjoy his favour, and be partakers of the happineſs of the world to come[q]: and tho' I give my body to be burned; which may be done by a man that has no principle of grace in him; the very heathens have done it; as the Indian queens upon the deceaſe and funeral of their huſbands; and Calenus an Indian philoſopher, who followed Alexander the great, and erected a funeral pile, and went into it of his own accord; and Peregrinus, another philoſopher did the like, in the times of Trajan. The Apoſtle here reſpects martyrdom, and by a prophetic ſpirit has reſpect to future times, when burning mens bodies for religion would be in uſe, which then was not; and ſuggeſts that there might be ſome, as according to eccleſiaſtical hiſtory there ſeems to have been ſome, who, from a forward and miſguided zeal, and to get themſelves a name, and leave one behind them, have expoſed themſelves to the flames, and yet have not had charity, true love to God, a real affection for Chriſt, or to his ſaints; wherefore the Apoſtle hypothetically ſays, ſuppoſing himſelf to be the perſon that had done all this, it profiteth me nothing: ſuch things may profit others, but not a man's ſelf; giving all his goods to the poor, may be of advantage to them, and giving his body to be burned in the cauſe of religion may be of ſervice to others, to confirm their faith, and encourage them to like ſufferings when called to them; but can be of no avail to themſelves in the buſineſs of ſalvation; which is not procured by works of righteouſneſs, even the beſt, and much leſs by ſuch which proceed from wrong principles, and are directed to wrong ends; the grace of God being wanting, and particularly that of love.

Ver. 4. Charity ſuffereth long, &c.] The Apoſtle in this and ſome following verſes, enumerates the ſeveral properties and characters of the grace of love; and all along repreſents it as if it was a perſon, and no doubt deſigns one who is poſſeſſed of it, and in whoſe heart it is implanted and reigns; ſuch an one is ſaid to ſuffer long, or be patient, as the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions read; not only under afflictions by the hand of God, which ſuch an one conſiders as ariſing from love; but under the reproaches and perſecutions of men, for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel, and in imitation of him; ſuch a perſon is ſlow to anger when abuſed, not quick of reſentment, nor haſty to revenge when affronted; but exerciſes forbearance, ſuffers long, and bears much, and is ready to forgive: and is kind; liberal and bountiful, does good to all men, even to enemies, and eſpecially to the houſhold of faith; he is gentle to all men, affable and courteous to his brethren, and not moroſe, churliſh, and ill-natured; he is eaſy, and yielding to the tempers and humours of men; accommodates himſelf to their infirmities, capacities, manners and circumſtances in every thing he can, that is not contrary to the glory of God, the intereſt of Chriſt, the honour of religion, his own conſcience, and the good of men: charity envieth not; or he that has the grace of love to God, Chriſt, and the ſaints does not envy the temporal happineſs of others, tho' it is what he has not, or is greater than he enjoys; as Rachel envied her ſiſter, becauſe ſhe had children when ſhe herſelf had none; as Joſeph's brethren envied him becauſe he had a greater ſhare in his father's affections than they had; or as good men may be tempted to envy the proſperity of the wicked, when they themſelves are in adverſity; but this grace, when in exerciſe, will not ſuffer a perſon ſo to do: nor will ſuch an one envy the ſuperior meaſures of grace, the more excellent ſpiritual gifts, or the greater degree of uſefulneſs, and of ſucceſs in any ſpiritual undertaking, and ſo of greater honour and reſpect, in any of the ſaints and ſervants of Chriſt to themſelves, of which Moſes and John the Baptiſt are remarkable inſtances, Numb. xi. 28, 29. John iii. 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31. charity vaunteth not itſelf; is not oſtentatious, a proud boaſter; either of what he has, the things of nature, as wiſdom, riches, honour, ſtrength, &c. or ſpiritual gifts; or of what he does, ſince what ſuch an one does, he does from a principle of love, and with a view to the glory of God, and not to be ſeen of men, or to gain their eſteem and applauſe: or is not raſh, and precipitant; does not run headlong into meaſures, to promote his own honour and intereſt, without conſidering what will be the conſequence of things; nor is he raſh with his mouth, or haſty with his lips, to utter any thing unbecoming before God or men. The Arabic verſion renders it, does not ſpeak deceitfully; or hypocritically, for nothing is more contrary to true genuine love than this; the Syriac verſion renders it, is not tumultuous; noiſy and ſeditious; ſuch an one is not troubleſome in a commonwealth, nor does he go into parties and factions in churches, but is all the reverſe: is not puffed up; ſwelled with pride, and elated with a vain conceit of himſelf, of his parts and abilities, of his learning, eloquence, wiſdom and knowledge, as the falſe teachers in this church were; knowledge without grace, unſanctified knowledge, mere notional, ſpeculative knowledge puffeth up; but charity, or the grace of love, does not; that edifies and preſerves perſons from being puffed up with themſelves, or one againſt another.

[q] T. Peſach. fol. 8. 1, 2. Roſhhaſhanah, fol. 4. 1. Bava Bathra, fol. 10. 1, 2.

Ver. 5. Doth not behave itſelf unſeemly, &c.] By uſing either unbecoming words, or doing indecent actions; for a man imprincipled with this grace, will be careful that no filthy and corrupt communication proceed out of his mouth, which may offend pious ears; and that he uſes no ridiculous and ludicrous geſtures, which may expoſe himſelf and grieve the ſaints; accordingly the Syriac verſion renders it, neither does it commit that which is ſhameful; ſuch an one will not do a little mean deſpicable action, in reproaching one, or flattering another, in order to gain a point, to procure ſome worldly advantage, or an intereſt in the friendſhip and affection of another. Some underſtand it in this ſenſe, that one endued with this grace, thinks nothing unſeemly and unbecoming him, however mean it may appear, in which he can be ſerviceable to men, and promote the honour of religion and intereſt of Chriſt; tho' it be by making coats and garments for the poor, as Dorcas did; or by waſhing the feet of the ſaints, in imitation of his Lord and maſter: or is not ambitious, as the Vulgate Latin verſion reads; of honour and applauſe, and of being in the higheſt form, but is lowly, meek and humble: ſeeketh not her own things; even thoſe which are lawful, as the Arabic verſion renders it; but ſeeks the things of God, and what will make moſt for his honour and glory; and the things of Chriſt, and what relate to the ſpread of his Goſpel, and the enlargement of his kingdom; and alſo the things of other men, the temporal and ſpiritual welfare of the ſaints: ſuch look not only on their own things, and are concerned for them, but alſo upon the things of others, which they likewiſe care for: is not eaſily provoked; to wrath, but gives place to it: ſuch an one is provoked at ſin, at immorality and idolatry, as Paul's ſpirit was ſtirred up or provoked, when he ſaw the ſuperſtition of the city of Athens; and is eaſily provoked to love and good works, which are entirely agreeable to the nature of charity: thinketh no evil; not but that evil thoughts are in ſuch a man's heart, for none are without them; tho' they are hateful, abominable, and grieving to ſuch as are partakers of the grace of God, who long to be delivered from them: but the meaning is, either that one poſſeſſed of this grace of love, does not think of the evil that is done him by another; he forgives, as God has forgiven him, ſo as to forget the injury done him, and remembers it no more; and ſo the Arabic verſion reads it, and remembers not evil; having once forgiven it, he thinks of it no more; or he does not meditate revenge, or deviſe miſchief, and contrive evil againſt a man that has done evil to him, as Eſau did againſt his brother Jacob; ſo the Ethiopic verſion, by way of explanation, adds, neither thinks evil, nor conſults evil; or as the word here uſed will bear to be rendered, does not impute evil; reckon or place it to the account of him that has committed it againſt him, but freely and fully forgives, as God when he forgives ſin, is ſaid not to impute it; or ſuch an one is not ſuſpicious of evil in others, he does not indulge evil ſurmiſes, and groundleſs jealouſies; which to do is very contrary to this grace of love.

Ver. 6. Rejoiceth not in iniquity, &c.] Neither in his own, nor in others; but on the contrary is grieved for it; he mourns over his own iniquities, the corruption of his heart, the infirmities of his life, his ſecret ſins, which none know but God and his own ſoul; he is greatly troubled at the prophaneneſs and immorality of the men of the world, and the ſins of profeſſors cut him to the heart: nor does he rejoice in injuſtice, as the word uſed here may be rendered, in any unjuſt action or injury, that may be done to any, yea, even to an enemy; even as Chriſt, when Peter in great zeal for him, drew his ſword and cut off the ear of one of the high-prieſt's ſervants, who was more buſy than the reſt in apprehending Chriſt, and ſhewed more malignancy than others, was ſo far from rejoicing at it, that he was diſpleaſed with Peter for doing it, and was moved with ſo much compaſſion to that man, tho' his enemy, as to heal him: but rejoiceth in the truth; in the truth of the Goſpel, and the ſucceſs of it; ſuch an one can do nothing againſt it, but for it, will buy it at any rate, but ſell it upon no account whatever; and he rejoices greatly when he ſees any walking in it, and agreeable to it; for truth, as it ſtands oppoſed to iniquity or unrighteouſneſs, may ſignify an upright, holy, and righteous converſation, a converſation becoming the Goſpel of Chriſt, which that teaches, and by which it is adorned; now a gracious ſoul deſires this in itſelf, and delights to ſee it in others.

Ver. 7. Beareth all things, &c.] The burdens of fellow-chriſtians, and ſo fulfils the law of Chriſt, which is the law of love; the infirmities of weak believers, and the reproaches and perſecutions of the world: or covers all things, as it may be rendered, even a multitude of ſins, as charity is ſaid to do, 1 Pet. iv. 8. not by conniving at them, or ſuffering them to be upon a brother; but having privately and faithfully reproved for them, and the offender being brought to a ſenſe and acknowledgment of them, he freely forgives them as treſpaſſes againſt him, covers them with the mantle of love; and induſtriouſly hides and conceals them from others: believeth all things; that are to be believed, all that God ſays in his word, all his truths, and all his promiſes; and even ſometimes in hope againſt hope, as Abraham did, relying upon the power, faithfulneſs, and other perfections of God; tho' ſuch a man will not believe every ſpirit, every preacher and teacher, nor any but ſuch as agree with the ſcriptures of truth, the ſtandard of faith and practice; nor will he believe every word of man, which is the character of a weak and fooliſh man; indeed, a man of charity or love, is willing to believe all the good things reported of men; he is very credulous of ſuch things, and is unwilling to believe ill reports of perſons, or any ill of men; unleſs it is open and glaring, and is well ſupported, and there is full evidence of it; he is very incredulous in this reſpect: hopes all things; that are to be hoped for; hopes for the accompliſhment of all the promiſes of God; hopes for the enjoyment of him in his houſe and ordinances; hopes for things that are not ſeen, that are future, difficult, tho' poſſible to be enjoyed; hopes for heaven and eternal happineſs, for more grace here and glory hereafter; hopes the beſt of all men, of all profeſſors of religion, even of wicked men, that they may be better and brought to repentance, and of fallen profeſſors, who declare their repentance, and make their acknowledgments; he hopes well of them, that they are ſincere, and all is right and will appear ſo: endureth all things; that are diſagreeable to the fleſh; all afflictions, tribulations, temptations, perſecutions, and death itſelf, for the elect's ſake, for the ſake of the Goſpel, and eſpecially for the ſake of Chriſt Jeſus.

Ver. 8. Charity never faileth, &c.] It may fail as to the exerciſe of it, as other graces do; it may be left, but not loſt; the fervor of it may be remitted and abated; it may wax cold thro' the prevalency of ſin; it may be greatly damped by the growth of error and hereſy, which eat as do a canker; and may be much obſtructed by an anxious and immoderate care and concern for worldly things; which are very pernicious to all the branches of vital religion and powerful godlineſs, and particularly love to God, Chriſt, and the brethren: but this grace never fails as to its principle; it is an immortal and an incorruptible ſeed; it lives throughout the moſt violent temptations, as in Peter; and under the greateſt deſertions and ſoreſt afflictions, ſtill there is an affection for God; Chriſt is he whom ſuch a ſoul loves; and the ſaints are the excellent in the earth, in whom is all his delight: and it alſo continues as to its uſe, and will do ſo, when faith and hope will loſe theirs, even in the other world; for faith will be changed into viſion, and hope into enjoyment; but love will be the ſame, only act in an higher ſphere, and to a greater degree, and in a perfect manner: but whether there be prophecies, they ſhall fail; by which are meant, either the predictions of future events, not that they ſhall fail in their accompliſhment, but they ſhall be no more, becauſe they will all be accompliſhed; or elſe the gifts of explaining the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and of preaching the doctrines of the Goſpel will be no more, becauſe there will be no need of them in a ſtate of perfection: whether there be tongues they ſhall ceaſe; not but that in the reſurrection, that member of the body the tongue, will be reſtored as the reſt, and be everlaſtingly employed in celebrating the perfections of God, in ſinging the hallelujahs of the lamb, and in joining with angels and other ſaints in ſongs of praiſe to the eternal Three; but the gift of ſpeaking with divers tongues will ceaſe, indeed it has already; nor will there be any uſe for ſuch an extraordinary gift in the other world; when probably, and as it is thought by ſome, there will be but one language, and that the Hebrew language; as the whole earth was of one language and ſpeech before the confuſion at Babel: whether there be knowledge, it ſhall vaniſh away; that is, the word of knowledge, peculiarly given by the Spirit to ſome perſons only; or that peculiar gift of knowledge of divine things, by which ſome are qualified to be inſtructors of others; the preſent means both of communicating, and of obtaining and increaſing knowledge by the preaching and hearing of the word, will be no more uſed: and beſides, imperfect knowledge of every ſort will diſappear, it will become perfect; that knowledge which is in part will be done away, when perfect knowledge takes place; for ſo we are taught to explain it by the following words.

Ver. 9. For we know in part, &c.] Not that the ſcriptures, the rule and meaſure of knowledge, and from whence ſpiritual knowledge is derived, are imperfect; ſo that there is need of unwritten traditions, and of enthuſiaſtic revelations and inſpirations, to inform of things otherwiſe unknown; for tho' they were at ſundry times, and in divers manners delivered, yet now they contain a compleat ſyſtem of divine truths, to which nothing is to be added, and from which nothing is to be taken away; or that only a part of the ſaints know the things of God; for tho' there is a difference between them, ſome have more knowledge than others, yet all have ſome, all are taught of God, and know him, and have that anointing which teacheth all things; wherefore the ſenſe alſo is not, that only a part of truth, and not the whole is known; for the Spirit of God leads into all truth; the whole counſel of God is made known in the ſcriptures, and by the miniſters of the word; tho' to this ſenſe the Arabic verſion inclines, rendering it, ſome part of doctrine we know; and ſo in ver. 12. ſome part of knowledge I know; as alſo the Syriac verſion which renders it, קליל מן סגי, a little from much we know; but the true meaning is, that tho' the rule of knowledge is perfect, and all the ſaints have knowledge, and every truth of the Goſpel is known; yet by thoſe that know moſt, it is known but imperfectly: the truth itſelf may be moſt clearly diſcerned, as it is revealed in the word; yet the manner of it, how it is, may not be known; and many difficulties may attend it, and objections be raiſed to it, which are not eaſily ſolved; as in the doctrines of the Trinity, predeſtination, the union of the two natures in Chriſt, the reſurrection of the dead, &c. and we propheſy in part; the word of prophecy as it is ſure, it is alſo perfect, to which we do well to take heed; and tho' all do not propheſy, yet all that do, and that propheſy aright, that is, explain the word of God aright, theſe preach the Goſpel fully, declare the whole counſel of God, and keep back nothing profitable to the ſaints; yet ſtill their propheſying, or explaining the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, or the myſteries of the Goſpel, is but imperfect at beſt in the preſent ſtate of things.

Ver. 10. But when that which is perfect is come, &c.] When perfect knowledge of God, of Chriſt, and of the myſteries of the kingdom of heaven ſhall take place; which will not in this life, but in that which is to come. So the Jews ſay [r], that at the reſurrection, upon the reunion of the ſoul and body, "the children of men ſhall attain to "דעה שלימה, perfect knowledge;" which is what the Apoſtle refers to here: and then that which is in part, ſhall be done away; the imperfection of knowledge ſhall be removed; the imperfect manner of communicating knowledge, and of receiving and acquiring it will ceaſe: thus the Apoſtle explains what he means, by the ceſſation and failing of knowledge, and prophecy; not that knowledge itſelf will be no more, and a ſtate of ignorance and darkneſs ſucceed; but imperfect knowledge will vaniſh away, or rather will be perfected, or be ſwallowed up in perfect knowledge; the imperfection of it will diſappear; and it will be no more taught and received in part; the whole of truth will be clearly known.

Ver. 11. When I was a child, I ſpake as a child, &c.] That cannot ſpeak plain, aims at words rather than expreſſes them, delivers them in a liſping or ſtammering manner: hereby the Apoſtle illuſtrates the then preſent gift of ſpeaking with diverſe tongues, which was an extraordinary gift of the Spirit, was peculiar to ſome perſons, and what many were very fond of; and yet this in its higheſt degree and exerciſe, was but like the liſping of a child, in compariſon of what will be known and expreſſed by ſaints, when they come to be perfect men in heaven: I underſtood as a child; and ſo does he that underſtands all myſteries, in compariſon of the enlightened and enlarged underſtandings of glorified ſaints; the people of God, who are in the higheſt form and claſs of underſtanding, in the preſent ſtate of things, are but children in underſtanding; tis in the other world, when they are arrived to the meaſure of the ſtature of the fulneſs of Chriſt, that they will in underſtanding be men: I thought, or reaſoned, as a child; whoſe thoughts are low and mean, and reaſonings very weak; and ſo are the thoughts and reaſonings of ſuch as have all knowledge here below, in compariſon of that perfect knowledge, thoſe clear ideas, and ſtrong reaſonings of the ſpirits of juſt men above: but when I became a man, I put away childiſh things; childiſh talk, childiſh affections, and childiſh thoughts and reaſonings; ſo when the ſaints ſhall be grown to the full age of Chriſt, and are become perfect men in him, tongues ſhall ceaſe, propheſies ſhall fail, and knowledge vaniſh away; and in the room thereof, ſuch converſation, underſtanding, and knowledge take place, as will be entirely ſuited to the manly ſtate in glory.

Ver. 12. For now we ſee thro' a glaſs, &c.] In this preſent life, they that are enlightened by the Spirit of God, ſee God, the perfections and glory of his nature, the riches of his grace and goodneſs, as diſplayed in Chriſt; they behold the glory of Chriſt, as full of grace and truth, and are filled with love to him; the deſires of their ſouls are after him, and they are changed into the ſame image by his Spirit; they diſcern the things of the Spirit of God; the vail being removed from them, they behold wondrous things, out of the law of God and Goſpel of Chriſt, even ſuch things as are unſeen unto, and unknown by the natural man: but then it is all, thro' a glaſs; not of the creatures; for tho' the inviſible things of God, may in ſome ſort be ſeen and underſtood by the things that are made; and God, as the God of nature, may be ſeen in the works of creation and providence, yet not as the God of grace; tis only in his Son, and thro' the glaſs of the Goſpel, he is to be beheld in this light; and ſo it is thro' the glaſs of the word and ordinances, that the glory of the perſon of Chriſt, of his offices, fulneſs of grace and righteouſneſs, is only to be ſeen; in theſe he is evidently ſet forth to the eye of faith, as the ſurety, ſaviour, and redeemer of his people, and thro' theſe the knowledge of divine truths is communicated: and thro' all theſe but darkly; in an ænigma, or riddle, or dark ſaying, as the word here uſed may be rendered; that is, in this preſent ſtate, in compariſon of the future one; for tho' the ſight of things under the Goſpel-diſpenſation is clear, and with open face, in compariſon of the legal one; yet even this is very obſcure, and attended with great darkneſs and imperfection, when compared with the beatific viſion in heaven, which will have no manner of interruption and obſcurity in it: but then face to face; there will be no intervening mediums of viſion; not the glaſs of the word and ordinances; there will be no need of them, God and Chriſt will be ſeen as they are; the judgments of God, his providential diſpenſations will be all made manifeſt, and will be legible without the help of a glaſs; the doctrines of grace and truth will lie open and clear, free of all dark ſpeeches, obſcure hints, or ænigmatical expreſſions: and as there will be nothing to intervene by way of aſſiſtance, there being no need of any, there will be nothing to intercept the ſight; the objects will be nigh, even face to face; the view will be full and clear, the ſight will be perfect, as well as the converſe with the objects will be familiar; and which, without the leaſt obſtruction, will always ſo continue: there ſeems to be here a double reference, partly to what the Lord ſays of Moſes, in Numb. xii. 8. with him will I ſpeak, mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark ſpeeches; and partly to what the Jews ſay of him, with a view to the ſame paſſage: "all the prophets, ſay they[s], "looked thro' a glaſs, which did not give light, "(or as they ſometimes ſay, which was ſpotted, "and was not clear;) Moſes our maſter looked, "באיספקלריא המאירה, thro' a glaſs that gave "light;" or as elſewhere, was bright and clear, and without any ſpot. Again, they ſay[t], "all "the prophets propheſied by the means of an an"gel; hence they ſaw what they ſaw במשל וחידה, "by way of parable and riddle, or dark ſaying; "Moſes our maſter did not propheſy by the means "of an angel; as it is ſaid, with him will I ſpeak, "mouth to mouth; and it is ſaid, the Lord ſpake to "Moſes, face to face; and it is alſo ſaid, the ſimili"tude of the Lord ſhall be behold; as if it was ſaid, "that there ſhould be no parable, but he ſhould "ſee the thing clearly without a parable; of which "likewiſe the law teſtifies, ſaying, apparently, and "not in dark ſpeeches; for he did not propheſy, "בחידה, by way of riddle; (in an ænigmatical "way, darkly;) but apparently, for he ſaw the "matter clearly." The two glaſſes, clear and not clear, the Cabaliſtic doctors call Tiphereth and Malcbuth[u]. "Tiphereth, they ſay, is a clear and "well poliſhed glaſs, by which Moſes propheſied "and had viſions, and ſaw all things moſt exactly, "in a very ſingular manner; Malcbuth, is the glaſs "that is not clear; ſo that he that propheſies by "that, propheſies by riddle, and parable." Now the Apoſtle ſuggeſts, that as there was ſuch a difference between Moſes and the reſt of the prophets, the one ſaw clearly, the other through a glaſs darkly; a like, yea, a much greater difference there is between the cleareſt views ſaints have of divine things now, and thoſe they ſhall be bleſſed with hereafter, and which he exemplifies in himſelf: now I know in part; though not a whit behind the chief of the Apoſtles; though his knowledge in the myſtery of Chriſt was ſuch, as had not been given to any in ages and generations paſt; and though he had been caught up into the third heaven, and had heard words not lawful to be uttered, yet owns his knowledge in the preſent ſtate to be but imperfect; which may be inſtructive to ſuch, who are apt to entertain an high opinion of themſelves, and dream of perfection in this life: but then ſhall I know, even as I am known; in the other world and ſtate, he ſignifies that he ſhould know God, Chriſt, angels, and glorified ſaints, and all truths in a perfect manner, even as he was known of God and Chriſt perfectly, allowing for the difference between the creator and the creature; his ſenſe is, that he ſhould have as full and compleat a knowledge of perſons and things, as he was capable of; it would be like, though not equal to the knowledge which God had of him; and which would be attended with the ſtrongeſt love and affection to the objects known, even as he was known and loved of God.

Ver. 13. And now abideth faith, hope, charity, theſe three, &c.] Which are the principal graces of the Spirit of God: faith is to be underſtood, not of a faith of miracles, for that does not abide; nor of an hiſtorical one, or mere aſſent to truth; perſons may have this faith, and believe but for a while; but of that faith, which is peculiar to God's elect; is a fruit and effect of electing grace, and for that reaſon abides; is the gift of God, and one of thoſe which are without repentance; is the work of God, and the operation of his Spirit, and therefore will be performed with power; it is the grace by which a ſoul ſees Chriſt, goes unto him, lays hold on him, receives him, relies on him, and lives upon him: hope is alſo a gift of God's grace, implanted in regeneration; has God and Chriſt, and not any worldly thing or outward performance, for its object, ground, and foundation, to build upon; it is of things unſeen, future, difficult, yet poſſible to be enjoyed; it is ſupported by the love of God, is encouraged by promiſes, and is ſure, being fixed on Chriſt and his righteouſneſs; it is that grace by which ſaints wait for things promiſed, and rejoice in the believing views of glory and happineſs: charity deſigns love to God, Chriſt, and the ſaints, as has been explained, and a large account is given of it in this chapter: theſe are the three chief and leading graces in God's people, and they abide and continue with them; they may fail ſometimes, as to their lively exerciſe, but never as to their being and principle; faith may droop and hang its wing, hope may not be lively, and love may wax cold, but neither of them can be loſt; Chriſt prays that faith fail not, hope on him is an anchor ſure and ſtedfaſt, and nothing can ſeparate from the love of Chriſt; as not from the love of Chriſt to his people, ſo not from theirs to him: theſe graces abide now, during the preſent life; he that has true faith in Chriſt, ſhall die in it; and he that has a good hope through grace, ſhall have it in his death; and love will outlive death, and be in its height and glory in the other world: for which reaſon 'tis added, but the greateſt of theſe is charity; and is ſaid to be ſo, not that it is on every account the greateſt; faith in many things exceeds that, as what is aſcribed to it in ſcripture ſhews; but becauſe of the peculiar properties and effects of it before mentioned, it including faith and hope, as in ver. 7. and beſides many other things, and becauſe without this, faith and hope are nothing: and beſides, its uſefulneſs is more extenſive than either of the other two; a man's faith is only for himſelf; a juſt man lives by his own faith, and not another's; one man's faith will be of no ſervice to another, and the ſame is true of hope; but by love ſaints ſerve one another, both in things temporal and ſpiritual; and chiefly 'tis ſaid to be the greateſt, becauſe moſt durable; in the other world, faith will be changed for viſion, and hope for enjoyment, but love will abide and be in its full perfection and conſtant exerciſe, to all eternity. The Jews[w] ſay much the ſame of humility, the Apoſtle does here of charity; "wiſdom, fear, "humility, they are alike, אך ענוה גדולה מכולן, "but humility is greater than them all."

CHAP. XIV.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle diſcourſes concerning the uſe of ſpiritual gifts, and prefers propheſying, or preaching, to every other gift; and directs to the order and manner of uſing it, and alſo points at the perſons who ſhould exerciſe it; and whereas there was much confuſion and diſorder in this church, in the management of the affairs of it, the chapter is concluded with a general exhortation to do every thing in a decent and orderly manner. The Apoſtle begins with an exhortation to follow after charity, which he had commended in the preceding chapter, and had preferred to gifts, and yet he would not have gifts ſlighted, but repreſents them as deſirable; particularly propheſying, or preaching, which he prefers above all, ver. 1. and eſpecially above the gift of tongues, and for which he gives his reaſons; he that ſpeaks with tongues, ſpeaks to God and not to men; at leaſt not to their underſtanding, though he may by his gift deliver the moſt excellent truths; ver. 2. whereas he that preaches, ſpeaks to men, to their edification, exhortation, and comfort, ver. 3. the one edifies himſelf, and the other the church, ver. 4. wherefore ſince he had a ſincere affection for this church, though he could wiſh they all had the gift of ſpeaking with tongues, yet he rather deſired they might have the gift of preaching, becauſe that was moſt for edification, ver. 5. and exemplifies this in himſelf, that ſhould he come to them ſpeaking with divers tongues, this would be of no uſe to them, unleſs he came revealing, making known, and preaching the doctrines of the Goſpel to them, ver. 6. and illuſtrates this by a ſimile taken from muſical inſtruments, in which unleſs there is a diſtinction of ſounds, the muſic will not be underſtood, and there can be nothing grateful and pleaſant; and ſuch is ſpeaking with divers tongues, without an interpretation, ver. 7. and particularly by a ſimile taken from the trumpet, as uſed in war; which if it gives a ſound that is unknown, it will be no direction to prepare for the battle, ver. 8. which ſimilies are accommodated to the caſe in hand; ſhewing that words eaſy to be underſtood by the hearer, ſhould be made uſe of by the ſpeaker, or ſpeaking is in vain, ver. 9. each word in every language indeed has its ſignification, ſome idea or another annexed to it; but if this is not underſtood by the hearer as well as the ſpeaker, they become Barbarians to one another, ver. 10, 11. wherefore ſuch as were eagerly deſirous of ſpiritual gifts, ſhould covet thoſe that were moſt for edification; and if ſpeaking with tongues were what they were moſt ſet upon, they ſhould pray for the gift of interpretation alſo, ver. 12, 13. becauſe, for inſtance, if prayer is made in an unknown tongue, the extraordinary gift indeed may be exerciſed, but not to the underſtanding, and ſo not to the profit of others, ver. 14. hence the Apoſtle determines for himſelf, that though he ſhould make uſe of his ſpiritual gifts, both in praying and ſinging, it ſhould be in ſuch a manner as to be underſtood by others, as well as himſelf, ver. 15. and it was right for every one to do ſo likewiſe, otherwiſe perſons not knowing what is prayed for, or thanks given for, would be ſo far from being able to join in the exerciſe, that they could not ſo much as ſay Amen at the concluſion of it, ver. 16. and though thanks might be returned for a mercy received in ever ſo agreeable a manner, yet it could be no ways edifying to a man that did not underſtand the language in which it was expreſſed, ver. 17. not that the Apoſtle ſaid all this, becauſe he had not ſuch a gift himſelf, for he had it to a greater degree than any in this church had arrived to, ver. 18. yet after all it was more eligible to him to ſpeak five words in a publick manner, ſo as to be underſtood, than ten thouſand in a language the people were ignorant of, ver. 19. wherefore he exhorts the Corinthians not to act the childiſh part, to covet ſpeaking with tongues, but rather the more manly one, to propheſy, or preach, to the underſtanding of others, ver. 20. moreover, the Apoſtle deters them from ſeeking to ſpeak with divers tongues, by citing a paſſage out of Iſaiah, ch. xxviii. 11. by which it appears, that ſpeaking with divers tongues and ſtrange languages, was ſometimes threatned as a puniſhment, and not given as a bleſſing, ver. 21. beſides, ſpeaking with tongues was a ſign of unbelief, and uſed for the conviction of unbelievers; whereas propheſying, or preaching, was a ſign of faith, and was for the profit of believers, and therefore the moſt deſirable, ver. 22. to which he adds another reaſon, diſſuading from the uſe of ſpeaking with divers tongues in public, where they are not underſtood, taken from the opinion that ignorant and unbelieving perſons coming into their aſſemblies would entertain of them, as though they were mad men, ver. 23. whereas ſhould they preach in a language underſtood, on the contrary it might be of uſe for the conviction of ſuch perſons, who having the ſecrets of their hearts laid open to them, will fall down and worſhip God, whoſe word they hear; and when they depart, report that the divine preſence is with ſuch a people, ver. 24, 25. hence the Apoſtle proceeds to direct to the proper, and orderly manner of uſing gifts; that whereas there were different ones among them, one had one gift, and another had another, they might all be uſed, provided they were uſed in ſuch a manner, as to tend to edification, ver. 26. ſo for inſtance, if ſpeaking in an unknown tongue was uſed, it ſhould be only by two or three at moſt, one after another; and there ſhould be an interpreter to make known the meaning of what was ſaid to the people, ver. 27. but if there were none that had the gift of interpreting, then it was moſt adviſeable for the ſpeaker to be ſilent in public, and only in private ſpeak to God and himſelf, ver. 28. and then as for thoſe that had the gift of propheſying, or preaching, theſe ſhould exerciſe their gift two or three at a time, one after another, and the reſt ſhould ſit and judge what they delivered, whether agreeable to the word of God or no, ver. 29. and ſhould any thing be more clearly revealed to one that ſat and heard, the ſpeaker ſhould be ſilent, and give way to him, that he might have the opportunity of declaring it to the edification of the church, ver. 30. for all that had the gift of preaching, might uſe it one after another, by turns, for general inſtruction and comfort, ver. 31. ſeeing ſpiritual gifts are ſubject to, and at the diſpoſe of thoſe that are poſſeſſed of them; or the doctrines preached by the one, are ſubject to the examination and judgment of the other, ver. 32. for God, the donor of all gifts, is the author of order and peace, and not of confuſion in all the churches, ver. 33. and whereas the Apoſtle had ſuggeſted, that all might propheſy, or preach, that is, that had gifts qualifying for it, he would be underſtood only of men, and not women, who were not permitted to ſpeak in the church in a way of preaching; no, not even to aſk queſtions there about what they heard, but if they wanted to be informed of any thing they did not rightly underſtand, they were to aſk their huſbands at home; this the Apoſtle argues, partly from the law which commands them to be in obedience to men, and partly from the indecency of ſuch a practice, ver. 34, 35. and ſeeing as it ſhould ſeem ſuch a practice did obtain in the church at Corinth, the Apoſtle warmly reproves them for it, it being what was not to be obſerved in other churches, by intimating to them, that the Goſpel neither came out from them, nor did it come to them only, ver. 36. and whoever had a gift of preaching, or a ſpiritual underſtanding of things, muſt allow, that what the Apoſtle ſaid, were not the commandments of men, but of God, ver. 37. but as for ignorant perſons, who were affectedly and wilfully ſuch, they muſt ſo remain, there was no help for it, ver. 38. upon which the Apoſtle repeats his exhortation he ſet out with, to deſire in the firſt place the gift of propheſying, or preaching, though he would not have ſpeaking with tongues forbidden, provided the above rules were attended to, ver. 39. and concludes with a general exhortation to do all the above things, and every thing relating to the doctrine and diſcipline of the church, in a becoming and orderly manner, ver. 40.

Ver. 1. Follow after charity, &c.] The Apoſtle having ſo highly commended charity, or love, in the preceding chapter, preſſes here to an eager purſuit after it; that is, to an exerciſe of it, and after thoſe things which make for it, and will ſerve to maintain and increaſe it; and every thing he has ſaid in praiſe of it before, ſerves as an argument, or reaſon, to follow hard after it, with an eagerneſs uſed in hunting, and with ſuch violence, as perſecutors expreſs in purſuing and laying hold on thoſe they ſeek after, to which there is an alluſion in the word here uſed: and deſire ſpiritual gifts; for though he had given charity the preference to them, he did not mean that they ſhould deſpiſe and neglect them, or treat them with indifference, and be unconcerned about them; but on the other hand, that they ſhould be very zealous for them, ambitious of them, and earneſtly covet them; ſince being rightly uſed and kept in their proper place, they were greatly beneficial and profitable to the churches of Chriſt, and the glory of God: but rather that ye may propheſy; of all the gifts of the Spirit, the Apoſtle prefers propheſying, and recommends this to the Corinthians, as what they ſhould be chiefly deſirous of, and more deſirous of, than of ſpeaking with tongues, which many among them were ſo very fond of: by which he means, not ſo much the gift of foretelling future events, though there was ſuch a gift beſtowed on ſome perſons in thoſe times, and in certain caſes, was very profitable to the churches; but a gift of preaching the word, or explaining the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and of praying and ſinging of pſalms, all which, as appears from ſome following parts of this chapter, were included in it; and that not in an ordinary, but in an extraordinary way; a perſon poſſeſſed of this gift, could at once, without the uſe of means, or help of ſtudy, preach the word, and open the more difficult parts of ſcripture; he had an extraordinary gift of prayer, which he could make uſe of when he pleaſed, and at once compoſe and deliver out a pſalm, or hymn in the public congregation.

Ver. 2. For he that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, &c.] Or with tongues, as ſome copies and the Ethiopic verſion read: Dr. Lightfoot thinks, that the Hebrew tongue, which was become a dead language, and underſtood but by few, is here meant, and that not without reaſon; ſeeing the publick prayers, preaching, and ſinging of pſalms among the Jews, were in this language[x]; in imitation of whom, ſuch miniſters who had the gift of ſpeaking this language, read the ſcriptures, preached, prayed, and ſung pſalms in it, which were no ways to the edification of the people, who underſtood it not; upon which account the Apoſtle recommends propheſying, praying, and ſinging, in a language that was underſtood: otherwiſe he ſpeaketh not unto men; to the underſtanding, profit, and edification of men: but unto God; to his praiſe and glory, and he only knowing, who knows all languages, and every word in the tongue what is ſaid; excepting himſelf, unleſs there ſhould be any preſent capable of interpreting: for no man underſtandeth him; or heareth him; that is, hears him, ſo as to underſtand him; he may hear a ſound, but he can't tell the meaning of it, and ſo is of no uſe and advantage to him: howbeit in the Spirit he ſpeaketh myſteries; though under the influence, and by the extraordinary gift of the Spirit he has, and to his own ſpirit and underſtanding, and with great affection and devotion within himſelf, he ſpeaks of the deep things of God, and the myſteries of his grace, the moſt glorious truths of the Goſpel, yet the meaning of his voice and words not being known, he's a barbarian to them that hear him; and though what he delivers are truths of the greateſt importance, they are a mere jargon to others, being unintelligible.

Ver. 3. But he that propheſieth, &c.] Preaches, prays, or ſings, in a language underſtood by the common people: ſpeaketh unto men to edification; to the building of them up in Chriſt, and on their moſt holy faith, ſo that they grow up as an holy temple to the Lord: and exhortation; to the more vigorous exerciſe of grace, and the more chearful and fervent diſcharge of duty: and comfort; of diſtreſſed minds, either through the temptations of ſatan, or divine deſertions, or inward corruptions, or outward afflictions; for all which ends and purpoſes the ſcriptures are written, and gifts are beſtowed on men to explain them; and which ends are anſwered, when God gives a bleſſing to the word; but can never be expected, if delivered in a language not underſtood. This bears hard upon the Papiſts performing any part of divine worſhip, in a language unintelligible to the common people.

Ver. 4. He that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, &c.] Be it the Hebrew language, or any other; ſome copies, and the Ethiopic verſion read, with tongues: edifieth himſelf; his heart may be warmed, his affections raiſed, his devotion kept up, and he be in a very ſpiritual and comfortable frame, knowing and underſtanding what he himſelf ſays: but he that propheſieth, edifieth the church; which is the great end of the Goſpel miniſtry, which is for the edifying the body the church; wherefore that which tends to the edification of more, even the whole church, muſt be preferable to that, which at moſt can only edify one, and that the ſpeaker himſelf.

Ver. 5. I would that ye all ſpake with tongues, &c.] This the Apoſtle ſays, to prevent being miſunderſtood; for his view was not to bring the gift of tongues into contempt, or to repreſent it as at all times and on all occaſions, uſeleſs and inſignificant; nor would he be thought to envy them this gift, or beat them off of deſiring it; for, for his own part, he could wiſh they all had it, was it the will of God; though he muſt needs ſay, that propheſying was moſt deſirable by him, as being moſt profitable: but rather that ye propheſied; he wiſhed them all prophets, as Moſes did all the Lord's people; he was not againſt their ſpeaking with tongues, but this was the moſt eligible, for which he gives this reaſon: for greater is he that propheſieth, than he that ſpeaketh with tongues; that is, he is more uſeful and profitable to men, and ſo conſequently more honourable, in higher eſteem, and more valued, and in greater dignity, being in a more ſerviceable poſt and office, and which is more beneficial and advantageous to mankind: except he interpret; what he ſaid; and then he might ſtand upon an equal foot, and be equally uſeful with him that propheſieth; but this every one could not do that ſpake with tongues; for ſpeaking with tongues, and the interpretation of tongues, were two diſtinct gifts; ſee ch. xii. 10, 30. and though a man that had the gift of tongues, might underſtand what he himſelf ſaid to his own edification, yet not be able to interpret it to the underſtanding and edification of others; and if he could not do this, his ſpeaking was to no purpoſe: hence the Apoſtle adviſes ſuch an one, to pray that he might interpret, have the gift of interpretation alſo, in ver. 13. That the church may receive edifying; which otherwiſe cannot be thought it ſhould, or be expected, and then an opportunity and ordinance would be wholly loſt.

Ver. 6. Now brethren, if I come unto you ſpeaking with tongues, &c.] The Apoſtle exemplifies this matter in himſelf, and ſuppoſes it his own caſe, that ſhould he who was the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and to be received by them as ſuch, when he came to them, come with this gift of tongues, which he was capable of, as much, or more than any, ſee ver. 18. and only make uſe of that, what ſhall I profit you? of what uſe would my miniſtry be to you? what inſtruction, comfort, and edification, could you receive by it? except I ſhall ſpeak to you, either by revelation; by the revelation of Jeſus Chriſt, whereby he received the Goſpel he preached; or by the ſpirit of wiſdom and revelation in the knowledge of Chriſt, and the myſteries of his grace, by which they were made known unto him at firſt, or by a freſh immediate revelation from heaven: or by knowledge; the word of knowledge, one of the peculiar gifts of the Spirit, ch. xii. 8. Or by propheſying; the gift of prophecy, another of the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, mentioned in the ſame chapter, ver. 10. and already explained: or by doctrine? the ſame with the word of wiſdom, another gift of the ſame Spirit, in ch. xii. 8. The Apoſtle intimates, that by the uſe and exerciſe of theſe gifts, he might be profitable to them, to lead them into a clearer view of the doctrines of the Goſpel, and for the further improvement of their knowledge in the ſcriptures of truth, which could never be done by bare ſpeaking with tongues, and with tongues they underſtood not.

Ver. 7. And even things without life, giving ſound, &c.] He inſtances in things inanimate, that have neither reaſon, ſenſe, nor life, in muſical inſtruments, and theſe of various ſorts: whether pipe or harp; wind muſic, or hand muſic; either that which is blown with the breath, or preſſed or ſtricken with the hand: except they give a diſtinction in the ſounds; or tunes, ſo as one may be diſcerned from another; as that this is ſuch a muſical note, and that is another: how ſhall it be known what is piped or harped? what tune is played; ſuch an uſe of inſtruments, would be a mere jargon, and not muſic, and ſo yield no pleaſure to the ear, or mind; and juſt the like muſt ſpeaking in an unknown tongue be, to one that underſtands it not.

Ver. 8. For if the trumpet give an uncertain ſound, &c.] That is not plain and manifeſt, ſo as that it cannot be known on what account it is given: who ſhall prepare himſelf to the battle? the alluſion is to the cuſtom of many nations, Jews and others, who when about to engage in war, made uſe of muſical inſtruments, particularly the trumpet, to gather the ſoldiers together, prepare them for the battle, give them notice of it, and animate them to it[7]; the ſound of the trumpet was the alarm of war; ſee Jer. iv. 5, 19, 21. Job xxxix. 25. And particularly the alluſion may be to the two ſilver trumpets, ordered by God to Moſes for the Jews, which were to be made of a whole piece, and to be uſed for the calling of the aſſembly, and for the journeying of the camps, and to blow an alarm with when they went to war againſt the enemy, Numb. x. 1, 2, 9. and were a lively emblem of the Goſpel, whoſe uſe is to gather ſouls to Chriſt, to direct ſaints in their journeying, and to prepare and animate them for battle, with their ſpiritual enemies; and of which uſe it is, when it gives a certain and even ſound, as it does when clearly and rightly blown; and that is, the ſound of love, grace, and mercy to the ſons of men, through a bleeding Saviour; ſalvation alone by a crucified Jeſus, peace and pardon by his blood, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, and atonement by his ſacrifice; when it is blown aright, it blows a blaſt on all the goodlineſs of man, it magnifies the grace of God, exalts the perſon of Chriſt, debaſes the creature, ſhews its impurity, imperfection, and inability; and expreſſes the nature, uſe, and neceſſity, of efficacious grace; and puts believers on doing good works for neceſſary uſes, but not for life, righteouſneſs, and ſalvation; and ſo its ſound is equal, even, and certain: and when it is ſo, it is a means of gathering ſouls to Chriſt, the ſtandard-bearer and enſign of the people; and of engaging them to inliſt themſelves as voluntiers in his ſervice; and of animating them to fight under his banner, the battles of the Lord of hoſts: but if this trumpet gives an uncertain ſound, as it does when grace and works are blended together in the buſineſs of ſalvation; and faith or works put in the room of, or joined with the righteouſneſs of Chriſt in juſtification; when particular election and general redemption, or the ſalvability of all men, are put together; the covenant of grace repreſented as conditional, and preparations for grace, and offers of grace, and days of grace talked of, that may be paſt and loſt; then who can prepare himſelf for the battle? perſons muſt be thrown into, and left in the utmoſt uncertainty and confuſion: when this is the caſe, they know not what ſide to take on, but halt between two opinions; they know not what that faith is they are to fight, and earneſtly contend for; they are not able to diſcern an enemy from a friend; they have no heart to fight and endure hardneſs, as good ſoldiers of Chriſt; nor can they promiſe themſelves, or be aſſured of victory, which the certain ſound of the Goſpel gives them.

Ver. 9. So likewiſe you, unleſs ye utter by the tongue words eaſy to be underſtood, &c.] This is an accommodation of the foregoing ſimilies, to the caſe in hand: for as unleſs there is a diſtinction of notes and tunes, it can't be muſic, nor it cannot be known what is piped or harped; and unleſs the trumpet gives a certain ſound, none can know when to prepare himſelf for the battle; ſo unleſs in the public miniſtry and ſervice, a language is ſpoken, and words made uſe of, which are underſtood without difficulty: how ſhall it be known what is ſpoken? the ſubject matter of the diſcourſe, prayer, or pſalm, will be all loſt, and therefore can't be for edification, exhortation, or comfort: for ye ſhall ſpeak into the air; into which ſuch words are reſolved, and the uſe and benefit of them, as to others, ceaſe with the breath, by which they are delivered; any part of divine ſervice performed in ſuch a way, is all in vain, and to no purpoſe; it is all loſt labour, 'tis beating the air, and talking to the wind. This condemns the practice of the Papiſts, performing divine ſervice in a language not underſtood by the common people; and expoſes the folly of thoſe, who are fond of a florid ſtile, of bombaſt words, great ſwelling words of vanity in their publick diſcourſes: this is only ſpeaking into the air, with regard to the vulgar, whoſe edification ſhould be conſulted: and as the end of the Goſpel miniſtry is publick uſefulneſs and edification, plainneſs of ſpeech, words eaſy to be underſtood, ſhould be uſed; ſuch as are apt and fit, to convey the true idea of things to people in common; theſe are the acceptable words, which the wiſe preacher, who is deſirous of doing good to the ſouls of men, will ſeek out, and ſtudiouſly make uſe of.

Ver. 10. There are it may be ſo many kinds of voices, &c.] לשנא, tongues, or languages, as the Syriac verſion renders it; that is, as many as there are nations in the world; there may be ſeventy of them, as the Jews ſay there were at the confuſion of languages at Babel; there may be more or leſs: and none of them is without ſignification: every language, and every word in a language, has a meaning in it, an idea annexed to it, which it conveys to him that underſtands it, and that can't be done without a voice ordinarily ſpeaking.

Ver. 11. Therefore if I know not the meaning of the voice, &c.] The force and power of a language, the ſignification of it, the ideas its words convey, but only hear the ſound of it: I ſhall be to him him that ſpeaketh a Barbarian, and he that ſpeaketh ſhall be a Barbarian unto me; like one of thoſe rude and uncultivated people, that inhabit deſerts and wild places, who can neither underſtand the language of others, nor be underſtood by others; and indeed may be meant of any ſort of people, that don't underſtand one another's language: the word בר, Bar, and ברא, Bara, in the Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic languages, not only ſignifies a field, a wood, or deſert place, but alſo without, or any thing extraneous; and being doubled, ſignifies one that lives without, in another land; a ſtranger, and that ſpeaks a ſtrange language; ſo all other nations of the world were Barbarians to the Hebrews, and particularly the Egyptians; ſee the Targum on Pſal. cxiv. 1. and ſo were all other nations to the Greeks, ſee Rom. i. 14. and alſo to the Romans: and the ſenſe is, that where the ſignification of a language, and the ſenſe of words are not known, the ſpeaker is like a man that lives in a ſtrange country to him that hears him; and the hearer is like to one that lives in a ſtrange country to him that ſpeaks, ſince they can't underſtand one another. The word ſometimes is uſed for men, αφωνοι η ανηκοοι [z], that can neither ſpeak nor hear, men dumb and deaf; and when words can't be underſtood, the caſe is all one as with ſuch perſons.

Ver. 12. Even ſo ye, foraſmuch as ye are zealous of ſpiritual gifts, &c.] Gr. of ſpirits; that is, of the gifts of the Spirit, as the Syriac verſion renders it; and we rightly, ſpiritual gifts; the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, for which the Apoſtle does not blame them; theſe being what he had before exhorted them to covet earneſtly, and zealouſly affect and deſire: but then he further adviſes, ſeek that ye may excel, to the edifying of the church; above all, be deſirous of ſuch gifts, and of excelling in them, and abounding in the exerciſe of them, which may be moſt profitable and edifying to the members of the church; and what theſe were, and in what manner to be uſed, he had before ſignified: the Alexandrian copy reads, ſeek that ye may propheſy.

Ver. 13. Wherefore let him that ſpeaketh in an unknown tongue, &c.] The Hebrew, or any other, the gift of ſpeaking with which is beſtowed upon him: pray that he may interpret; that he may have alſo the gift of interpretation of tongues; for as has been before hinted, theſe two gifts were diſtinct; and a man might have the one, and not the other; a man might ſpeak in an unknown tongue, ſo as to underſtand himſelf, what he ſaid, and be edified, and yet not be capable of tranſlating it at once into the common language of the people; and if he could not do this, he would not excel in his gift to the edification of the church; whereas if he could interpret he would, and therefore above all things, he ſhould pray to the Father of lights, the giver of every good and perfect gift, that he might be furniſhed with this alſo.

Ver. 14. For if I pray in an unknown tongue, &c.] In the Hebrew tongue, which the greateſt part of the Jewiſh doctors inſiſted [a] upon ſhould be only uſed in prayer; which notion might be borrowed from them, and now greatly prevailed in the church at Corinth; and the cuſtom was uſed by ſuch as had the gift of ſpeaking that language, even though the body and bulk of the people underſtood it not: my ſpirit prayeth; I pray with my breath vocally; or elſe with affection and devotion, underſtanding what I ſay myſelf, and ſo am edified; or rather with the gift of the Spirit beſtowed on me: but my underſtanding is unfruitful; that is, what I ſay with underſtanding to myſelf, is unprofitable to others, not being underſtood by them.

Ver. 15. What is it then? &c.] A Talmudic way of ſpeaking, and anſwers to מהו, often uſed when a difficulty ariſes in any caſe, then the queſtion is, what is it then? what is to be done? what is moſt prudent, adviſeable, and eligible? what is proper to be determined and reſolved on in ſuch a caſe? the ſame with τι ουν λεκτεον, what then is to be ſaid? uſed by Philo the Jew [b]: as here, ſhall I not pray with the ſpirit at all, becauſe my underſtanding, or that which I underſtand, is of no uſe to others, being not underſtood by them? ſhall I entirely neglect, lay aſide, and make no uſe of the extraordinary gift of the Spirit, beſtowed upon me on this account? no: I will pray with the Spirit; meaning not with the human breath, or ſpirit only, vocally, with an articulate voice, and diſtinct ſounds, ſo as to be underſtood; nor with his own ſpirit, or in a ſpiritual way, with a ſpirit of devotion and fervency, with his whole heart and ſoul engaged in ſuch ſervice, though this is neceſſary to it; nor with the common and ordinary aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God, though without this prayer cannot be performed aright, with faith and fervency, freedom and boldneſs; but with the extraordinary gift of the Spirit, ſo as to pray in an extraordinary manner, with divers tongues, in an unknown language; this, as the Apoſtle was capable of, he determined to uſe at proper times, and on proper occaſions: but then he alſo reſolves, and I will pray with the underſtanding alſo; not merely ſo as to underſtand himſelf, or with an underſtanding enlightened by the Spirit of God; with a ſpiritual experimental underſtanding of things, ſo as to know the object of prayer, the way of acceſs to him, the need of the Spirit's influence, his own wants and neceſſities, and that he ſhall have the petitions he aſks in faith, according to the will of God, all which is very requiſite in prayer; but ſo as to be underſtood by others: his ſenſe is, that though on ſome occaſions he might chuſe to make uſe of his extraordinary gift, yet he would alſo pray in a language, in which he might be underſtood by the people; that ſo they might be able to join with him, and receive ſome fruit and advantage thereby; and that their ſouls might be refreſhed, as well as his: I will ſing with the Spirit; meaning alſo not with the ſpirit, or breath, ſinging vocally only; nor with his own ſpirit, with his heart engaged in the work, with grace in it, in the lively exerciſe of faith, hope, and love, with much ſpiritual light, knowledge, experience, and judgment, which are very neceſſary to the due diſcharge of this duty; nor merely with the ordinary aid of the Spirit of God, which yet is greatly needful to excite attention, aſſiſt meditation, enlighten the underſtanding, raiſe the affections, ſtrengthen faith, and make a comfortable application of what is ſung; but as before, with the extraordinary gift of the Spirit, by which the Apoſtle was capable of delivering out a pſalm, or hymn extempore, and that in an unknown tongue: but then he alſo determines, I will ſing with the underſtanding alſo; not to his own underſtanding, or by or with the underſtanding of what is ſung, though that is abſolutely needful; but to the underſtanding of others, and in a language alſo which may be underſtood by others, and in which they could join with him in that ſervice: perhaps the Apoſtle may have ſome reſpect to the title of ſome of David's pſalms, משכיל, Maſchil, which ſignifies cauſing to underſtand.

[b] Leg. Alleg. l. 1. p. 48.

Ver. 16. Elſe when thou ſhalt bleſs with the Spirit, &c.] Which muſt be underſtood of giving thanks to God, not in a private way, in the family and at meals, but in a public manner before the whole congregation, for mercies temporal and ſpiritual, eſpecially the latter; and that not with the breath, or voice only; nor with the affections of the heart, with the ſoul, and all that is within it, though that is what ſhould be; nor with the common aſſiſtance of the Spirit, and under the influence of his grace, which excites to true gratitude; but with the extraordinary gift of the Spirit, pronouncing the bleſſing, or expreſſing the thankſgiving with divers tongues, or in an unknown language: when this part of divine ſervice, which by the way is diſtinct from ſinging, is performed in this manner, how ſhall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned; ἰδιώτου, idiot. The word הדיוט Idiot, is often uſed by the Jewiſh writers, and ſignifies a plebeian, one of the common people; and is ſometimes indeed diſtinguiſhed from a wiſe man, or a learned man; but frequently ſignifies a private perſon, whether learned or unlearned, that is not in ſo high a poſt as others; hence we read [c], דיינים הדיוטות, of private judges, which were not of the great Sanhedrim, and of private men, as diſtinguiſhed from kings [d]; "there are three "kings, and four הדיוטות, private men, the Jews "ſay, that have no part in the world to come; the "three kings are Jeroboam, Ahab, and Menaſſeh; "the four private perſons are Balaam, Doeg, Ahitophel, and Gehazi:" here a private man is diſtinguiſhed from the public miniſter that bleſſes, or gives thanks in the name of the people; and not to be underſtood of a ſingle perſon, whoſe place and office it was to ſay Amen, at the miniſter's giving of thanks, and who ſtood in ſome particular place for that purpoſe; but of the whole body of the people, who in diſtinction from the miniſter, were in the condition of private men, and all joined, as will be ſeen hereafter, in ſaying Amen; now the Apoſtle's queſtion is, that if thou who art a public miniſter, giveſt bleſſing and praiſe, or returneſt thanks to God in an unknown tongue, how ſhall the common people, or any one that is in a private capacity, ſay Amen at thy giving of thanks, ſeeing he underſtandeth not what thou ſayeſt? It was uſual to ſay Amen at bleſſing, or giving of thanks privately at meals, by thoſe that were preſent, concerning which are the following rules [e]; "he that breaks the bread, "might not break it until the Amen was finiſhed "out of the mouth of thoſe that anſwered; Rab "Chaſdai ſays out of the mouth of the major part "of thoſe that anſwer:" and elſewhere [f] 'tis ſaid, "they anſwer Amen after an Iſraelite has bleſſed, "but they do not anſwer Amen after a Cuthite (a "Samaritan, or any Gentile, or chriſtian) hath "bleſſed, unleſs the whole bleſſing is heard:" but of this kind of bleſſing the Apoſtle ſpeaks not, but of bleſſing in public; upon which all the people, and not a ſingle perſon only, as with one united voice, ſaid Amen; ſee 1 Chron. xvi. 36. Neh. viii. 6. to this practice the Apoſtle refers: concerning which the rule [g] is; "that the congregation may "not anſwer Amen, until the bleſſing is finiſhed out "of the mouth of the prieſts; and the prieſts may "not begin the other bleſſing, until the Amen is "finiſhed out of the mouth of the congregation." There were different ſorts of Amen, or rather different pronunciations of it; of which the Jews ſay [h], "they mayn't anſwer with a fatherleſs Amen; nor "with a ſudden or violent Amen, (pronounced "quick and in haſte;) nor with an Amen cut off, or "aſunder (the laſt letter of it not pronounced:) ſays "ben Azzai, whoever anſwers with a fatherleſs "Amen, his children ſhall be fatherleſs; with a "quick Amen, his days will be ſhort; with an "Amen cut off, his days ſhall be cut off; and whoever prolongs Amen, his days and years ſhall be "prolonged." Now, אמן יתומה, a fatherleſs Amen, was when a perſon anſwered, and he did not know what he anſwered [i] to; and ſuch an Amen, in the caſe here, muſt a private man anſwer with, at the giving of thanks in an unknown tongue; and to anſwer Amen to what was ſaid in a language not underſtood, was not allowed of; ſo the woman ſuſpected of adultery, was to be ſworn and examined by the prieſt, in a language ſhe underſtood; and was to ſay Amen, Amen, to what was ſaid, in a language known to her [k]; for if ſhe did not underſtand it, how could ſhe ſay Amen? which is the Apoſtle's reaſoning here: but was this an affair of ſuch importance, to be inſtanced in and argued upon in this manner? with the Jews it was, who ſay [l], "that greater is he that anſwers Amen, than "he that bleſſes:" and indeed they beſtow very extravagant encomiums, on thoſe who ſay it in a proper manner; "there's nothing greater, they "ſay [m], in the ſight of the bleſſed God, than the "Amen the Iſraelite anſwers with; ſays R. Joden, "whoever anſwers Amen in this world, is worthy "to anſwer Amen in the world to come;" again [n], "ſays R. Joſhua ben Levi, whoever anſwers Amen, "his name ſhall be great and bleſſed for ever and "ever; ſays R. Simeon ben Lakiſh, whoever an"ſwers Amen with all his ſtrength, the gates of "paradiſe will be opened for him, according to "Iſa. xxvi. 2." Moreover, it was a practice of the primitive chriſtians at the Lord's-ſupper, at the cloſe of it, to ſay with a loud voice Amen; the account Juſtin Martyr gives of it is this [o]; that "when the miniſter had finiſhed the prayers, and "the thankſgiving, all the people preſent, with a "joyful acclamation, ſaid Amen; which word, he "obſerves, in the Hebrew tongue, ſignifies ſo be it:" and this cuſtom might obtain in the Corinthian church at this time, to which the Apoſtle is thought by ſome learned men to refer.

Ver. 17. For thou verily giveſt thanks well, &c.] In very proper words, and pertinent expreſſions, with great affection and devotion, ſuitable to the ſervice: but the other is not edified; the reſt of the people, who don't underſtand the language in which thanks are given; thy friend, as the Syriac verſion reads it; or thy next neighbour, he that ſtands by thee, receives no manner of profit by it, becauſe he does not underſtand what is ſaid.

Ver. 18. I thank my God, I ſpeak with tongues more than you all.] This the Apoſtle ſays, to obſerve to them that he did not deſpiſe ſpeaking with tongues; nor did he endeavour to beat them off, and diſſuade them from deſiring them, or envied their having them, becauſe he was deſtitute of them himſelf; for he had this gift in a very eminent manner, and oftentimes made uſe of it, and was frequently under a neceſſity of ſo doing; he could ſpeak with more tongues than any of thoſe that had them, and ſpoke them oftener than they did; having occaſion for them through his travelling into different countries, and preaching the Goſpel to people of divers languages; and this he mentions alſo, not in a boaſting manner, but in great humility, giving thanks to God, and acknowledging him to be the author of this gift.

Ver. 19. Yet in the church I had rather ſpeak five words, &c.] Referring not to the five books of Moſes, as Jerom ſuggeſts, and much leſs as the Papiſts ſay to the five words, for this is my body; by the muttering of which they ſuppoſe the bread in the Lord's ſupper to be tranſubſtantiated into the body of Chriſt; but meaning a very few words, which he choſe to ſpeak in the church before the congregation, when and where ſaints were met together for publick worſhip, for their edification and comfort, and the glory of God; for tho' at other times, and to other people, he might think fit to make uſe of his gift in ſpeaking with divers tongues, yet at ſuch a time and place he thought it much more eligible to ſay ever ſo few words with underſtanding; ſo as to be underſtood by others, as well as himſelf: that by my voice I might teach others alſo; the doctrines of the Goſpel, the myſteries of grace, the duty of men towards God and men, and one another: than ten thouſand words in an unknown tongue; than to deliver ever ſo long an oration in a language not underſtood by them, which could be of no uſe unto them; for tho' they might hear his voice, the ſound of his words, yet thereby he could not teach and inſtruct them to their profit, unleſs they underſtood the language which he ſpoke; and therefore five words underſtood, were more likely to be of uſe than ten thouſand ſpoken in a ſtrange language.

Ver. 20. Brethren, be not children in underſtanding, &c.] There are ſome things in children in which it is reproachful for believers to be like them; as non-proficiency in knowledge, want of capacity to receive bear and digeſt ſtrong meat, levity, ficklenes, and inconſtancy, unſkilfulneſs in the word, deficiency of knowledge, want of underſtanding, not of things natural, but ſpiritual and evangelical; which is the more aggravated, ſince their underſtandings were opened and enlightened; an underſtanding was given them; the Spirit of God, as a ſpirit of underſtanding, was beſtowed on them; they had the ſcriptures, which are able to make wiſe unto ſalvation, and the man of God perfect; and alſo the miniſters of the Goſpel to explain divine truths to them; and many had been a long time in the ſchool of Chriſt, and might have been teachers of others; and yet, after all, were children in underſtanding, and needed to be taught the firſt principles of the oracles of God. The Apoſtle here has chiefly reference to the gift of ſpeaking with tongues, theſe Corinthians were ſo deſirous of; which when they had it, was only to talk like children; and for them to prefer it to other gifts, which were more uſeful and beneficial, diſcovered their judgment to be but the judgment of children; and if they deſired this, and made uſe of it for oſtentation, it ſhowed a childiſh vanity, from which the Apoſtle here diſſuades: howbeit in malice be ye children; in other things it is commendable to imitate children, and be like them; as in innocence and harmleſſneſs of converſation; to be meek, modeſt, and humble, free from pride and vain glory; to be without guile and hypocriſy, without rancour and bitterneſs, envying and malice, but tender-hearted, and ready to forgive. This the Apoſtle commends: but in underſtanding be men; or perfect, of ripe and full age, who have their ſenſes exerciſed to diſcern between good and evil. גבר, a man, ſays Aben Ezra[p], in our language, ſignifies מלא דעת, one full of knowledge, as in Exod. x. 11. 'Tis not perfection of juſtification that is here meant, for babes in Chriſt are as perfect in this ſenſe as grown men; nor a perfection of ſanctification, for there is no ſuch thing as this in any in this life; there's a perfection of ſanctification in Chriſt, and of parts in every one that is a new creature; and as that denotes ſincerity and uprightneſs, it is in all that have known the grace of God in truth; but then theſe are each of them as true of new-born babes, young converts, as of older chriſtians, and ſtrong men: but of knowledge and underſtanding in divine things; which tho' it is imperfect in the beſt, yet in ſome it is in greater perfection than in others; who may, in a comparative ſenſe, be ſaid to be perfect, or men of full age, who are arrived to a conſiderable ripeneſs and maturity of ſpiritual knowledge; and this is what believers ſhould be preſſing after, and deſirous of, and make uſe of all proper methods, ſuch as reading, hearing, and praying, to attain unto.

Ver. 21. In the law it is written, &c.] In Iſ. xxviii. 11. for the word law is not to be confined to the five books of Moſes, but includes all the writings of the Old Teſtament; and this entirely agrees with the ſenſe of the Jews. Says R. Azarias[q], "is it not to be found with our wiſe men, "of bleſſed memory, in many places, that the "word תורה, Law, comprehends the prophets, "and the holy writings?" And he gives an inſtance out of the Talmud, and which indeed is very pertinent to the purpoſe, and is rightly produced, and will ſupport the Apoſtle in calling the propheſy of Iſaiah, the law, ſince it is ſo called in the following paſſage[r]. R. Chijah bar Aba ſays, that "R. Jochanan ſaid, from whence is the reſurrection "of the dead to be proved, מן התורה, out of the "law? from what is ſaid in Iſ. lii. 8. thy watch-"men ſhall lift up the voice, with the voice together "ſhall they ſing. It is not ſaid they ſing, but they "ſhall ſing; from hence the reſurrection of the "dead is to be proved out of the law." And out of the ſame book the Apoſtle cites the following words; with men of other tongues, and other lips, will I ſpeak unto this people, and yet for all that will they not hear me, ſaith the Lord: the words, men of, are a ſupplement of our tranſlators, and which does not ſeem very neceſſary; nor is any made in other verſions. The words, as they are in our tranſlation of the prophet, are read thus, with ſtammering lips, and another tongue, will he ſpeak to this people. Some difference there is between the two paſſages, which are of no great moment; the words lips and tongue are inverted by the Apoſtle; nor was it at all material to obſerve the ſtrict order of them in the citation: and he has alſo rendered ſtammering lips by other tongues, and that very rightly; for the word לעג, uſed by Iſaiah, does not ſignify ſtammering, but deriſion or mocking; ſo perſons that are ſpoken to in a language they underſtand not, look upon themſelves to be mocked and derided: and the Apoſtle is to be juſtified by the Chaldee paraphraſe, which renders the words, בשגוש ממלל, with change of ſpeech; that is, with another and different language. Moreover, it is to be obſerved, that the prophet delivers the paſſage in the third perſon, and the Apoſtle cites it in the firſt: the reaſon of this is, becauſe he

[p] Comment. in Pſ. xxxvii. 23.

[q] Meor Enayim, c. 7. fol. 47. 1.

he adds theſe words to it, ſaith the Lord; partly for the ſake of the authority of the words, and partly to engage the attention of the Corinthians to them; and certain it is, that Iſaiah's meaning is, that the Lord would ſpeak in ſuch a manner to the Jews: the other phraſe, for all that will they not hear me, are taken out of ver. 12. Some think that this prophecy refers to God's ſpeaking, by the Apoſtles, on the day of Pentecoſt, with divers tongues, to the Jews; when, tho' there were three thouſand converted at that time, yet theſe were but comparatively few; the body of the people remained incredulous, and hearkened not to the Apoſtles, tho' their miniſtry was attended with ſuch ſigns and wonders: but rather the ſenſe ſeems to be this, that whereas the Lord had ſpoken in the plaineſt manner to the people of the Jews, by the prophets, as he would afterwards by the Apoſtles, and had repeated his words ſo often, that even a child might be thought to be capable of receiving them; yet ſuch was their ſtupidity and obſtinacy, that they ſlighted and diſregarded them; wherefore he threatens them he would take another method with them, and ſpeak to them in his providences, by people of different and ſtrange languages, as by the Chaldeans, Medes, and Perſians, in the ſeventy years captivity, and by the Romans, and other nations ſince, among whom they now are; and yet all this has had no effect upon them to liſten to the doctrine of the prophets and apoſtles. Hence the Corinthians had no reaſon to be ſo deſirous of ſpeaking with divers tongues, ſince theſe have been threatened and uſed by God in a way of puniſhment to a people, and not a bleſſing.

Ver. 22. Wherefore tongues are for a ſign, &c.] Of wrath and puniſhment inflicted on a rebellious and unbelieving people, and not of grace and kindneſs, as propheſying, or ſpeaking to them by the prophets, was; and ſo this is an inference from what is ſaid in the preceding verſe, and ſhews, that there was no reaſon why believers ſhould be ſo very deſirous of them. But if theſe words refer to all that is ſaid before on this ſubject, the word ſign may be taken for a miracle; and ſo a new argument is formed againſt an over-fondneſs for divers tongues, and the uſe of them in public worſhip, ſhewing the preferableneſs of prophecy to them: for ſpeaking with divers tongues was uſed in a miraculous way, not to them that believe; who have no need of miracles to raiſe their attention to what is ſaid, and that it may gain credit with them, or to confirm their faith in it: but to them that believe not; to prepare them to liſten to what might be ſuggeſted to them, when they ſee the perſons ſpeaking were endued with miraculous powers, and to engage their aſſent to it, and belief of it; and ſo with ſuch perſons, and for ſuch purpoſes, were the gift of ſpeaking with divers tongues uſed by the Apoſtles, Acts ii. but inaſmuch as the Corinthian church conſiſted of believers, there was no need of ſuch a ſign or miracle among them; wherefore, if they deſired ſuch gifts, and to make uſe of them, they ſhould chuſe to do it, not in the church, but among unbelievers: but propheſying ſerveth not for them that believe not; that is, not for them only; for propheſying or explaining the prophetic writings, or preaching the word, may be, and often is, the means of converting unbelievers; yet this is not the only uſe, nor does it ſerve for, or adminiſter comfort to unbelievers as ſuch; but is profitable to, and ſerves for them which believe: it is for their edification, exhortation, and comfort, ver. 4. it is the means of building them up on their moſt holy faith; of quickening and ſtirring them up to the exerciſe of grace, and performance of duty; of comforting them under various diſtreſſes, inward and outward; and of eſtabliſhing, ſtrengthening, and ſettling them, and therefore much more eligible to be uſed in a church of Chriſt, than ſpeaking with tongues.

Ver. 23. If therefore the whole church, &c.] The whole congregation of believers incorporated together in a Goſpel church-ſtate, conſiſting of its officers and private members; the church at Corinth is particularly deſigned: be come together in one place; to worſhip God, to pray unto him, ſing his praiſe, preach and hear the word, as were uſually done. Hence may be obſerved the cuſtom of the primitive churches to meet together, in ſome certain place, for divine worſhip; nor did the members of them in common forſake the aſſembling of themſelves together on that account, tho' it was the evil practice of ſome of them; the whole church, all the members of it, met together: and it may be ſeen from hence, that the church, and the place where it met, are two different things: and all ſpeak with tongues; divers tongues, languages not underſtood; meaning, not that all that came together ſpoke with tongues; but that as many as did ſpeak, ſhould they ſpeak with ſuch, and without an interpreter. And there come in thoſe that are unlearned, or unbelievers; either private chriſtians, who, though they have learned Chriſt, and underſtand the doctrines of the Goſpel, yet are ignorant of languages; or rather the ſame perſons with unbelievers, heathens that have no knowledge of Chriſt, nor faith in him, and who alſo underſtood no other language but the Greek: if any ſuch perſons ſhould come into the place where the church was met together, and ſhould hear him or them that ſpoke, ſpeak in a language they underſtood not, and which they were very well aſſured was equally unknown to the whole congregation, and ſo could be of no ſervice to them: will they not ſay ye are mad? act like men in a phrenſy, that have not the uſe of their reaſon; ſince ſpeaking in a ſtrange language to a congregation that know not one word of what is ſaid, is ſpeaking to the air, and to no profit at all to them that hear; and who but a madman would do this? The Apoſtle here argues from the ſcandal and contempt that would be poured upon them by ſuch a practice; and the rather he mentions this, becauſe it ſeems as if their governing view was the glory and applauſe of men, in which he ſuggeſts, they would be ſadly diſappointed.

Ver. 24. But if all propheſy, &c.] That is, all that ſpeak publickly in the church, not together, but in their order, one after another, as is hereafter directed: and there come in one that believeth not, or one unlearned; an unbeliever that has only the knowledge of his mother-tongue, in which propheſying or preaching is uſed: he is convinced of all, he is judged of all; of all the prophets or preachers; they all reprove him, and detect his ſecret, as the Arabic verſion renders the words; and to the ſame purport the Ethiopic. This muſt be underſtood of ſuch perſons whom the Spirit of God, under, and by the miniſtry of the word, powerfully works upon; whoſe hearts he opens to receive the word, and to whom he effectually applies it; whom he convinces of ſin, righteouſneſs, and judgment, ſhews the evil of their hearts and ways, reproves their errors, convicts them of their miſtakes, and informs their judgments, and condemns all their principles and practices which are not agreeable to the word of God.

Ver. 25. And thus are the ſecrets of his heart made manifeſt, &c.] Not to the prophets, or preachers, or to the reſt of the congregation, but to himſelf; the word preached being in the hands, and under the influence, direction, and application of the Spirit of God, a diſcerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart; ſhewing the plague and naughtineſs of it, diſcovering the luſts that are in it, detecting the errors of the mind, and filling the conſcience with a ſenſe of guilt, and a conſciouſneſs of deſerved puniſhment; ſo that the perſon looks upon himſelf as particularly ſpoken to, and as if the perſon ſpeaking had knowledge of all that was within him, and adapted his diſcourſe on purpoſe, to him, and delivered it for his ſake alone; concluding, that there is, and muſt be, ſomething more than human in it: and ſo falling down on his face; either publickly before the whole congregation; or when retired, as one aſhamed of his ſins and errors, and not able to look either God, or good men, in the face; and being in an adoration-poſture; or however, being truly humbled before God under a ſenſe of his iniquities, he will worſhip God; pray unto him, and earneſtly intreat he would be merciful to him a ſinner, and blot out all his tranſgreſſions, and forgive him all his ſins; and will ever after acknowledge him to be the true God, embrace his Goſpel, ſubmit to his ordinances, and attend his ſervice: and report; or declare, freely and openly to the church, to all men, to the world, and to his company from whence he came, and to whom he belonged, that God is in you of a truth: that the Spirit of God, who is truly God, and ſearches the deep things of God, and reveals them, and the deep things of men, and makes them manifeſt, is in the prophets and preachers, otherwiſe they would never be able to make manifeſt the ſecrets of the heart as they do; and that the preſence of God is in the church, and the power of God goes along with the miniſtration of the word: hereby, now many valuable ends are anſwered, a ſinner is converted, God is worſhipped and glorified, credit is brought to religion, the church of Chriſt is ſpoken well of, and prophets or preachers are honoured; wherefore propheſying, ſeeing it is both for the edification of believers, and converſion of ſinners, ought to be deſired, and made uſe of before ſpeaking with tongues.

Ver. 26. How is it then, brethren? &c.] Or what is it brethren? The Arabic renders it, what is the ſenſe of my words? The meaning of what he had ſaid, the drift of his whole diſcourſe; or rather the ſenſe is, what is to be done in the caſe he was about to propoſe? when ye come together; as a church, into one place, to worſhip God: every one of you hath a pſalm; not that every one had this, or any other gift here mentioned, but that there were ſome among them that had one or other of theſe ſeveral gifts: ſome of them had a gift of compoſing and ſinging a pſalm extempore; they delighted in pſalmody, and were forward to promote it, and fond of ſpending the time wholly in it. Hath a doctrine; others of them had a gift of deducing doctrines out of the word of God, which is profitable for that purpoſe, in an extraordinary manner, without ſtudy, and were capable of teaching them, and inſtructing men in them in a very edifying way: hath a tongue; others had the gift of ſpeaking with divers tongues; or had knowledge and ſkill in the Hebrew tongue, could not only pray and ſing in that language, and read the ſacred text, but could deliver a ſermon in it. Hath a revelation; others had a peculiar inſight into the types and figures of the Moſaic diſpenſation, a clear view of the prophetic writings, and a large diſcovery of the myſteries of the Goſpel, by the Spirit, as a Spirit of wiſdom and revelation. Hath an interpretation; others had a gift of interpreting languages, particularly the Hebrew language, when any thing was delivered therein by another. Now the Apoſtle anſwers to the queſtion, what is to be done in ſuch a caſe, where there is ſuch a variety of gifts, and every one is deſirous of exerciſing his peculiar gift? let all things be done to edifying; intimating, that each of theſe things might be done; every gift might be made uſe of: he that had a pſalm might ſing it; and he that had a doctrine might deliver it; he that had a tongue might ſpeak with it; and he that had a revelation might declare it; and he that had an interpretation might make uſe of it; provided that care was taken that each was done in ſuch a manner, as might be for the edifying of the church that was met together; otherwiſe, if it was only for oſtentation-ſake to make a ſhow of their gifts and talents, and to nouriſh their own pride and vanity, no good end would be anſwered; it had better be let alone: but if edification could be promoted, each gift might be employed; for which the Apoſtle gives the following directions.

Ver. 27. If any man ſpeak in an unknown tongue, &c.] He begins with the gift of tongues, with ſpeaking in an unknown tongue, as the Hebrew language, becauſe this they were deſirous of: and the rule for this he would have obſerved is, let it be by two, or at moſt by three, and that by courſe. The Arabic verſion reads it, let him ſpeak to two, or at moſt three, and ſeparately; as if it reſpected the number of perſons he was to ſpeak to at a time, and that in a ſeparate and private manner: but the Apoſtle's ſenſe is, that two ſuch perſons as had the gift of ſpeaking in an unknown tongue, or three at moſt, ſhould be only employed at one opportunity, leſt too much time ſhould be taken up this way, and prevent a more uſeful and edifying exerciſe; and that theſe ſhould ſpeak not together, which would be a mere jargon and confuſion, and make them look like mad men, and render them entirely uſeleſs indeed; but in courſe one after another, that ſo an interpreter might be able to take their ſenſe, and render what they ſaid, and expreſs it in a language the people underſtood: for it follows, let one interpret; what the two or three had ſaid. This practice ſeems to be borrowed from the Jews, who had ſuch an officer in the ſynagogue as a Methurgeman, or an interpreter. The riſe of which office, and the rules to be obſerved in the performance of it, are as follow, delivered by Maimonides[a]: "from the times of Ezra it has been "cuſtomary that an interpreter ſhould interpret to "the people what the reader reads in the law, ſo "that they may underſtand the nature of things; "and the reader reads one verſe only, and is ſilent "until the interpreter has interpreted it; then he "returns and reads a ſecond verſe: a reader may "not raiſe his voice above the interpreter, nor the "interpreter raiſe his voice above the reader. The "interpreter may not interpret until the verſe is "finiſhed out of the mouth of the reader, and the "reader may not read a verſe until the interpretation is finiſhed out of the mouth of the interpreter; and the interpreter might not lean "neither upon a pillar, nor a beam, but muſt "ſtand in trembling, and in fear; and he may not "interpret by writing, but by mouth; and the "reader may not help the interpreter; and they "may not ſay the interpretation written in the law; "and a little one may interpret by the means of a "grown perſon, but it is no honour to a grown "perſon to interpret by the means of a little one; "and two may not interpret as one, but one reads, "ואחד מתרגם, and one interprets [t]." An interpreter might not interpret according to his own ſenſe, nor according to the form of the words, or its literal ſenſe; nor might he add of his own, but was obliged to go according to the Targum of Onkelos [u], which they ſay was the ſame that was delivered on mount Sinai. The place they ſtood in was juſt before the reader; for ſo it is ſaid [w], "the interpreters ſtand before the wiſe man on the ſabbath-"days, and hear from his mouth, and cauſe the "multitude to hear." And elſewhere it is ſaid [x], "the interpreter ſtands before the wiſe man, the "preacher, and the wiſe man (or doctor) whiſpers "to him in the Hebrew language, and he interprets "to the multitude in a language they hear," or underſtand. And ſometimes theſe ſat at his ſide, and only reported what the doctor whiſpered privately. So "it is ſaid [y], that when the ſon of R. "Judah bar Ilai died, he went into the houſe of "Midraſh, or the ſchool, and R. Chananiah ben Aka-"bia went in and ſat by his ſide, and he whiſpered "to him, and he to the interpreter, and the in-"terpreter cauſed the multitude to hear." And they never put any man into this office until he was fifty years of age [z]. Several of the Jewiſh Rabbins were interpreters, as R. Chananiah before mentioned, and R. Chutzphit, and others [a].

Ver. 28. But if there be no interpreter, &c.] None that has the gift of interpretation of divers tongues, and he that ſpeaks with them has not that, which was ſometimes the caſe: let him keep ſilence in the church; let him not make uſe of his gift publickly before the whole congregation, ſince without an interpreter it will be entirely uſeleſs: and let him ſpeak to himſelf, and to God; he may make uſe of his gift to his own edification, and to the glory of God, by ſpeaking with a low voice, or in his heart, which he himſelf may be conſcious of, and God the ſearcher of hearts, and that knows all languages, fully underſtands; and ſo may be edified himſelf, and God may be glorified by him; whereas, if he was to to uſe it openly and publickly, it would not only be unprofitable, but an hindrance to others: or he might retire to his own houſe, and there exerciſe it by himſelf, and in the preſence of God, when it might be of ſome uſe and advantage to himſelf, but would be highly improper to bring it into the church, or publick congregation; for inſtead of aſſiſting, it would but damp their devotion, and therefore it was very reaſonable he ſhould be ſilent there.

Ver. 29. Let the prophets ſpeak, two or three, &c.] The Apoſtle having finiſhed the rules for ſpeaking with an unknown tongue, proceeds to lay down ſome for the gift of propheſying; and obſerves, that where there are a number of prophets, as very likely there were in the church at Corinth, two or three of them might propheſy, or explain the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, or preach the Goſpel at one opportunity or meeting: he does not uſe that reſtrictive clauſe, at moſt, as before, becauſe if there was any neceſſity or occaſion for it, more might be employed, ſo that care was taken not to burthen the people, and ſend them away loathing; and this they were to do, as before, in courſe, one after another, otherwiſe it would be all confuſion, nor could they be heard to edification. Tho' ſome have thought that they might ſpeak together at one and the ſame time, in different parts of the church: and let the other judge; the other prophets that ſit and hear, and all ſuch as have a ſpirit of diſcerning, whether what the prophets ſay comes from their own ſpirits, or from a lying ſpirit, from the ſpirit of antichriſt, or whether from the Spirit of God; and even the body of the people, private members of the church, and hearers, might judge of the doctrine for themſelves, according to the word of God, the ſtandard of faith and practice; and were not to believe every ſpirit, but try them, whether they were of God, and their doctrines by his word, whether they were true or falſe; for the ſpiritual man is in a meaſure capable of judging all things of a ſpiritual kind, thro' that ſpiritual experience he has of the word of God, and divine things, and by the aſſiſtance of the Spirit of God.

Ver. 30. If any thing be revealed to another that ſitteth by, &c.] To another prophet that ſits, and hears, and tries, and judges what he hears; if he has a clearer revelation made to him of what the other is ſpeaking of, and has a more diſtinct knowledge of it, and is capable of removing any difficulty that attends it, and of expreſſing it more plainly, and of proving it more largely, and of ſetting it in an eaſier light to the underſtandings of men: let the firſt hold his peace; he that was ſpeaking, upon ſuch an intimation being made to him, let him ſtop, and give way to him that has the revelation, that the church may receive the benefit of it: hence it may be obſerved, that the cuſtom of the primitive churches was to hear the word ſitting, and the prophet or preacher ſtood, or ſat, as he thought fit; ſee the note on Matt. v. 1. and that ſometimes a revelation was made, and light conveyed to theſe prophets in a very ſudden and extraordinary manner, when it was proper that it ſhould be at once communicated for the good of the whole ſociety: but this is be underſtood only of thoſe prophets or preachers, not of the common people; for it muſt not be thought that any that roſe up, and pretended to a revelation, might be indulged to deliver it, and the ſpeaker give way to him, which might be attended with much confuſion, and many bad conſequences; but only ſuch who were known to have gifts, and who at certain times had peculiar revelations made unto them.

Ver. 31. For ye may all propheſy one by one, &c.] Not every member of the church, but every one that had the gift of propheſy; ſo that they were not confined to two or three prophets at a meeting, but as many as would, or as had any thing to deliver, and as time would allow; only care muſt be taken that confuſion be avoided, and order preſerved by exerciſing in turns one after another. This was agreeable to the cuſtom of the Jewiſh ſynagogue, in which more might read and ſpeak, tho' but one at a time; for "it is forbidden to read in "the book of the law, except one only, that all "may hearken, and be ſilent, that ſo they may "hear the words from his mouth, as if they had "heard them that very moment from mount Sinai." So here, that all may learn; more of the doctrine of Chriſt, and of the mind and will of God, and attain to a greater knowledge in the myſteries of the Goſpel, and in the duties of religion, even prophets and teachers, as well as private members and common hearers; for there are none who know ever ſo much, but are capable of being further taught and inſtructed, and that ſometimes by ſuch whoſe gifts are inferior to them: and all may be comforted; or exhorted, or receive exhortation. The word uſed ſignifies both; and propheſy is uſeful both for exhortation and comfort, and that both to preachers and people.

Ver. 32. And the ſpirits of the prophets are ſubject to the prophets.] Meaning either that the doctrines which the prophets deliver, the explanations they give of paſſages of ſcriptures, the revelations they declare, are ſubject to the examination, judgment, and cenſure of other prophets; who have a right to try and judge them, either according to a more clear revelation they may have, or rather according to the ſure word of propheſy, the ſcriptures of truth; and indeed they are ſubject to the trial and judgment of the whole church, and therefore ought not to be ſtiff in their own ſentiments, and obſtinately perſiſt in them, but chearfully and readily ſubmit them to be examined, and approved or diſapproved by others; and particularly when one that ſits by ſignifies he has ſomething revealed to him, which will better explain, or give further light into what the ſpeaker is upon, he ought to ſubmit and give way to him; and thereby truth may be made manifeſt and eſtabliſhed, inſtruction, edification, and comfort promoted, and peace and order preſerved: or elſe the ſenſe is, that the ſpiritual gifts of the prophets, and the inſpirations and inſtincts by which they are acted, and the affections which are excited in them, are ſubject to themſelves, ſo that they can uſe, or not uſe thoſe gifts; tho' they have the word of the Lord they can forbear ſpeaking, as Jeremy did, for a while, and the caſe of Jonah ſhews; or they can refrain themſelves and be ſilent, and wait till they have proper opportunity of ſpeaking, being not like the prophets of falſe gods, who are acted by an evil ſpirit, and obſerve no order or decorum, but with a ſort of fury and madneſs deliver involuntarily what is ſuggeſted to them: but ſuch is not the caſe of true prophets that are influenced and directed by the Spirit of God, who will give way to one another; one will be ſilent while the other ſpeaks, and by turns propheſy one after another; and where there is not ſuch a ſubjection, 'tis a ſign that the Spirit of God is not in them, for the reaſon that follows.

Ver. 33. For God is not the author of confuſion, &c.] Or diſorder, or tumult, as the Syriac renders it; wherefore he does not inſpire and excite his prophets to deliver themſelves in a diſorderly and tumultuous manner, ſo as to break in one upon another; but when one ſpeaks, the other is ſilent, or when one has any thing revealed to him, and he ſignifies it in a proper manner, the other ſtops and gives way to him, and when he has done another ſucceeds, and ſo the reſt in order, till the whole opportunity is filled up in an orderly and edifying manner; and whatever is contrary to, or breaks in upon ſuch a method, God is not the author of: for he is the author of peace, harmony, unity, and concord among his prophets and teachers, and ſo of order, for the former can't be without the latter; where there is no order in the miniſtry, there can be no peace among the miniſters, nor comfort in the churches; but God is the God of peace, he calls for, requires, diſpoſes, and approves of peace and order among all his people: as in all churches of the ſaints. The Vulgate Latin reads, as I teach in all, &c. and ſo read ſome copies, and may refer to all that is ſaid before; and the ſenſe be, that all the rules he had preſcribed concerning ſpeaking with tongues, and propheſying, were not new ones, but ſuch as he had directed to be obſerved in all churches he was concerned with, and which conſiſted of holy and good men; or God is the author, not of confuſion, but of peace in all the churches; he orders and diſpoſes peace among them, and they attend to it: peace and order, and not confuſion and tumult, prevail in all churches that deſerve to be called churches of the ſaints, and therefore were in this to be imitated by the church at Corinth.

Ver. 34. Let your women keep ſilence in the churches, &c.] This is a reſtriction of, and an exception to one of the above rules, that all might propheſy; in which he would be underſtood of men only, and not of women; and is directed againſt a practice which ſeems to have prevailed in this church at Corinth, allowing women to preach and teach in it; and this being a diſorderly practice, and what was not uſed in other churches, the Apoſtle forbids and condemns, and not without reaſon: for it is not permitted unto them to ſpeak; that is, in publick aſſemblies, in the church of God, they might not ſpeak with tongues, nor propheſy, or preach, or teach the word. All ſpeaking is not prohibited; they might ſpeak their experiences to the church, or give an account of the work of God upon their ſouls; they might ſpeak to one another in pſalms, hymns, and ſpiritual ſongs; or ſpeak as an evidence in any caſe at a church-meeting; but not in ſuch ſort as carried in it direction, inſtruction, government, and authority. It was not allowed by God that they ſhould ſpeak in any authoritative manner in the church; nor was it ſuffered in the churches of Chriſt; nor was it admitted of in the Jewiſh ſynagogue; there, we are told [b], the men came to teach, and the women, לשמוע, to hear: and one of their canons runs thus [c]; "a woman "may not read, (that is, in the law) בצבור, in the "congregation, or church, becauſe of the honour "of the congregation;" for they thought it a diſhonourable thing to a public aſſembly for a woman to read, tho' they even allowed a child to do it that was capable of it. But they are commanded to be under obedience, as alſo ſaith the law. In Gen. iii. 16. thy deſire ſhall be to thy huſband, and he ſhall rule over thee. By this the Apoſtle would ſignify, that the reaſon why women are not to ſpeak in the church, or to preach and teach publickly, or be concerned in the miniſterial function, is, becauſe this is an act of power, and authority; of rule and government, and ſo contrary to that ſubjection which God in his law requires of women unto men. The extraordinary inſtances of Deborah, Huldah, and Anna, muſt not be drawn into a rule or example in ſuch caſes.

Ver. 35. And if they will learn any thing, &c.] If they are deſirous of learning any thing in relation to doctrine, duty, or diſcipline, and of improving their knowledge of divine things, which is very commendable in them; if any difficulty ariſes in their minds whilſt hearing the word, which they want to have removed, or any queſtion to aſk for information ſake, let them aſk their huſbands at home; privately, when retired from the publick aſſembly; for tho' men might aſk one another concerning this, and the other point, in the church, as was uſual in the ſynagogue-worſhip, to which this church at Corinth in many things conformed; yet women were not allowed this freedom, and even in things which belonged to women to do; as for inſtance, making the cake of the firſt of their dough, which was to be an heave-offering to the Lord, the men were to teach the women at home how, and when to ſeparate it from the reſt [d]. So the Apoſtle directs women, when they wanted to be informed about any point, to apply to their huſbands at their own houſes, if they were ſuch as were capable of inſtructing them; if not, they might apply to other men that were chriſtian men, and men of knowledge, eſpecially to the prophets, paſtors, and teachers of the church, at their habitations: for it is a ſhame for women to ſpeak in the church; it is a ſhame to themſelves, as being contrary to the natural modeſty and baſhfulneſs of the ſex, and a ſhame to the church, to the men-members of it, and eſpecially to the elders, and more experienced part of it, to be taught and directed by a woman; it is a diſgrace to herſelf and ſex, as betraying uncommon pride and vanity, and an unnatural boldneſs and confidence; and a diſgrace to the church to be under ſuch a miniſtry and conduct.

Ver. 36. What? came the word of God out from you? &c.] That you muſt give laws to other churches, and introduce new cuſtoms and practices never known or uſed before? No; the word of the Lord came out of Zion, and the law or doctrine of the Lord, the word of the Goſpel, the doctrine of the grace of God, came out of Jeruſalem. The Apoſtles that firſt preached it were Jews, and they preached it firſt in their own land, and planted churches there, before it came to the Gentiles; and therefore the Apoſtle ſuggeſts it would be right to conſider what was the practice of the churches in Judea, the firſt Goſpel-churches, concerning womens ſpeaking in the church, and to conform thereunto; when they would be able to obſerve, that theſe firſt churches from whence the word of God came to them, diſallowed of any ſuch practice, but in this point agreed with the old ſynagogue: or came it unto you only? no; it came to many other nations, and people, and towns, and cities beſides them; and many churches were formed among the Gentiles, who had no ſuch cuſtom, did not permit their women to ſpeak in the church; and therefore why ſhould they be ſingular and different from all others? other churches had the word of God, had gifts, and propheſying as well as they, and yet had introduced no ſuch cuſtom; and therefore it became them to pay a deference to the judgment and practice of others, eſpecially ſince theſe were under, and acted according to the direction of the Apoſtle, which they ought to have been ſubject to.

Ver. 37. If any man think himſelf to be a prophet, &c.] Or ſeems to be a prophet, and is really one; for the Apoſtle does not ſo much deſign to ſtrike at the pride, vanity, and appearances of falſe prophets, as to obſerve, that thoſe that are really prophets, have the gift of propheſy either of foretelling future events, or a peculiar gift of preaching the Goſpel, and explaining the ſcriptures, will allow what he had ſaid to be right: or ſpiritual; not merely one that has the Spirit of God, is regenerated and ſanctified by him, in oppoſition to a natural and carnal man; or one that has a larger knowledge of ſpiritual things, in diſtinction from a babe in Chriſt; but one that is endued with ſpiritual gifts, with the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit, with a diſcerning of ſpirits; as there were ſuch among them no doubt, as well as prophets, and who were diſtinct from them, having the word of wiſdom and knowledge: let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord; if he is a true prophet, and really a ſpiritual man, he'll clearly ſee, and therefore ought to own, that the rules here preſcribed concerning ſpeaking with tongues and propheſying, and concerning the intolerableneſs, unlawfulneſs, and indecency of womens ſpeaking in publick aſſemblies, are perfectly agreeable to the commands of Chriſt, and are to be eſteemed as ſuch, being delivered under the influence and direction of his Spirit; and which the prophet and ſpiritual man muſt diſcern and allow, if they have the Spirit of God; for whatever was commanded by the Apoſtles under divine inſpiration, was all one as if immediately commanded by Chriſt himſelf.

Ver. 38. But if any man be ignorant, &c.] Of theſe words, as the Arabic verſion adds, and does not know and own them to be the commandments of Chriſt; tho' he may profeſs himſelf to be a prophet, or a ſpiritual man, he is a very ignorant one, and has not the Spirit of God he pretends to: and if he will not be convinced, but goes on to doubt, and call in queſtion the truth of theſe things, and obſtinately perſiſts in his ignorance, let him be ignorant; let him be treated and deſpiſed as an ignorant man; and let his ignorance be no hindrance to any in receiving theſe rules and directions as the commandments of Chriſt; for no regard is to be had, or pity ſhown, to a man of affected ignorance, and wilful obſtinacy; ſuch a man is not to be known and owned, but ſhunned and rejected.

Ver. 39. Wherefore, brethren, covet to propheſy, &c.] The Apoſtle now draws to a concluſion, and re-aſſumes the exhortation he gave in the beginning of the chapter, preſſing the members of this church to deſire the gift of propheſy, that being the moſt eligible and preferable to others, particularly to ſpeaking with tongues, ſince it was the moſt uſeful and edifying, as he abundantly proves: and forbid not to ſpeak with tongues; ſuch as have that gift, and are deſirous of exerciſing it, provided they obſerve the rules preſcribed, and have an interpreter; this he adds to promote love, and prevent diſſenſion and diſcord.

Ver. 40. Let all things be done decently, and in order.] Which may refer not only to what is ſaid in this chapter, but in the foregoing part of the Epiſtle; go not to law before the unbelievers; let not a believing yoke-fellow depart from an unbelieving one; let not him that has knowledge ſit in an idol's temple, and eat meat there; let not a man pray with his head covered, and a woman with hers uncovered; come not to the houſe of God to eat and drink intemperately, thereby reflecting diſhonour and ſcandal on the ordinance of the Lord's ſupper; let not any ſpeak in an unknown tongue in the church, without an interpreter, as if he was a madman, nor ſuffer women to teach in publick; all which are very unbecoming, and contrary to the rules of decency: do not encourage animoſities, factions, and parties; deſpiſe not the faithful miniſters of the word, but honour and obey them in the Lord; neglect not the diſcipline of the church, lay on cenſures, and paſs the ſentence of excommunication on ſuch as deſerve them; keep the ordinances as they have been delivered, particularly that of the Lord's ſupper; obſerve the rules preſcribed for propheſying and ſpeaking with tongues, and ſo all theſe things will be done according to the order of the Goſpel: and the words may be conſidered as a general rule for the decent and orderly manngement of all things relating to the worſhip of God, and diſcipline of his houſe; that in all things a good decorum, and ſtrict order, be obſerved, that nothing be done contrary to the rules of decency, and the laws and commandments of Chriſt.

[d] Bartenora in Miſn. Challa, c. 3. §. 1.

CHAP. XV.

THE Apoſtle, in this chapter, recommends the Goſpel, and gives a ſummary of it, proves the reſurrection of Chriſt, and by various arguments eſtabliſhes the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, and anſwers objections made unto it. He alſo ſets forth the glory there will be upon the bodies of riſen ſaints, and the change that will be made on living ones; and concludes with an exhortation to perſeverance in faith and holineſs. As his chief view is the doctrine of the reſurrection, he introduces this by recommending the Goſpel in general, or by obſerving that this is a principal doctrine which ſhould be remembered and retained, becauſe it was the Goſpel which he had preached, and they had received, and had hitherto perſevered in, ver. 1. and beſides was eſſential to ſalvation, and the means of it, by which they would be ſaved, if they retained it, except their faith in it was in vain, as it would be ſhould they drop it, ver. 2. And moreover, the Apoſtle had received it by divine revelation, and had faithfully delivered it to them, and therefore it became them to hold it faſt; the ſum of which were the death, burial, and reſurrection of Chriſt, agreeable to the ſcriptures of the Old Teſtament, ver. 3, 4. and then he reckons up the eye-witneſſes of the latter, as firſt Peter, then the twelve diſciples, then five hundred brethren at one time; next James, and all the Apoſtles; and laſt of all himſelf, ver. 5, 6, 7, 8. of whom he ſpeaks in a very diminiſhing ſtile, deſcribing himſelf as an abortive, affirming himſelf to be the leaſt of the Apoſtles, and unworthy to be in that office, or bear that name, giving this as a reaſon for it, becauſe he had been a perſecutor of the church of Chriſt, ver. 9. wherefore he aſcribes the dignity he was raiſed to entirely to the free grace of God; and yet he magnifies his office, and obſerves, that the gifts of grace beſtowed upon him were not in vain, and that he was a more abundant labourer than the reſt of the Apoſtles, and had more ſucceſs; but then he freely declares that all he had, and all he did, were by the grace of God, ver. 10. But however, not to inſiſt upon the difference between him and other Apoſtles; he obſerves, that the ſubject-matter of their miniſtry was the ſame, namely, a ſuffering and riſen ſaviour, and who was alſo the object of the faith of the believing Corinthians, ver. 11. wherefore the Apoſtle proceeds to blame ſome among them for denying the doctrine of the reſurrection from the dead, ſeeing it was a principal part of the miniſtry of the Goſpel, that Chriſt was riſen from the dead, ver. 12. whereas that would not be true, if there is no reſurrection of the dead, ver. 13. but that Chriſt is riſen, is not only evident from the teſtimonies of eye-witneſſes before produced, but from the abſurdities that follow upon a denial of it, as that the preaching of the Goſpel was a vain thing, and faith in it alſo, ver. 14. yea, the Apoſtles would be no other than falſe witneſſes of God, teſtifying that he raiſed up Chriſt, when he is not riſen, if the dead riſe not, ver. 15. which argument is repeated, ver. 16. and other abſurdities following ſuch an hypotheſis are added; as beſides what was before mentioned, that faith becomes hereby a vain thing, ſuch as have believed in him muſt be in an unregenerate ſtate, and both under the power and guilt of ſin, ver. 17. nay, not only ſo, but ſuch who are dead in Chriſt, or for his ſake are loſt and periſhed, ver. 18. and even thoſe of the ſaints who are alive muſt be the moſt unhappy and miſerable of all mortals, ver. 19. But inaſmuch as it is a certain point that Chriſt is riſen, it is as clear a caſe that the ſaints will riſe, which is argued from Chriſt being the firſt fruits of thoſe that are fallen aſleep in him, which ſecures their reſurrection to them, ver. 20. and from his being their covenant-head, as Adam was to his poſterity; ſo that as all his offspring died in him, all the ſaints will be quickened by Chriſt, death coming by the one, and the reſurrection by the other, ver. 21, 22. And whereas it might be objected, if this is the caſe, why did not the ſaints, who were dead before the reſurrection of Chriſt, riſe from the dead when he did, or quickly after? To which it is anſwered, there is an order obſerved agreeable to the firſt-fruits and lump; Chriſt, the firſt-fruits, is firſt, and then they that believe in him, ver. 23. and this will not be until the ſecond coming of Chriſt, and the end of all things, when all the elect of God ſhall be gathered in; and then they'll be raiſed and preſented to the Father complete in ſoul and body, and all rule and authority among men will ceaſe, ver. 24. But in the mean while Chriſt muſt reign until all enemies are ſubject to him, and the laſt of all that will be deſtroyed by him is death; which is another argument proving the reſurrection of the dead; for if death is deſtroyed, the dead muſt riſe, and never die more, ver. 25, 26. That all things will be put under the feet of Chriſt, every enemy, and ſo death, is proved from a teſtimony out of Pſ. viii. 6. But to prevent a cavil, and ſecure the honour of God the Father, he is excepted from being ſubject to him, ver. 27. ſo far is he from being ſo, that the Son ſhall be ſubject to him, and appear to be ſo as mediator, by giving up the account of things to him; the end of which is, that God, Father, Son, and Spirit, may be all in all, ver. 28. The reſurrection of the dead is further argued from the ſufferings of the ſaints and martyrs of Jeſus, for the ſake of him and his Goſpel, and particularly this doctrine of it, which are firſt figuratively expreſſed under the notion of a baptiſm, ver. 29. and then more literally and clearly ſignified by being in Jeopardy, and expoſed to danger of life continually, ver. 30. and which is exemplified in the caſe of the Apoſtle himſelf, who was liable to death daily, ver. 31. of which he gives a particular inſtance in his fighting with beaſts at Epheſus. Moreover, another abſurdity would follow upon this, ſhould this doctrine not be true; and that is, that a looſe and licentious life, ſuch an one as the Epicureans live, would be encouraged hereby, ver. 32. from which the Apoſtle diſſuades; partly from the pernicious effect of it, which he ſhews by a paſſage cited out of one of the Heathens, ver. 33. and partly from its being contrary to a righteous converſation, and from the ſtupidity, ſinfulneſs, and ignorance, which ſuch a courſe of life, upon ſuch principles, declares, ver. 34. And then the Apoſtle proceeds to anſwer queſtions, and remove objections relating to the reſurrection of the dead; which queſtions and objections are put, ver. 35. which ſuppoſe the thing to be impoſſible and abſurd, and to which anſwers are returned, firſt by obſerving, that grain which is ſown in the earth firſt dies before it is quickened, and that it does not riſe up bare grain as it was ſown, but in a different form and ſhape, with additional circumſtances greatly to its advantage; and has a body given by the power, and according to the pleaſure of God, and ſuitable to the nature of the ſeed; by which is ſuggeſted, that in like manner the body firſt dies, and then is raiſed; and tho' the ſame body, yet it is raiſed in a different form, or with different qualities, by the power, and according to the will of God; and therefore ſeeing there are every year ſuch innumerable inſtances in nature, of dead and putrified grain being revived, it need not be thought incredible, impracticable, and abſurd, that God ſhould raiſe the dead, ver. 36, 37, 38. and that the body, tho' the ſame ſhall riſe different from what it was when laid in the grave, is illuſtrated by the difference of fleſh in men, beaſts, fiſhes, and birds; which, tho' all of it fleſh, differs from each other; and ſo will the fleſh of the body, in the reſurrection, differ from the fleſh it is now clothed with, ver. 39. And the ſame is further illuſtrated by the difference there is in the heavenly and earthly bodies, in the ſun, and moon, and ſtars, and in one ſtar from another; all which have reſpect to the ſame, ſhewing not any difference there will be in riſen bodies among themſelves, but in riſen bodies from what they now are, ver. 40, 41. as appears by the accommodation of theſe ſimilies to the reſurrection of the dead; and which differences are clearly expreſſed, the preſent bodies being corrupt, diſhonourable, weak, and natural, the riſen ones being incorruptible, glorious, powerful, and ſpiritual, ver. 42, 43, 44. And that the riſen bodies will be ſpiritual, the Apoſtle proves, by comparing Adam and Chriſt together; the one had a natural body, the other had a ſpiritual body after his reſurrection, ver. 45. the order of which is given, the natural body of Adam was before the ſpiritual body of Chriſt, ver. 46. Their original is alſo taken notice of, the one being of the earth, the other from heaven, ver. 47. and ſo accordingly the offspring of the one, and of the other, are different; the offspring of the firſt Adam are earthly like him, and have a natural body, as he had; the offspring of the ſecond Adam are heavenly, as he was, and will have a body like to his; for as they bear the image of the firſt man, from whom they naturally deſcend, by having a natural body like to his, ſo they muſt bear the image of the ſecond man, the Lord from heaven, by having a ſpiritual body faſhioned like to his glorious body, ver. 48, 49. And there is an abſolute neceſſity for this, ſeeing bodies, in their preſent ſtate, and caſe, as natural, mortal, and ſinful, cannot be admitted into the poſſeſſion of the kingdom and glory of the Lord, ver. 50. but inaſmuch as all will not die, and ſo be raiſed again, but ſome will be alive at the coming of Chriſt and the reſurrection of the dead, a difficulty ariſes how the living ſaints will come by ſpiritual bodies, in order to inherit the kingdom of God, without which they cannot inherit it: this difficulty the Apoſtle removes, by making known a ſecret never divulged before, that at the ſame time the dead will be raiſed, which will be at the ſounding of a trumpet; in a moment, at once the living ſaints will be changed, and become immortal and incorruptible, as the raiſed ones, ver. 51, 52. for ſo it muſt be that theſe corruptible and mortal bodies be clothed with incorruption and immortality, either by the reſurrection of them, or a change upon them, when either way they will become ſpiritual, ver. 53. And hereby ſome prophecies in Iſaiah and Hoſea will have their accompliſhment, ver. 54, 55. on the mention of which, ſome things in them are explained, as that ſin is the ſting of death, and the law is the ſtrength of ſin, which regard the prophecy in Hoſea, ver. 56. and the victory obtained over death, which is mentioned in the prophecy of Iſaiah, is aſcribed to God, who gives it thro' Chriſt, to whom thanks are returned for it, ver. 57. And the chapter is concluded with an exhortation ſtedfaſtly to abide by the cauſe of Chriſt, and in his ſervice; to which the ſaints are encouraged from this conſideration, that they will find their account in it, ver. 58.

Ver. 1. Moreover, brethren, I declare unto you the Goſpel, &c.] The Apoſtle here paſſes on, and proceeds to a new ſubject, the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, which ſome in this church denied; and which he undertakes to prove, eſtabliſh, and defend; and in order to lead on to it, obſerves, that what he was about to declare, make known, or put them in mind of, was no other than the Goſpel he had formerly preached to them, they had received, profeſſed to ſtand in, and were ſaved by, unleſs their faith was in vain. The doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead he calls the Goſpel, that being a moſt important doctrine, and a fundamental article of it. The reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead made a conſiderable part in the miniſtry of the Apoſtles, to the grief of the Sadducees among the Jews, to the ſcorn of the Gentile philoſophers, and to the faith, hope, and comfort of chriſtians: this is the ſum and ſubſtance of the word of faith, or doctrine of the Goſpel, upon which the whole depends; ſee Rom. x. 8, 9. and the reſurrection of the ſaints is connected with it, and aſſured by it. This indeed is the Goſpel, good news, glad tidings that the bodies of the ſaints ſhall be raiſed again, and made like to the glorious body of Chriſt; and being re-united to their ſouls, ſhall live with him to all eternity; and were this out of the Goſpel, it would not be Goſpel, or good news; it would be an idle ſtory, faith would be a vain thing, and hoping and believing chriſtians of all men the moſt miſerable. Moreover, ſays the Apoſtle, the Goſpel I declare, is which I preached unto you; meaning, when he firſt came among them, and which had been ſo very uſeful to them for converſion and conſolation; and therefore if he himſelf, or an angel from heaven, was to preach any other doctrine, it was to be rejected; and hence, much leſs ſhould the falſe teachers be regarded: yea, adds he, 'tis the doctrine which alſo you have received; when firſt enlightened and converted, with all gladneſs and joyfulneſs, with all readineſs and chearfulneſs, in the love of it, and by a full aſſent to it; and therefore having had ſuch an experience of it, ſhould not now depart from it: nay, he further ſays, and wherein ye ſtand; as he hoped they did, at leaſt it was what they ought to have done, and doubtleſs was the caſe of the majority of them, and whoſe example it became the reſt to follow.

Ver. 2. By which alſo ye are ſaved, &c.] It was the means of their ſalvation, and had been made the power of God unto ſalvation to them. Salvation tion is inſeparably connected with true faith in Chriſt as a ſaviour, and with a hearty belief of his reſurrection from the dead, which is the earneſt and pledge of the reſurrection of the ſaints; and becauſe of the certainty of it in the promiſe of God, thro' the obedience and death of Chriſt, and in the faith and hope of believers, which are ſure and certain things, they are ſaid to be ſaved already. To which the Apoſtle puts in the following proviſo's and exceptions; the one is, if ye keep in memory what I preached unto you; or rather, if ye hold faſt, or retain; that is, by faith, the doctrine preached to you, and received by you, particularly the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead; for the ſalvation that is connected with it does not depend upon the ſtrength of the memory, but upon the truth and ſtedfaſtneſs of faith: it is the man that perſeveres in the faith and doctrine of Chriſt that ſhall be ſaved; and every one that has truly believed in Chriſt, and cordially embraced his Goſpel, ſhall hold on, and out to the end; tho' the faith of nominal believers may be overthrown by ſuch men, as Hymeneus and Philetus, who aſſerted, that the reſurrection was paſt already; but ſo ſhall not the faith of real believers, becauſe the foundation on which they are built ſtands ſure, and the Lord has perfect knowledge of them, and will keep and ſave them. The other exception is, unleſs ye have believed in vain; not that true faith can be in vain; for that is the faith of God's elect, the gift of his grace, the operation of his Spirit; Chriſt is the author and finiſher of it, and will never ſuffer it to fail; it will certainly iſſue in everlaſting ſalvation: but then as the word may be heard in vain, as it is by ſuch who are compared to the way-ſide, and to the thorny and rocky ground; and as the Goſpel of the grace of God may be received in vain; ſo a mere hiſtorical faith may be in vain; this a man may have, and not the grace of God, and ſo be nothing; with this he may believe for a while, and then drop it: and ſince each of theſe might poſſibly be the caſe of ſome in this church, the Apoſtle puts in theſe exceptions, in order to awaken the attention of them all to this important doctrine he was reminding them of.

Ver. 3. For I delivered unto you firſt of all, &c.] Not only in the firſt place as to order; but among the chief and principal things, as the words will bear to be rendered, this was inſiſted on in his miniſtry; this was one he after relates, even a crucified Chriſt, or the doctrine of his dying for the ſins of his people; and which he mentions to lead on to his reſurrection; which he meant to improve, and does improve, in a very ſtrong manner, in favour of the reſurrection of the ſaints. This doctrine of a crucified ſaviour, which he at firſt determined only to make known among them, and did make known, was what he fully and faithfully delivered to them, as he had received it: that which alſo I received; not from men, but from Chriſt; for from him he had the doctrines of the Goſpel, as well as the ordinances of it; and he delivered nothing to be believed and practiſed, but what he had received, and which ought to be the practice and conduct of every Goſpel-miniſter; whatever they have received they ſhould deliver, and nothing elſe: and eſpecially the following important doctrine, how that Chriſt died for our ſins according to the ſcriptures; that is, of the Old Teſtament, the writings of Moſes, and the prophets, according to ſcripture promiſes, ſcripture types, and ſcripture prophecies; particularly Gen. iii. 15. Pſ. xxii. Iſ. liii. Dan. ix. which declare that his heel was to be bruiſed, that he ſhould be brought to the duſt of death, ſhould pour out his ſoul unto death, and be ſtricken and cut off in a judicial way, and that for ſins; not his own, but for the ſins of his people, in order to atone for them, procure the pardon of them, take them away, make an end of them, and aboliſh them; all which he has done, as the Goſpel declares, and the Apoſtle affirms; and thereby was accompliſhed what Moſes, and the prophets did ſay ſhould come to paſs. Every promiſe, type, and prophecy recorded in the law, in the prophets, and in the pſalms, concerning his ſufferings and death, had their fulfilment in him; nothing was more clearly prefigured and foretold, and nothing more punctually and fully anſwered.

Ver. 4. And that he was buried, &c.] That is, according to the ſcriptures; for as he died and roſe again according to the ſcriptures, he was buried according to them; which ſpeak of his being in hell, in Sheol, in the grave, and of his making his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death, Pſ. xvi. 10. Iſ. liii. 9. and which had their accompliſhment thro' Joſeph of Arimathea, a rich man, who begged the body of Jeſus, wrapt it in linen, and laid it in his own new tomb. And beſides theſe ſcripture prophecies of his burial, Jonas's being three days and three nights in the whale's belly, was a type of it; and according to which our Lord himſelf foretold it, Matt. xii. 40. Now ſince this was propheſied of, and typified, and had its actual accompliſhment, it was very proper for the Apoſtle to take notice of it, both to confirm the certainty of Chriſt's death, and the truth of his reſurrection, which his death and burial are mentioned, in order to lead on to, and next follows: and that he roſe again the third day according to the ſcriptures; that he ſhould riſe again from the dead was very plainly hinted or expreſſed in ſeveral prophecies which ſpeak of the riſing of his dead body, of its not being left in the grave ſo long as to ſee corruption; and which therefore could not be in it more than three days; and of his lifting up his head after he had drank of the brook by the way; of his aſcenſion to heaven, and ſeſſion at the right hand of God, which ſuppoſe his reſurrection, Iſ. xxvi. 19. Pſ. xvi. 10. and lxviii. 18. and cx. 1, 7. And that he ſhould riſe again the third day, is not only ſuggeſted in Hoſ. vi. 2. but was prefigured by the deliverance of Iſaac on the third day after Abraham had given him up for dead, from whence he received him, in a figure of Chriſt's reſurrection; and by Jonah's deliverance out of the whale's belly, after he had been in it three days. The Jews take a particular notice of the third day as remarkable for many things they obſerve, as "of the third day Abraham lift up his eyes, Gen. xxii. 4. of the third day of the tribes, Gen. xlii. 18. of the third day of the ſpies, Joſh. iii. 16. of the third day of the giving of the law, Exod. xix. 16. of the third day of Jonah, Jon. i. 17. of the third day of them that came out of the captivity, Ezra viii. 15. of the third day of the reſurrection of the dead, as it is written, Hoſ. vi. 2. after two days will he revive us, in the third day he will raiſe us up, and we ſhall live in his ſight." From which paſſage, 'tis clear, that they underſtood the prophecy in Hoſeah of the reſurrection of the dead; and it is obſervable, that among the remarkable third days they take notice of, are the two inſtances of Iſaac's and Jonah's deliverances, which were ſcripture types of Chriſt's reſurrection.

* Bereſhit Rabba, §. 56. fol. 49. 3.

From which obſervations they eſtabliſh this as a maxim [f], that "God does not leave the righteous "in diſtreſs more than three days." That Chriſt did riſe again from the dead, in purſuance of thoſe propheſies and types, the Apoſtle afterwards proves by an induction of particular inſtances of perſons who were eye-witneſſes of it.

Ver. 5. And that he was ſeen of Cephas, &c.] Or Simon Peter; for Cephas was a name given him by Chriſt, John i. 42. This was not another Cephas, one of the ſeventy diſciples, as Clemens ſuggeſts [g], but the Apoſtle Peter himſelf, to whom it is certain the Lord appeared. Not that he was the firſt perſon by whom Chriſt was ſeen after his reſurrection, for he firſt appeared to Mary Magdalene, Mark xvi. 9. but the teſtimony of the women the Apoſtle omits, and it ſeems as if Peter was the firſt of the men that ſaw Chriſt when riſen, ſee Luke xxiv. 34. Whether he was one of the diſciples that went to Emmaus, to whom Chriſt joined himſelf, and entered into diſcourſe with, is not certain; it ſhould rather ſeem, that the appearance here referred to was when he was alone: then of the twelve; tho' there were then but eleven of them, Judas being gone from them, and having deſtroyed himſelf; and at the firſt appearance of Chriſt to them, there were but ten preſent, Thomas being abſent; and yet becauſe their original number, when firſt choſen and called, were twelve, they ſtill went by the ſame name; ſee John xx. 24. Gen. xlii. 13. The appearance or appearances here referr'd to are thoſe in John xx. 19, 26. The Vulgate Latin reads the eleven; and ſo the Claromontane exemplar.

Ver. 6. After that he was ſeen of above five hundred brethren at once, &c.] Not at, or near Jeruſalem, for the number of the diſciples that were together there, made but about an hundred and twenty, Acts i. 15. but in Galilee, where Chriſt, in the days of his fleſh, had moſt chiefly converſed, moſt frequently preached and wrought his miracles, and where the number of his diſciples and followers were very large: here he promiſed his diſciples to go before them, and ſhew himſelf to them after his reſurrection, as he accordingly did, Matt. xxvi. 32. and xxviii. 7, 16, 17. And this being ſignified by the Apoſtles to the brethren there, 'tis no wonder that there was ſuch a number of them gathered together on that occaſion: of whom the greater part remain unto this preſent; and ſo might be perſonally applied unto for the truth of this, was it neceſſary; it being but about five or ſix and twenty years ago at the writing of this Epiſtle: and ſome were fallen aſleep; were dead, as it might be reaſonably thought there were among ſo many, and in ſuch a length of time; tho' doubtleſs theſe had ſurviving friends, relations, and acquaintance, to whom they had communicated this important caſe, and who were ready to atteſt what they had heard them in the moſt ſolemn manner declare.

Ver. 7. After that he was ſeen of James, &c.] Not James the ſon of Zebedee, and brother of John, tho' he was ſeen by him with other diſciples, John xx. 19, 26. and xxi. 1, 2. who was now dead when the Apoſtle wrote this, having been killed by Herod many years ago, Acts xii. 2. and ſo not quite ſo proper a witneſs to be mentioned; but James the ſon of Alpheus, and brother of our Lord, a man of great fame and credit with the Jews, and ſtill living, and therefore a proper and pertinent evidence. This appearance was made unto him when alone; and tho' the ſcripture elſewhere makes no mention of it, there's no room to doubt it, ſince the Apoſtle here affirms it. As for the account of the appearance of Chriſt to this James, immediately after his reſurrection, recorded by Jerom as he found it in the Goſpel according to the Hebrews, it ſeems to be fabulous. His account is this [h]; "the Goſpel written according to the Hebrews, which was lately "tranſlated by me into the Greek and Latin tongues, "and which Origen often uſes, relates, after the reſurrection of the ſaviour, that when the Lord had "given the linen cloth to the prieſt's ſervant, he "went to James, and appeared to him; for James "had ſwore that he would not taſte any bread from "the time he had drank the cup of the Lord, until "he ſaw him riſing from the dead. Again, a little after, bring me, ſays the Lord, the table and "the bread; and it is immediately added, he took "the bread, and bleſſed, and brake it, and gave "it to James the Juſt, and ſaid unto him, my "brother, eat thy bread, for the ſon of man is riſen "from the dead." Then of all the Apoſtles; at the mount of Olives, when he led them out of Jeruſalem, as far as Bethany, bleſſed them, and was parted from them, and aſcended to heaven out of their ſight, Luke xxiv. 50, 51. ſo that this was the laſt appearance of him on earth after his reſurrection.

Ver. 8. And laſt of all he was ſeen of me alſo, &c.] Either when the Apoſtle was caught up into the third heaven; or when he was in a trance in the temple at Jeruſalem; or rather at the time of his converſion, when he not only heard the voice of Chriſt, but ſaw him in the human nature; for he expreſly ſays, that he appeared unto him, and he calls it the heavenly viſion, Acts xxvi. 16, 19. This was a ſight of Chriſt in heaven, not on earth, ſuch an one as Stephen had, and was a corporal one; otherwiſe it would have been impertinent to have mentioned it, with the reſt of the ocular teſtimonies of Chriſt's reſurrection. Not that this was the laſt time that Chriſt was ſeen, or to be ſeen, for he was ſeen after this by the Apoſtle John in a viſionary way, and will be corporally ſeen by all the ſaints at the laſt day; but Paul was the laſt of the Apoſtles and brethren before named, and he had his viſion of Chriſt after them all; and perhaps it might be a more clear, full, and diſtinct one than any of the reſt, as the laſt things are ſometimes the moſt excellent. The Apoſtle adds, as of one born out of due time; or as an abortive; not that he was really one, but like one: ſeveral learned interpreters think the Apoſtle refers to a proverbial way of ſpeaking among the common people at Rome, who uſed to call ſuch ſupernumerary ſenators in the times of Auguſtus Cæſar, who got into the ſenate-houſe by favour or bribery, Abortives [i], they being generally very unworthy perſons; and therefore calls himſelf by this name, as being in his own opinion a ſupernumerary Apoſtle, and very unworthy of that office: tho' others rather think that he refers to a poſthumous birth, to one that is born after the death of his father; becauſe that the reſt of the Apoſtles were all choſen, and called, and ſent forth, whilſt Chriſt, their everlaſting Father, was living on earth, but he not till after his death, reſurrection from the dead, and aſcenſion to heaven: but it ſeems beſt to underſtand him of an abortion, a miſcarriage, or birth before its time; and may reſpect either the manner of his converſion, which was done both ſuddenly, immediately, and at once, by a ſudden light from heaven, when he little thought of it, and had no expectation of it, which is commonly the caſe of abortions; and alſo powerfully and irreſiſtibly, being effected by mighty and efficacious grace, as births before the full time are often occaſioned by blows or outward force, and are violent extruſions of the fœtus; or elſe the ſtate and condition in which he was when Chriſt was firſt ſeen by him: as to his bodily ſtate, as ſoon as ever he ſaw the light about him, and the object by it, he was ſtruck blind, and continued ſo ſome days, like an hidden untimely birth, and like an infant that never ſaw light, Job iii. 16. And as to his ſpiritual eſtate, his ſoul was like an unſhapen fœtus, Chriſt being not yet formed in him, his image inſtamp'd on him, and his grace implanted in him; yea, it may be applied to the preſent apprehenſions he had of himſelf, and which he expreſſes without a figure in the next verſe, tho' in a beautiful manner, with a view to what he here ſays, when he obſerves that he was the leaſt of the Apoſtles, and not meet to be called one; as an abortive, or one born before its time, is imperfect in one reſpect or another, is not come to its proper bigneſs and ſhape, and ſcarcely is to be reckoned in the claſs and number of men.

Ver. 9. For I am the leaſt of the Apoſtles, &c.] Referring not to the littleneſs of his ſtature, but to the figure before uſed, and as expreſſing not the opinion of others concerning him, but the true and real ſenſe he had of himſelf, for which he himſelf gives the ſtrongeſt reaſon that can be given; and by Apoſtles he means not only the twelve, but all other miniſters of the Goſpel that were ſent forth by Chriſt to preach it: nor need this be wondered at, when he ſays, that he was leſs than the leaſt of all ſaints, Eph. iii. 8. tho' when his perſon and doctrines were traduced by falſe teachers, and attempts were made to diſgrace his miniſtry, and render it uſeleſs, in vindication of himſelf, and without vanity, he does not ſtick to aſſert, that he was not a whit behind the very chiefeſt of the Apoſtles, 2 Cor. xi. 5. and xii. 11. and yet here adds, that am not meet to be called an Apoſtle; not only to be one, but to bear the name of one. No man was meet or fit for ſuch an office of himſelf; none of the Apoſtles were any more than himſelf; but his meaning is, that tho' he was choſen, and called, and qualified by the gifts and grace of God for this office, yet he was unworthy to be called by the name of an Apoſtle of Chriſt, for the reaſon following, becauſe I perſecuted the church of God: he not only conſented to the death of Stephen, the firſt martyr, and held the clothes of them that ſtoned him; but he made havock of the church, haling men and women to priſon, and continued to breathe out threatnings and ſlaughter againſt the diſciples of the Lord; and had letters of commiſſion from the high-prieſt in his pocket, to ſeize any of this way at Damaſcus, and bring them bound to Jeruſalem, when Chriſt met him in the way, and was ſeen by him: according to his own account, he ſhut up many of the ſaints in priſon, gave his voice againſt them when they were put to death, puniſhed them oft in every ſynagogue, compelled them to blaſpheme, and being exceeding mad againſt them, perſecuted them to ſtrange cities; ſee the Acts of the Apoſtles, ch. vii. and viii. and ix. and xxvi. This he mentions both for his own abaſement and humiliation, and to magnify the grace of God, to which he aſcribes all he was, had, and did, as in the next verſe.

Ver. 10. But by the grace of God I am what I am, &c.] As he was what he was by the grace of God in a private capacity, upon a level with other Chriſtians, being a choſen veſſel of ſalvation, not by works, nor on account of faith, or any holineſs of his, but by grace; being regenerated, called, ſanctified, juſtified, pardoned, and adopted by it; being a believer in Chriſt thro' faith, as a gift of God's grace, and having a good hope of eternal glory the ſame way; ſo he was what he was, as a miniſter of the Goſpel, as an Apoſtle, as in that high office purely by the grace of God: he was not made one by men, nor by his education, learning, and induſtry, nor thro' any merits of his own, but by the free favour and ſovereign will of God, beſtowing on him gifts and grace, by which he was qualified for Apoſtleſhip, and to preach the unſearchable riches of Chriſt: and his grace which was beſtowed on me was not in vain; by grace, in the former clauſe, is meant the good-will and free favour of God, from whence all the bleſſings of goodneſs ariſe; here the gifts of grace, particularly ſuch as qualify for the miniſtry. For what qualifies men for the preaching of the Goſpel is not human learning, nor natural parts, nor internal grace, neither ſeparately nor altogether; but peculiar gifts, which lie in an underſtanding of the ſcriptures, and the doctrines of the Goſpel, and in an aptitude to explain and teach them to the edification of others: and theſe gifts are not of nature, nor acquired by art and induſtry, but are of grace; are gifts freely beſtowed by God, and are not in vain, at leaſt ſhould not be; they are not to be wrapp'd up in a napkin, and hid in the earth; they are not to be neglected, but to be ſtirred up and improved by prayer, meditation, reading, conſtant ſtudy, and frequent uſe, as they were by the Apoſtle; and by a divine bleſſing were not without their uſe, to the good of ſouls, and the glory of God. Hence as what he was, ſo what he had, was by the grace of God, and likewiſe what he did, as follows: but I laboured more abundantly than they all; meaning, not the falſe apoſtles, who were loiterers, and not labourers, but the true apoſtles of Chriſt; not than them all put together, but than any one of them ſingly conſidered; he laboured in the Lord's vineyard, in the word and doctrine, preaching in ſeaſon, and out of ſeaſon; he travelled over a greater part of the world, preached oftner, and wrote more than any of the reſt; was the inſtrument of converting more ſouls, and he planted more churches, endured more hardſhips and ſufferings than any of the other Apoſtles. Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me; he attributes all to the grace of God, and nothing to himſelf; it was the grace of God that made him an Apoſtle of Chriſt, and preacher of the Goſpel; it was that which being beſtowed on him qualified him for it; it was that which enabled him to labour and toil, to do and ſuffer all he did, and which gave ſucceſs to all his miniſtrations. He is exceedingly careful to magnify the free favour of God, and the gifts of his grace; and means not the grace that was in him, but the grace that was without him, though with him.

Ver. 11. Therefore whether it were I or they, &c.] By whom Chriſt was ſeen firſt or laſt, we were all eye-witneſſes of him; or whether I am the leaſt, and others the chief of the Apoſtles; or whether I have laboured more abundantly than they all, this matters not: ſo we preach; we agree in our miniſtry to preach Chriſt, and him only, and with one heart and mouth aſſert, that he died, was buried, and roſe again the third day: and ſo ye believed; theſe ſeveral truths relating to the death, burial, and reſurrection of Chriſt. Thus the Apoſtle, after he had made a digreſſion upon his own character, as one of the witneſſes of Chriſt's reſurrection, returns to the ſubject he ſet out upon in the beginning of the chapter, in order to lead on to the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, which he proves by the reſurrection of Chriſt, in the following verſes. One of Stephens's copies read, ſo we believed; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion ſeems to have read; ſee 2 Cor. iv. 13.

Ver. 12. Now if Chriſt be preached that he aroſe from the dead, &c.] As he was by the Apoſtle Paul, when at Corinth, and by all the reſt of the Apoſtles elſewhere. How ſay ſome among you that there is no reſurrection of the dead? Who theſe were is not certain, whether Hymeneus and Philetus, whoſe notion this was, were come hither, or any of their diſciples; or whether they were ſome of the followers of Simon Magus and Cerinthus, who denied the reſurrection; or rather, whether they were not Jews, and of the ſect of the Sadducees, who, tho' they believed in Chriſt, retained their old principle, that there is no reſurrection of the dead, cannot be affirmed: however, it is certain, that they were ſuch as were then at Corinth, and went under the Chriſtian name; and 'tis highly probable were members of the church there; and who not only held this notion privately, but broached it publickly, ſaying, declaring, affirming, and that openly, before the whole church, what were their opinions and ſentiments: it was indeed but ſome of them, not all that were chargeable with this bad principle, which the Apoſtle aſks how, and with what face they could aſſert, when it had been preached, and ſo fully proved to them, that Chriſt was riſen from the dead; and if ſo, then it is out of queſtion that there is a reſurrection of the dead; for their notion, as it is here expreſſed, was not only that there would be no reſurrection of the dead, but that there was none, nor had been any: tho' the Apoſtle's view is alſo to prove the future reſurrection of the dead, and which is done by proving the reſurrection of Chriſt, for his reſurrection involves that of his people; for not only the ſaints roſe in, and with Chriſt, as their head repreſentatively, and which is the ſenſe of the prophecy in Hoſ. vi. 2. but becauſe he is their head, and they are members of him, therefore as ſure as he the head is riſen, ſo ſure ſhall the members riſe likewiſe; nor will Chriſt's reſurrection, in a ſenſe, be perfect, until all the members of his body are riſen: for tho' the reſurrection of Chriſt perſonally conſidered is perfect, yet not as myſtically conſidered; nor will it till all the ſaints are raiſed, of whoſe reſurrection Chriſt's is the exemplar and the pledge: their bodies will be raiſed and faſhioned like unto Chriſt's, and by virtue of union to him, and as ſure as he is riſen, for he is the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept. Beſides, as he became incarnate, obeyed, ſuffered, not for himſelf, but for his people, ſo he roſe again on their account, and that they dying might riſe alſo; which if they ſhould not, one end at leaſt of Chriſt's reſurrection would not be anſwered: add to this, that the ſame power that raiſed Chriſt from the dead, can raiſe others, even all the ſaints; ſo that if it is allowed that Chriſt is raiſed, it need not be thought incredible that all the dead ſhall be raiſed; and particularly when it is obſerved, that Chriſt is the efficient, procuring, and meritorious cauſe of the reſurrection from the dead, as well as the pattern and earneſt of it.

Ver. 13. But if there be no reſurrection of the dead, &c.] If there is no ſuch thing as a reſurrection of any, if the thing is not poſſible, if it never has been, is, or will be true in fact: then is Chriſt not riſen. The Apoſtle argues from a general, to a particular; from the general reſurrection of the dead, to the particular reſurrection of Chriſt; and from a negation of the one, to a negation of the other; for what does not agree with the whole, does not agree with the part; and what is true of the whole, is true of the part; but if the reſurrection of Chriſt is not true, many are the abſurdities that muſt follow upon it, and which the Apoſtle next enumerates.

Ver. 14. And if Chriſt be not riſen, &c.] If this is a truth, and muſt be taken as granted, as it muſt be, if there is no reſurrection at all: then is our preaching vain; falſe, empty, deluſory, unprofitable, and uſeleſs; not only that part of it which more eſpecially concerns the reſurrection of Chriſt, but even the whole of it; preaching Chriſt as the Son of God, which was the ſubject of the Apoſtle's miniſtry, and which he ſet out with, is to no purpoſe, if he is not riſen; for one conſiderable proof of his Sonſhip depends upon his reſurrection, which is the declaration of it; for who can believe him to be the Son of God, if he is detained under the power of the grave? one reaſon why he could not be held of death, and the pains and cords of it, any longer than was neceſſary, and was his pleaſure, was becauſe he was the Son of God, as well as ſurety of his people, who had paid the whole debt; ſo the preaching of his incarnation, obedience, ſufferings, and death, is of no uſe and avail, if he has not aboliſhed death, and brought life and immortality to light, firſt in himſelf, and then for his people: and your faith is alſo vain; either the grace of faith, by which they believed on Chriſt, or the doctrine of faith; or ſince this is repeated, ver. 17. the one may be meant here, and the other there. The doctrine of faith they had given their aſſent to, not only reſpecting the reſurrection of Chriſt, but any other truth relating to his perſon and office, muſt be vain and empty, and without any foundation; even that faith which is one, uniform, harmonious, and conſiſtent, which was once delivered to the ſaints; which they are to ſtand faſt in, to ſtrive, contend, and fight for, and not part with at any rate, upon any account whatever; and yet this, and the preaching and belief of it, are uſeleſs and inſignificant things, if Chriſt is not riſen; ſuch wretched abſurdities muſt follow upon the denial of that truth.

Ver. 15. Yea, and we are found falſe witneſſes of God, &c.] The Apoſtles were choſen to be witneſſes of the reſurrection of Chriſt; he appeared to them, and was ſeen by them for this purpoſe; and they were ſent into all the world, to bear their teſtimony to this truth, which they accordingly did; now if Chriſt is not riſen, they have bore a falſe teſtimony; and what greater ſcandal, or a more odious character can be fixed upon a man, than to be a falſe witneſs? but God forbid, that ſuch an imputation ſhould be faſtened upon the holy Apoſtles of Chriſt, who can't be thought to have any ſiniſter end in publiſhing ſuch a falſhood; who were ſure on account of declaring it, and abiding by it, to meet with nothing but hatred, reproach, perſecution, poverty, and death: but this is not all, nor the worſt; for if they are falſe witneſſes, they are falſe witneſſes of God; they are of his ſuborning; he ſelected them as witneſſes; he muſt put this lie into their mouths, and ſend them into the world under his authority to publiſh it; than which to ſay, nothing can be thought of more blaſphemous and execrable; and yet this muſt follow, upon a denial of the reſurrection of Chriſt: becauſe we have teſtified of God that he raiſed up Chriſt, whom he raiſed not up, if ſo be the dead riſe not; it may be read, we have teſtified againſt God, as the Vulgate Latin does; for as it muſt be bringing a falſe teſtimony from God, ſo it muſt be bearing a falſe teſtimony againſt him, to ſay that he raiſed Chriſt from the dead, when he is not riſen; which muſt be the caſe, if there is no reſurrection of the dead.

Ver. 16. For if the dead riſe not, then is not Chriſt raiſed.] This is a repetition of the argument in ver. 13. made partly to ſhew the importance of it, and partly to obſerve other abſurdities, following upon the concluſion of it.

Ver. 17. And if Chriſt be not raiſed, your faith is vain, &c.] As before in ver. 14. not only the doctrine of faith, but the grace of faith in Chriſt; even that faith, which is the faith of God's elect; the pure gift of his grace, and the operation of his power; which Chriſt is the object, author, and finiſher of; and which he prays for, that it may not fail; and to which ſalvation is ſo often promiſed in the ſacred ſcriptures; and yet is vain, than which nothing can be more abſurd: it follows, ye are yet in your ſins; in a ſtate of nature and unregeneracy, under the power and dominion of ſin, being neither regenerated nor ſanctified; for regeneration is owing to the reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead, and is a branch of the power, virtue, and efficacy of it: but if Chriſt is not riſen, there never was, is, or will be any ſuch thing as regeneration and ſanctification; things, if ever wrought by the Spirit, are done by him in virtue, and in imitation of the reſurrection, as well as the death of Chriſt: moreover, if Chriſt is not riſen, his people are under the guilt of their ſins; there is no expiation nor remiſſion of them, nor juſtification from them; for though he was delivered as a ſacrifice to atone for their offences, and his blood was ſhed to obtain the forgiveneſs of their ſins, yet he muſt be raiſed again for their juſtification, and be exalted as a prince and a ſaviour, as to give repentance, ſo remiſſion of ſins, or they will never enjoy theſe bleſſings; for notwithſtanding his ſufferings and death, if he lies under the power of the grave, they muſt remain under the power and guilt of ſin, and be liable to everlaſting puniſhment for it.

Ver. 18. Then they alſo which are fallen aſleep in Chriſt, &c.] That is, who are dead, and have died in Chriſt: death is often repreſented by a ſleep, and that more than once in this chapter; and doubtleſs with a view to the reſurrection, which will be an awaking out of it, ſince it will not be perpetual: ſome underſtand this of ſuch only who were fallen aſleep, or died martyrs for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel; as Stephen, James the brother of John, and others; but rather it deſigns all ſuch as die in Chriſt, in union with him, whether in the lively exerciſe of faith, or no; of whom it muſt be ſaid, if Chriſt is not riſen, that they are periſhed: ſoul and body; for if there's no reaſon to believe the reſurrection of the dead, there's no reaſon to believe the immortality of the ſoul, or a future ſtate, but rather that the ſoul periſhes with the body, and that there is no exiſtence after death: though ſhould it be inſiſted on that the ſoul ſurvives, and ſhall live without the body to all eternity, it muſt be in a ſtate of miſery, if Chriſt is not riſen, becauſe it muſt be in its ſins; and neither ſanctified nor juſtified, and conſequently can't be glorified; ſo that the whole may be ſaid to be periſhed; the body periſhes in the grave, the ſoul in hell; but God forbid that this ſhould be ſaid of thoſe, who have either died for Chriſt, or in him: can it be that any that are in Chriſt, that are united to him, one body and ſpirit with him, ſhould ever periſh? or thoſe that are aſleep in him be loſt? no, thoſe that ſleep in Jeſus, will God bring with him at the laſt day, who ſhall be for ever with him, and for ever happy.

Ver. 19. If in this life only we have hope in Chriſt, &c.] The object of a believer's hope, is not any creature, man, or angel; nor any creature enjoyment, as gold and ſilver; nor any creature righteouſneſs, moral, legal, and civil; nor any external privilege, or profeſſion of religion; but Chriſt alone as a ſurety, ſaviour, and redeemer; his perſon, blood, righteouſneſs, ſacrifice, and fulneſs: and what they hope for in him, are, all grace, and the ſupplies of it; the forgiveneſs of their ſins, the juſtification of their perſons, eternal life and ſalvation; grace here, and glory hereafter; for all which, they have great reaſon and encouragement to hope in him; but if their hope in him was only in this life, or whilſt this life laſts; if they had not hope in death, that they ſhould live again, and after death for the reſurrection of their bodies; or if they hoped in Chriſt only for the things of this life, or as the Arabic verſion renders it, if we from Chriſt, and by him, expect happineſs in this world only; if our hope in him is bounded with this life, and confined to the things of it, and does not reach to the things of another life, the things of eternity, the inviſible glories of another world, to be enjoyed in ſoul and body: we are of all men the moſt miſerable; which may have reſpect not only to the Apoſtles, though eminently true of them, who had little of the comforts of this life, being continually expoſed to hardſhips and perſecution for the ſake of Chriſt; were ſet forth as a ſpectacle to angels and men; were accounted the filth of the world, and the off-ſcouring of all things; and ſuffered many indignities, and great reproach and affliction, and that for aſſerting the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead; but is alſo true of all others that hope in Chriſt, and believe in him; for theſe not only deny themſelves the pleaſures, honours, and profits of this world, but are expoſed continually to the hatred, reproach, and perſecution of it; they are chaſtized by God as other men are, that they mayn't be condemned with the world, and yet they muſt be condemned, if Chriſt is not riſen; they are harraſſed and diſtreſſed by ſatan, who follows them with his temptations and ſuggeſtions, which are as ſo many fiery darts, which give them great pain and uneaſineſs, when others are unmoleſted by him; they groan under a body of ſin they carry about with them, and deſire and long to be uncloathed, that they might be cloathed upon with glory and immortality; and yet theſe very deſires and earneſt longings after a bleſſed eternity, do but add to their miſery, if there is no foundation for them, and they will at laſt be fruſtrated: theſe are the ſad concluſions, and wretched abſurdities that muſt follow, upon the denial of the reſurrection of the dead, and of Chriſt.

Ver. 20. But now is Chriſt riſen from the dead, &c.] As was before proved by ocular teſtimonies, and before preached and aſſerted, and now re-aſſumed and concluded, from the glaring contradictions, and dreadful abſurdities that follow the denial of it: and became the firſt-fruits of them that ſlept; who were already fallen aſleep; reſpecting chiefly the ſaints that died before the reſurrection of Chriſt; and if Chriſt was the firſt-fruit of them, there's no difficulty of conceiving, how he is the firſt-fruits of thoſe that die ſince. The alluſion is to the firſt-fruits of the earth, which were offered to the Lord; and eſpecially to the ſheaf of the firſt-fruits, which was waved by the prieſt before him, Deut. xxvi. 2. Lev. xxiii. 10, 11. and to which Chriſt in his reſurrection from the dead, is here compared. The firſt-fruits were what firſt ſprung out of the earth, were ſooneſt ripe, and were firſt reaped and gathered in, and then offered unto the Lord; ſo Chriſt firſt roſe from the dead, and aſcended to heaven, and preſented himſelf to God as the repreſentative of his people; for though there were others that were raiſed before him, as the widow of Sarepta's ſon by Elijah, the Shunamite's ſon by Eliſha, and the man that touched the prophet's bones when put into his grave, and Jairus's daughter, the widow of Naim's ſon, and Lazarus by Chriſt; yet as theſe did not riſe by their own power, ſo only to a mortal life: but Chriſt, as he raiſed himſelf by his own power, ſo he roſe again to an immortal life, and was the firſt that ever did ſo; he was the firſt to whom God ſhewed, and who firſt trod this path of life. The firſt-fruits were the beſt, what was then ripeſt, and ſo moſt valuable; Chriſt is the firſt, and roſe the firſt in dignity, as well as in time; he roſe as the head of the body, as the firſt-born, the beginning, that in all things he might have, and appear to have, as he ought to have, the preheminence. The firſt-fruits ſanctified the reſt of the harveſt, repreſented the whole, gave a right to the ingathering of it, and inſured it; Chriſt by lying in the grave, and riſing out of it, ſanctified it for his people, and in his reſurrection repreſented them; they roſe with him, and in him; and their reſurrection is ſecured by his, becauſe he lives, they ſhall live alſo. The firſt-fruits were only ſuch, and all this to the fruits of the earth, that were of the ſame kind with them, not to tares and chaff, to briars and thorns; ſo Chriſt in riſing from the dead, is only the firſt-fruits of the ſaints; of ſuch as are the fruits of his death, and of his grace; who have the fruits of his Spirit in them, and are filled with the fruits of righteouſneſs by him; juſt as he is the firſt-born from the dead, with reſpect to the many brethren, to whom he ſtands in the relation of a firſt-born: once more, as the alluſion is particularly to the ſheaf of the firſt-fruits, 'tis to be obſerved, that that was waved before the Lord, the morrow after the ſabbath, Lev. xxiii. 11. which as the Jews [f] interpret, was the morrow after the firſt good day, or feſtival of the paſſover; the paſſover was on the fourteenth day of the month; the feſtival, or Chagiga, on the fifteenth, and which in the year that Chriſt ſuffered, was a ſabbath-day alſo; and the morrow after that, the ſheaf of the firſt-fruits was waved; now Chriſt ſuffered on the paſſover, reſted in the grave on the ſeventh day ſabbath, and on the morrow after that, roſe from the dead, the very day that the firſt-fruits were offered to the Lord: ſo that the alluſion and phraſe, are very appoſitely uſed by the Apoſtle.

Ver. 21. For ſince by man came death, &c.] The firſt man, by ſin, was the cauſe of death; of its coming into the world, and upon all men, by which corporal death is here meant; though the firſt man alſo by ſin, brought a moral death, or a death in ſin on all his poſterity; and rendered them liable to an eternal death, which is the juſt wages of ſin; but ſince the Apoſtle is treating of the reſurrection of the body, a bodily death ſeems only intended: by man came alſo the reſurrection of the dead; ſo God, in his great goodneſs, and infinite wiſdom has thought fit, and he has ſo ordered it, that it ſhould be, that as the firſt man was the cauſe of, and brought death into the world, the ſecond man ſhould be the cauſe of the reſurrection of life. Chriſt is the meritorious and procuring cauſe of the reſurrection of his people; he by dying has aboliſhed death; and by riſing from the dead has opened the graves of the ſaints, and procured their reſurrection for them, obtained for them a right unto it, and made way for it: and he is the pattern and exemplar, according to which they will be raiſed; their vile bodies will be faſhioned, and made like to his glorious body; and whereas both in life and in death they bear the image of the firſt and earthly man, in the reſurrection they will bear the image of the ſecond and heavenly one: he alſo will be the efficient cauſe of the reſurrection; all the dead will be raiſed by his power, and at the hearing of his voice; though the ſaints only will be raiſed by him, in virtue of their union to him, and intereſt in him, being members of his body, of his fleſh, and of his bones.

Ver. 22. For as in Adam all die, &c.] The Apoſtle here ſhews who he meant in the former verſe, by the one man the cauſe of death, and by the other the author of the reſurrection of the dead, and that he intended Adam and Chriſt; all men were in Adam ſeminally, as the common parent of human nature, in ſuch ſenſe as Levi was in the loins of Abraham when Melchizedek met him, and in him paid tithes unto him; and they were all in him repreſentatively, he being the federal head of all his poſterity, and ſo a type and figure of Chriſt that was to come; and being in him, they all ſinned in him, and ſo died in him, the ſentence of death paſſed on them in him; they became ſubject to a corporal death, which has ever ſince reigned over mankind, even over infants, ſuch who have not ſinned after the ſimilitude of his tranſgreſſion; this was the doctrine of the Jewiſh church; ſee the note on Rom. v. 12. to which may be added one teſtimony more; ſays [g] one of their writers, "by the means of the firſt Adam, "נקנסה מיתה לכל, death was inflicted by way "of puniſhment on all:" even ſo in Chriſt ſhall all be made alive; not made ſpiritually alive, for Chriſt quickens whom he will; not all in this ſenſe, ſome die in their ſins; nor are all entitled to an eternal life; for tho' Chriſt has a power to give it, yet only to thoſe whom the Father has given to him; 'tis true indeed, that all that are in Chriſt, choſen in him and united to him, are made alive by him, and have the gift of eternal life thro' him; but the Apoſtle is not ſpeaking of ſuch a life, but of a corporal one: to be quickened or made alive, is with the Jews and other eaſtern nations, a phraſe of the ſame ſignification with being raiſed from the dead, and as the context here ſhews; and not to be underſtood of the reſurrection of all men, for tho' there will be a reſurrection of the juſt and unjuſt, yet the one will be the reſurrection of life, and the other the reſurrection of damnation; now it is of the former the Apoſtle here ſpeaks, and expreſſes by being made alive: and the ſenſe is, that as all that were in Adam, all that belonged to him, all his natural ſeed and poſterity, all to whom he was a fœderal head, died in him, became mortal, and ſubject to death thro' him; ſo all that are in Chriſt, that belong to him, who are his ſpiritual ſeed and offspring, to whom he is a covenant-head, and repreſentative, ſhall be raiſed to an immortal life by him; or as all the elect of God died in Adam, ſo ſhall they all be quickened, or raiſed to life in and by Chriſt.

[g] Baal Hatturim in Deut. iii. 26.

Ver. 23. But every man in his own order, &c.] Not of time, as if the ſaints that lived in the firſt age of the world ſhould riſe firſt, and then thoſe of the next, and ſo on to the end of the world; nor of dignity, as that martyrs ſhould riſe firſt in the order of martyrs, and preachers of the word in the order of preachers, and private chriſtians in the order or rank of private chriſtians; or of age, as the elder firſt, and then the younger; or of ſtate and condition, as married perſons in the order of married perſons, and virgins in the order of virgins; theſe are all foreign from the ſenſe of the words; the order regarded is that of head and members, the firſt-fruits and the harveſt. There ſeems to be an alluſion to the ranging and marſhalling of the Iſraelites, every one by his own ſtandard; which both the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan render, על טקסיה, by or according to his own order; and ſo the Septuagint κατα ταγμα, the word here uſed; and the ſenſe is, that every man ſhall be raiſed from the dead, according to the head under which he is ranged and marſhalled. Chriſt the head is riſen firſt; next all thoſe that are under him, as an head, will riſe from the dead; the dead in Chriſt will riſe firſt; and then a thouſand years after that, thoſe who are only in their natural head, by whom death came to them, and have lived and died in a natural eſtate, will riſe laſt; but as the Apoſtle is only upon the reſurrection of the ſaints, he carries the account and obſerves the order no further than as it concerns Chriſt and his people: Chriſt the firſt-fruits; he roſe firſt in order of time, dignity, cauſality and influence; ſee the note on ver. 20. afterwards they that are Chriſts; not immediately after; for now ſeventeen hundred years are elapſed ſince the reſurrection of Chriſt, and yet the ſaints are not raiſed; and how many more years are to run out before that, is not to be known; but as there was an interval between the firſt-fruits, and the ingathering of the harveſt; ſo there is a conſiderable ſpace of time between the reſurrection of Chriſt as the firſt-fruits, and the reſurrection of his people, which will be the harveſt; and that will be at the end of the world, according to Matt. xiii. 39. the perſons who ſhall riſe firſt and next after Chriſt, are they that are his; who were choſen in him before the foundation of the world, and were given to him by his Father as his ſpouſe, his children, his ſheep, his portion, and his jewels; who were purchaſed and redeemed by his blood, are called by his grace and regenerated by his Spirit, and who give up themſelves to him, and are poſſeſſed by him: and the intereſt that Chriſt has in them here expreſſed, carries in it a ſtrong argument of their reſurrection; which may be concluded from their election in Chriſt, which can never be made void; from the gift of their whole perſons to Chriſt by his Father, with this declaration of his will that he ſhould loſe nothing of them, but raiſe it up at the laſt day; from his redemption of their bodies as well as their ſouls; from the union of both unto him; and from the ſanctification of both, and his Spirit dwelling in their mortal bodies as well as in their ſouls: the time when they will be raiſed by Chriſt is, at his coming; at his ſecond and perſonal coming at the laſt day; then the dead in Chriſt will riſe firſt, and immediately; and he will judge the quick and dead, thoſe that will be found alive, and thoſe that will be then raiſed from the dead: when this will be no man knows; yet nothing is more certain, than that Chriſt will come a ſecond time; and his coming will be ſpeedy and ſudden; it will be glorious and illuſtrious, and to the joy and ſalvation of his people; ſince their bodies will then be raiſed and re-united to their ſouls, when they, ſoul and body, ſhall be for ever with the Lord. The Vulgate Latin reads the words thus, they that are Chriſt's, who have believed in his coming; both in his firſt and ſecond coming; but there is nothing in the Greek text to encourage and ſupport ſuch a verſion and ſenſe.

Ver. 24. Then cometh the end, &c.] Or after that the end, the end of all things; either at the cloſe of the thouſand years, when the wicked dead will be raiſed laſt, and the final ſtate of all men will openly take place; the end of the righteous will be peace and everlaſting joy, and an uninterrupted communion with Chriſt, and enjoyment of life eternal, of the ultimate glory, and conſummate happineſs in ſoul and body; and the end of the wicked will be deſtruction and death, everlaſting puniſhment in hell, where will be weeping, wailing, and gnaſhing of teeth for evermore: or at the beginning of the thouſand years; immediately upon Chriſt's ſecond and perſonal coming, will be the end of the world; the heavens ſhall paſs away, the elements ſhall melt, and the earth and all its works be burnt up; tho' theſe ſhall not be annihilated or deſtroyed, as to their being and ſubſtance, but only as to their preſent form and qualities; they ſhall be renewed, out of them ſhall ariſe new heavens, and a new earth, whereon righteous perſons, and only righteous perſons will dwell; even all the righteous that will be raiſed at Chriſt's coming, or ſhall then be found alive, where they ſhall reign with him during the thouſand years; and then there will be an end of preaching the Goſpel, and of adminiſtring ordinances, there being no more elect ſouls to be gathered in; nor will ſaints ſtand in need of edification and comfort from ſuch means; then will alſo be the end, the accompliſhment of all the purpoſes, promiſes and prophecies of God, relating to the ſtate and condition of his church, and people in all the periods of time, and to their compleat glory and happineſs; the number of God's elect in regeneration, ſanctification, and glorification, will now be compleat, the ſaints will be all perfected, and the church be as a bride prepared and adorned for her huſband; and their ſalvation in ſoul and body conſummate, there will be nothing wanting; then that which is perfect will be come, their bodies being raiſed and re-united to their ſouls, and both with the Lord: ſo the word end denotes the accompliſhment, completion and perfection of things; ſee Luke xxii. 37. Rom. x. 4. Moreover, there will now be an end of all ſin and ſorrow to the ſaints; of all troubles and afflictions, inward or outward, and of death itſelf; and alſo of the kingdom of Chriſt, in its preſent form and manner of adminiſtration: the kingdom or church of Chriſt will not conſiſt then of nominal and real chriſtians, of fooliſh and wiſe virgins, hypocrites and ſaints, but only of the latter; nor will it be governed by ſuch laws and ordinances as now; nor will theſe be in the hands of ſuch officers, as paſtors and teachers, as at preſent, who are appointed to explain, enforce and execute them: and this end of all things at the coming of Chriſt, will be when he ſhall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father; not the kingdom of nature, which he has as the Son of God, as God equal with the Father, in right of nature, and upon the foot of creation, all being made by him; and which kingdom reaches to all creatures, angels and men; this he did not receive from his Father, nor is he in it ſubordinate to him, but rules and works conjunctly with him in it; nor is he accountable to him in the adminiſtration of it; nor will he ever deliver it up to him: nor the kingdom of glory, which was prepared for the ſaints from the foundation of the world, is freely given to them by their Father, which they are called unto, and have a meetneſs for it, and a right unto it; this Chriſt has in his hands for them, and will not deliver it up to his Father, but introduce the heirs of it into it, quickly upon his coming; but the mediatorial kingdom is here meant, the kingdom of ſaints, over which Chriſt is appointed and ſet as king; even the whole church and general aſſembly of the firſt-born, written in heaven. Theſe were all given to Chriſt, put into his hands, and made his care and charge by his Father; and he undertook to preſerve, protect, and ſave them; and had as mediator, all power in heaven and in earth, and every thing ſubſervient to ſupport his kingdom and intereſt as ſuch, given him; and he has been from the beginning of the world ruling in the midſt of his enemies, ſubduing the people under him, and cauſing his people in the day of his power to be willing to ſerve him; writing his laws in their hearts, putting his Spirit within them, to cauſe them to walk in his ſtatutes and keep his judgments; ſaving them out of the hands of their enemies, protecting and keeping them in ſafety, and providing every good thing for them; and continually delivering one or another of them from the power of darkneſs, and tranſlating them into his own kingdom: and now having compleated the number of them, in whoſe hearts he has reigned by his Spirit and grace, he will deliver them up to the Father from whom he received them; even every one of them, all the children he gave unto him, and all of them; their bodies as well as their ſouls, being now raiſed from the dead, as it was his Father's declared will they ſhould be, when he gave them to him; and they will be delivered up and preſented by him to his Father, perfectly holy, entirely faultleſs, and without ſpot or wrinkle, or any ſuch thing: and now this does not ſuppoſe that he will then ceaſe to reign over his church and people; for as the Father is the everlaſting king, and reigned in and over the church, whilſt this kingdom was in the hands of Chriſt, ſo Chriſt will continue to reign over it, when he ſhall have delivered it to the Father; he will no more ceaſe to reign then, than the Father does, during the preſent adminiſtration of the government of the church; Chriſt will then be ſo far from ceaſing to reign, that he will reign more viſibly and glorioſly than ever, tho' in a different manner to what he does now; now he rules over his people in the midſt of his enemies, but then he will rule in the midſt of his ſaints; now he reigns in their hearts by his Spirit, and thro' the uſe of the word and ordinances, but then he will reign in perſon among them, diſplaying the glory of his majeſty, without the uſe of ſuch means, ſigns and ſymbols. Nor does this imply any inferiority in Chriſt, as God, to the Father; ſince this is to be underſtood of him as mediator, who as ſuch is the Father's ſervant, and a righteous and faithful one he is, who will give a good account of the perſons committed to his care and government, and of his adminiſtration; and in which ſenſe it will be allowed the Father is greater than he; but this no ways militates againſt his proper deity, and equality with the Father. The Ethiopic verſion, contrary to all copies and other verſions, read, when God the Father ſhall have delivered up his own kingdom. The Jews [h] ſpeak of “ten kings that have ruled, from one end of the world to another; the firſt king is the holy and bleſſed God, the ſecond Nimrod, the third Joſeph, the fourth Solomon, the fifth Ahab, the ſixth Nebuchadnezzar, the ſeventh Cyrus, the eighth Alexander the Macedonian, the ninth will be the king Meſſiah, according to Dan. ii. 35. and of the tenth king they ſay, then ſhall the kingdom return to its author; or to him that was the firſt king, and he ſhall be the laſt; as is ſaid, Iſ. xliv. 6. Zech. xiv. 9.” and this will be, when he ſhall have put down all rule, and all authority and power; which ſince it is expreſſed in ſuch univerſal terms, may very well be thought to reach to, and include all ſort of rule, authority and power whatever; when this time and ſtate of things take place, all civil rule, authority, and power will ceaſe; even that which is now of God, and to which we are to be ſubject for the Lord's ſake, and for conſcience ſake; and which is now encouraged and ſupported by Chriſt, by whom kings reign, and princes decree juſtice; this will be pulled down and utterly deſtroyed by him, the ſtone caſt out of the mountain without hands; when the kingdom and the greatneſs of it will be given to him and to his ſaints; when the kings and princes of the earth will be no more, have no more rule and authority among men, but be upon a level with the meaneſt peaſants, and ſhall be brought to the tribunal of Chriſt, and be judged by him: then alſo will all eccleſiaſtical rule, authority, and power be laid aſide; there will be no more Apoſtles, prophets, evangeliſts, nor biſhops, elders, paſtors, and teachers; who are now ſet over the churches in the Lord, to rule them according to the laws of Chriſt, by miniſtring the word faithfully, and adminiſtring the ordinances truly; and to whom when they rule well, ſubjection and honour are due; but all this will be no more, when the end comes, and the kingdom is delivered to the Father: nor will there be any more domeſtic, or family rule and government, as of the huſband over the wife, the parent over the child, or the maſter over the ſervant; all will be upon an equal foot: nor any angelical authority and power, which angels may now exerciſe under God, over kingdoms, provinces, ſtates, or particular perſons: and eſpecially all diabolical rule, authority, and power will be aboliſhed, which ſatan has uſurped, or has been given him by men, as the God of this world; he the prince of the world, was caſt out thro' Chriſt's death, and by the preaching of the Goſpel in the Gentile world; his principalities and powers were then ſpoiled and triumphed over; tho' he has ſtill retained ſome ſort and ſhew of government, but then there will not be the leaſt appearance of any; during the thouſand years he will be caſt into and ſhut up in the bottomleſs pit, and not ſuffered to go out and deceive the nations any more; and at the end thereof, tho' he will make one and his laſt onſet, on the city of the ſaints, it will be fruitleſs, and he and all his, ſhall be caſt into the lake of fire and brimſtone, and there lie in torment for ever and ever: not the perſons of theſe ſeveral powers ſhall be deſtroyed, but they ſhall be diveſted of the power and authority which they now have, either by right or uſurpation.

[h] Pirke Eliezer, c. 11.

Ver. 25. For he muſt reign, &c.] That is, Chriſt muſt reign; he is ſet as king over God's holy hill of Zion; he is king of ſaints; he is made and declared to be both Lord and Chriſt; he is exalted at the right hand of God as a prince, where he ſits and rules and reigns; and his ſitting at God's right hand is here explained by his reigning, for reference is had to Pſal. cx. 1. he muſt reign becauſe it is the unalterable will, and unchangeable decree and purpoſe of God, that he ſhould reign; and becauſe he has promiſed it, and propheſied of it; and becauſe the ſtate and condition of his people require it, who otherwiſe could not be ſaved, nor dwell ſafely: and ſo he muſt and will, till he hath put all enemies under his feet; and made them his footſtool; meaning either all the elect of God, who in a ſtate of nature are enemies in their minds, by wicked works to himſelf and to his Father; whom he conquers by his grace, ſubdues their rebellious wills, of enemies makes them friends, brings them to his feet, and to a ſubjection to his ſceptre, to his Goſpel and ordinances; and he muſt reign till he has brought every elect ſoul into ſuch an obedience to himſelf: or rather antichriſt and his followers, and all wicked and ungodly men, with ſatan and his angels; who will be deſtroyed with the breath of his mouth, and the brightneſs of his coming; and will be caſt down by him into hell, and there be ever objects of his wrath and vengeance: and till all this is done he muſt reign; not that he ſhall ceaſe to reign afterwards, but that he ſhall reign notwithſtanding theſe enemies of his and his people, who would not have him to reign over them; and will reign until they are ſubdued or deſtroyed; and when they are entirely vanquiſhed and overcome, who can doubt of his reigning then? or what, or who will there be to hinder it? The Alexandrian copy, and others read, his enemies; and ſo do the Syriac and Ethiopic verſions.

Ver. 26. The laſt enemy that ſhall be deſtroyed, is death.] Not eternal death; for tho' that is aboliſhed by Chriſt with reſpect to his own people, who ſhall never be hurt by it, and over whom it ſhall have no power; yet the wicked will always be ſubject to it, and under the dominion of it: but a corporal one is here meant; which is an enemy, the fruit, effect and wages of ſin; the penalty and curſe of the law; is contrary to human nature, and deſtructive of the work of God's hands: it is indeed, thro' the blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice of Chriſt, become the friend of his people; it is diſarmed of its ſting, and ceaſes to be a penal evil; it is the ſaints paſſage to glory, what frees them from the troubles of this world, and is their way to the joys of another; but yet in itſelf is formidable to nature, and diſagreeable to it: and it is the laſt enemy; it is ſo both in its riſe and duration; it appeared as an enemy laſt; ſatan was the firſt enemy of mankind, who attacked, tempted, and ruined the firſt parents of human nature, and all their poſterity in them; and by this means, ſin the next enemy came into the world of men; and laſt of all death, with its numerous train of calamities, either going before, attending, or following of it: and as it was the laſt enemy that came into the world, tis the laſt that will go out of it; for when the ſaints are rid of ſatan, and clear of ſin, they will remain in the grave under the power of a corporal death till the reſurrection, and then that will be deſtroyed: for the ſaints will be raiſed to an immortal life, never to die more, and to an enjoyment of everlaſting life, in the utmoſt glory and happineſs; and tho' the wicked when they riſe, they will riſe to damnation, to ſhame and contempt, yet their worm will never die, nor their fire be quenched; they will always live, tho' in torment, there will be no more corporal death, neither among the righteous nor the wicked; it will be utterly aboliſhed: and thus the Apoſtle, tho' he ſeems to digreſs from his ſubject a while, by relating the ſeveral things which will either immediately or quickly follow the ſecond coming of Chriſt; yet at the ſame time has it in view, and proves the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, which muſt needs be, or death cannot be ſaid to be deſtroyed, and by degrees returns to his ſubject again.

Ver. 27. For he hath put all things under his feet, &c.] This is a reaſon proving that all enemies and death itſelf, ſhall be put under the feet of Chriſt, and is taken out of Pſal. viii. 6. which is ſpoken of one that is ſtiled man, and the Son of man; and is to be underſtood not of Adam in a ſtate of innocence; for the word there uſed ſignifies a frail mortal man, which he then was not, nor could he be called the Son of man; and tho' the earth was ſubdued and ſubject to him, and he had dominion over the fiſh of the ſea, the fowls of the air, and every living thing that moveth on the earth, yet all creatures were not ſubject to him in this large ſenſe, in which it is here and elſewhere explained by the Apoſtle; and much leſs of man in his fallen ſtate, who inſtead of having all things under his feet, is become like the beaſts that periſh; many of them are unſubdued to him, and he is even in fear of them, and he himſelf is ſubject to corruption and vanity: but of the man Chriſt Jeſus, who took and bore all the ſinleſs infirmities of human nature; is often called the Son of man; of whom God was mindful, and whom he viſited in his ſtate of humiliation, at the time of his death, reſurrection and exaltation; who was made thro' ſufferings of death a little lower, or a little while lower than the angels, but now crowned with glory and honour; in whoſe days God ordained ſtrength and praiſe out of the mouths of babes and ſucklings, to the confuſion of his enemies; and has put all things under his feet, which may include all things animate and inanimate, the whole creation and univerſe of things, the world and its fulneſs, the earth and all that is therein, the beaſts of the foreſt, and the cattle of a thouſand hills; he is heir of the world, and has a right to it, and to diſpoſe of it, not merely as the creator, but as mediator; tis put in ſubjection to him to make uſe of, and what is in it to ſubſerve his mediatorial kingdom and glory; and when his ends are anſwered by it, the earth and all that is therein ſhall be burnt up, and a new earth ariſe out of it, in which Chriſt and his people will dwell: the air and all that is therein are under him; the fowls of it are at his diſpoſe; he it was that rained feathered fowls as the ſand of the ſea, about the camp of the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs, and commanded the ravens to feed Elijah in diſtreſs; and who holds the winds in his fiſt, lets them looſe, calls them in, and commands them at pleaſure; as he alſo does the ſea, and the boiſterous waves of it, and has dominion over the fiſhes in it; one of thoſe ſupplied him with money, to pay his tribute; and multitudes of them more than once, were gathered together, and taken up by his order and direction, and at the laſt day, the ſea at his command will give up the dead that are in it; yea, this may extend to all rational creatures, angels and men, friends or foes: good angels, principalities and powers are ſubject to him, as appears by their attendance on him, at his incarnation, aſcenſion and ſecond coming; by their miniſtration to him in the wilderneſs, and in the garden; by their employment under him, for the good of the heirs of ſalvation; by their dependance on him, as their creator and head, and by their adoration of him as their Lord and God. Evil angels, the devils, are alſo put under his feet, as is evident from his overcoming ſatan, and baffling all his temptations; by his diſpoſſeſſing the devils out of the bodies of men, and giving his diſciples alſo power over them; by his ſpoiling them at death, and triumphing over them in his aſcenſion; by delivering his people out of their hands, and power, in converſion; and by his binding of ſatan during the thouſand years, and by caſting him and his angels into everlaſting fire prepared for them. Elect men are made ſubject to him, by the power of his grace upon them; and yet their ſubjection to him, to his Goſpel-ordinances, and the ſceptre of his kingdom, is voluntary and from their hearts; it proceeds from a principle of love to him; and is univerſal, being a regard unto, and a compliance with all his precepts: and evil men are alſo under his dominion and controul; he rules them with a rod of iron; he diſappoints their counſels, reſtrains their wrath, over-rules their evil deſigns and actions againſt his people for good; and will one day gather them all before him, paſs the righteous ſentence on them, and ſend them into everlaſting puniſhment. Moreover, this may reach to every thing that is for the glory of Chriſt as mediator, and for the good of his church, and to every enemy of his or theirs, as the world, ſin, ſatan, and the laſt enemy death; to prove the ſubjection of all which to Chriſt, this teſtimony is produced; and reſpects Chriſt as mediator, and the Father's delivering all things into his hands, and giving him all power in heaven and in earth, and rule over all creatures and things: but when he ſaith all things are put under him, it is manifeſt that he is excepted, which did put all things under him; that is, when David, or the holy Spirit by him, ſaid the above words, in Pſal. viii. 6. nothing is more clear and evident, than that God the Father who made all things ſubject to Chriſt as mediator, is himſelf unſubjected to him; ſince his power as ſuch muſt be greater than his: this exception is made to ſecure the government, power, and honour of the Father; for tho' he has made his firſt-born higher than the kings of the earth, yet not higher than himſelf; and tho' he has ſet him his king over his holy hill of Zion, yet not over himſelf; and tho' it is his will that all men ſhould honour the Son, as they honour the Father, yet not above him, or more than he; nor has he quitted the government, either in the world or in the church, by ſubjecting all things to Chriſt: and this exception is alſo made to confirm the univerſal power and empire of Chriſt, for an exception to a general rule does but the more eſtabliſh it; and ſince the Father is only excepted, it is a clear caſe, that he has left nothing that is not put under him; ſee Heb. ii. 8. but it muſt be obſerved, that tho' the holy Spirit is not mentioned, yet he is equally excepted; ſince he is the one God with the Father, and was jointly concerned in the miſſion, unction, and inſtallation of Chriſt, as mediator; nor can he be reckoned among the all things put in ſubjection to Chriſt, for they regard only creatures, and many of theſe enemies, with neither of which the Spirit of God can be numbered; and tho' the gifts and graces of the Spirit are put into Chriſt's hands, and are at his diſpoſe, yet the perſon of the Spirit can never be thought to be put under his feet.

Ver. 28. And when all things ſhall be ſubdued unto him, &c.] For all things as yet are not put under him in fact; tho' in right God the Father has given to him an authoritative power over all things, and a right to diſpoſe of them at his pleaſure; but all things are not actually and in their full extent ſubject to him, yet they will be when the laſt enemy is deſtroyed: and then ſhall the Son alſo himſelf, be ſubject unto him that put all things under him; which muſt be interpreted and underſtood with great care and caution; not in the Sabellian ſenſe, of refunding of the characters of the ſon, and ſo of the Father unto God; when they ſuppoſe theſe characters which they imagine to be merely nominal, bare names, will be no more, and God ſhall be all; but as the Father will always remain a Father, ſo the Son will remain a Son; for, as the Son of the higheſt, he will reign over his people for ever, and he the Son, as a prieſt, is conſecrated for evermore: nor in the Eutychian ſenſe, of the change of the human nature into the divine, in which they fancy it will be ſwallowed up, and God will be all; but Chriſt will always continue as a man; he went up to heaven as ſuch, and he will return as a man, and be viſible to all in the human nature, and in that be the object of the beatifical viſion of the ſaints to all eternity: nor in the Arrian ſenſe, according to the divine nature, as if he was in that inferior to the Father, when he is equal with him, has all the perfections he has, and the whole fulneſs of the Godhead dwelling in him; it is much better and ſafer to underſtand it as it commonly is of him, as man; tho' in this ſenſe, he was always ſubject to his Father, ever ſince he was incarnate, whereas this ſeems to reſpect ſomething peculiar at this time. Others therefore think, that the church, the myſtical body of Chriſt is here meant, which in all its members, and theſe both in ſoul and body, will be preſented and delivered up to God; but the words are ſpoken of him under whom all things are put, which is not true of the church; and tho' that is ſometimes called Chriſt, yet never the Son; and beſides, the church has been always ſubject to God, tho' indeed, it will not be in all its members, and in every reſpect ſubject until this time: it is beſt therefore to underſtand it of the Son's giving up the account of his mediatorial kingdom, and concerns to his Father; when it will appear that he has in the whole of his conduct and adminiſtration been ſubject to him; that he has in all things acted in his name, done all by his power, and to his honour and glory; and now having accompliſhed all he undertook and was entruſted with, gives in his account, delivers up his charge, and reſigns his office; all which will be plain proofs of his ſubjection: when I ſay he will reſign or lay aſide his office as mediator, my meaning is not that he will ceaſe to be God-man and mediator; but that he will ceaſe to adminiſter that office as under God, in the manner he now does; he will be the prophet of the church, but he will not teach by his Spirit, and word, and ordinances as now, but will himſelf be the immediate light of the ſaints; he will be a prieſt for ever, the virtue of his ſacrifice and interceſſion will always remain, but he will not plead and intercede as he now does; he will alſo reign for ever over and among his ſaints, but his kingdom will not be a vicarious one, or adminiſtred as it now is; nor be only in his hands as mediator, but with God, Father, Son, and Spirit: that God may be all in all; for by God is not meant the Father perſonally, but God eſſentially conſidered, Father, Son, and Spirit, who are the one true and living God; to whom all the ſaints will have immediate acceſs, in whoſe preſence they will be, and with whom they ſhall have uninterrupted fellowſhip, without the uſe of ſuch mediums, they now enjoy: all the three divine perſons, will have equal power and government in and over all the ſaints; they will ſit upon one and the ſame throne; there will be no more acting by a delegated power, or a derived authority: God will be all things to all his ſaints, immediately without the uſe of means; he will be that to their bodies, as meat and clothes are, without the uſe of them; and all light, glory, and happineſs to their ſouls, without the uſe of ordinances, or any means; he will then be all perfection and bliſs, to all the elect, and in them all, which he now is not; ſome are dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, and under the power of ſatan; the number of them in converſion is not yet compleated; and of thoſe that are called many are in a ſtate of imperfection, and have fleſh as well as Spirit in them; and of thoſe who are fallen aſleep in Chriſt, tho' their ſeparate ſpirits are happy with him, yet their bodies lie in the grave, and under the power of corruption and death; but then all being called by grace, and all being raiſed, and glorified in ſoul and body, God will be all in all: this phraſe expreſſes both the perfect government of God, Father, Son, and Spirit, over the ſaints to all eternity, and their perfect happineſs in ſoul and body, the glory of all which will be aſcribed to God; and it will be then ſeen that all that the Father has done in election, in the council and covenant of peace, were all to the glory of his grace; and that all that the Son has done in the ſalvation of his people, is all to the glory of the divine perfections; and that all that the Spirit of God has wrought in the ſaints, and all that they have done under his grace and influence, are all to the praiſe and glory of God, which will in the moſt perfect manner be given to the eternal three in one. The Jews have ſome expreſſions ſomewhat like this, as when they ſay [i] of God, "things future and things that are "paſt, are together with thee; what is from ever"laſting and to everlaſting, or from the beginning "of the world to the end of it, theſe are all of "them in thee, and thou art in them all." So כל, all, is with the Cabaliſtic doctors [k], the name of the Lord. And he is ſo called becauſe all things are in him; Jovis omnia plena.

Ver. 29. Elſe what ſhall they do which are baptized for the dead, &c.] The Apoſtle here returns to his ſubject, and makes uſe of new arguments to prove the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, and reaſons for it from the baptiſm of ſome perſons; but what is his ſenſe, is not eaſy to be underſtood, or what rite and cuſtom, or thing, or action he refers to; which muſt be either Jewiſh baptiſm, or chriſtian baptiſm literally taken, or baptiſm in a figurative and metaphorical ſenſe. Some think, that he refers to ſome one or other of the divers baptiſms of the Jews; ſee Heb. ix. 10. and particularly to the purification of ſuch who had touched a dead body, which was done both by the aſhes of the red heifer burnt, and by bathing himſelf in water; and which the Jews ſay [l], intimated לתחיית המתים, the reſurrection of the dead; wherefore ſuch a rite was needleſs, if there is no reſurrection; to ſtrengthen this ſenſe, a paſſage in Eccleſiaſticus, chap. xxxiv. 25. is produced βαπτιζομενος απο νεκρου, he that waſheth himſelf after the touching of a dead body, if he touch it again, what availeth his waſhing? but the phraſe there uſed is different; tis not ſaid, he that baptizeth or waſheth himſelf for the dead, but from the dead, to cleanſe himſelf from pollution received by the touch of a dead body: tis alſo obſerved, that the Jews, as well as other nations, have uſed various rites and ceremonies about their dead, and among the reſt, the waſhing of dead bodies before interment; ſee 2 Acts ix. 37. and this by ſome is thought to be what is here referred to; and the reaſoning is, if there is no reſurrection of the dead, why all this care of a dead body? why this waſhing of it? it may as well be put into the earth as it is, ſince it will riſe no more; but how this can be called a baptiſm for the dead, I ſee not: rather therefore 6 chriſtian baptiſm, or the ordinance of water baptiſm is here reſpected; and with regard to this, interpreters go different ways: ſome think the Apoſtle has in view, a cuſtom of ſome, who when their friends died without baptiſm, uſed to be baptized 1 in their room; this is ſaid to be practiſed by the Marcionites in Tertullian's time, and by the Cerinthians in the times of the Apoſtle John; but it does not appear to have been in uſe in the times of the Apoſtle Paul; and beſides, if it had been, as it was a vain and ſuperſtitious one, he would never have mentioned it without a cenſure, and much leſs have argued from it; nor would his argument be of any weight, ſince it might be retorted, that whereas ſuch perſons were miſtaken in uſing ſuch a practice, they might be alſo in the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead: others are of opinion that ſuch 2 perſons are intended, called Clinicks, who deferred their baptiſm till they came upon their death-beds, and then had it adminiſtred to them; but as this practice was not in being in the Apoſtle's time, and was far from being a laudable one; and tho' the perſons to whom it was adminiſtred were upon the point of death, and nearer the dead than the living, and were as good as dead, and might be intended by them, for their advantage, when dead and not living; yet it muſt be a great force and ſtrain on words and things, to reckon this a being baptized for the dead: others would have the words rendered 3, over the dead; and ſuppoſe that reference is had to the chriſtians that had their baptiſteries in their places of burial, and by being baptized here, teſtified their faith and hope of the reſurrection of the dead; but this was rather a being baptized among the dead, than over them, or for them; and moreover it is not certain, that they did make uſe of ſuch places to baptize in; to which may be added, that the primitive chriſtians had not ſo early burying-grounds of their own: others would have the meaning to 4 be, that they were baptized for their dead works, their ſins, to waſh them away; but this baptiſm does not of itſelf, and no otherwiſe than by leading the faith of perſons to the blood of Chriſt, which alone cleanſes from ſin, original and actual; nor is this appoſite to the Apoſtle's argument. Others 5 imagine, that he intends ſuch as were baptized, and added to the church, and ſo filled up the places of them that were dead; but the reaſon from hence proving the reſurrection of the dead, is not very obvious: thoſe ſeem to be nearer the truth of the matter, who ſuppoſe that the Apoſtle has reſpect to the original practice of making a confeſſion of faith before baptiſm, and among the reſt of the articles of it, the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, upon the belief of which being baptized, they might be ſaid to be baptized for the dead; that is, for, or upon, or in the faith and profeſſion of the reſurrection of the dead, and therefore muſt either hold this doctrine or renounce their baptiſm adminiſtered upon it; to which may be added another ſenſe of the words, which is, that baptiſm performed by immerſion, as it was univerſally in thoſe early times, was a lively emblem and repreſentation of the reſurrection of Chriſt from the dead, and alſo both of the ſpiritual and corporal reſurrection of the ſaints. Now if there is no reſurrection, why is ſuch a ſymbol uſed? tis uſeleſs and inſignificant; I ſee nothing of moment to be objected to theſe two laſt ſenſes, which may be eaſily put together, but this; that the Apoſtle ſeems to point out ſomething that was done or endured by ſome chriſtians only; whereas baptiſm upon a profeſſion of faith in Chriſt, and the reſurrection from the dead, and performed by immerſion, as an emblem of it was common to all; and therefore he would rather have ſaid, what ſhall we do, or we all do, who are baptized for the dead? I am therefore rather inclined to think that baptiſm is uſed here in a figurative and metaphorical ſenſe, for afflictions, ſufferings and martyrdom, as in Matt. xx. 22, 23. and it was for the belief, profeſſion, and preaching of the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead, both of Chriſt and of the ſaints, that the Apoſtles and followers of Chriſt endured ſo much as they did; the firſt inſtance of perſecution after our Lord's aſcenſion was on this account. The Apoſtles Peter and John, were laid hold on and put in priſon for preaching this doctrine; the reproach and inſult the Apoſtle Paul met with at Athens were by reaſon of it; and it was for this that he was called in queſtion and accuſed of the Jews; nor was there any one doctrine of chriſtianity more hateful and contemptible among the heathens than this was. Now the Apoſtle's argument ſtands thus, what is, or will become of thoſe perſons who have been as it were baptized or overwhelmed in afflictions and ſufferings, who have endured ſo many and ſuch great injuries and indignities, and have even loſt their lives for aſſerting this doctrine, if the dead riſe not at all? how ſadly miſtaken muſt ſuch have been? why are they then baptized for the dead? how imprudently have they acted? and what a weak and fooliſh part do they alſo act, who continue to follow them? in what a ſilly manner do they expoſe themſelves to danger, and throw away their lives, if this doctrine is not true? which ſenſe is confirmed by what follows: the Alexandrian copy and ſome others, read, for them; and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion; and the Ethiopic in both clauſes reads, why do they baptize?

Ver. 30. And why ſtand we in jeopardy every hour?] Not only they that have ſuffered martyrdom for the faith of Chriſt, and for this article of it, have acted very injudiciouſly and indiſcreetly; but we alſo who are on the ſpot, whether miniſters or private chriſtians, muſt be highly blame-worthy, who continually expoſe ourſelves to dangers, and are for Chriſt's ſake killed all the day along, are every moment liable to innumerable injuries, tortures and death; who in his ſenſes would act ſuch a part, if there is no reſurrection of the dead? ſuch, as they muſt be of all men the moſt miſerable, ſo of all men the moſt ſtupid.

Ver. 31. I proteſt by your rejoicing, &c.] Some copies read, our rejoicing; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion, which ſeems moſt natural and eaſy; ſince it follows, which I have in Chriſt Jeſus our Lord; who in him could rejoice and glory in afflictions and ſufferings, which he endured as a preacher of the Goſpel for his ſake; and which being certain and evident, and what might be depended upon, he makes a proteſtation by it, ſaying, I die daily; which is to be underſtood, not in a ſpiritual ſenſe of dying unto ſin; he was dead unto ſin, as to its damning power, thro' the death of Chriſt, and as to its governing power, thro' the Spirit and grace of Chriſt, but ſtill it was living and dwelling in him; but in a corporal ſenſe: he inſtances in himſelf in particular, who was one that was in jeopardy or danger of his life every hour; he always bore in his body the dying of the Lord Jeſus, and was continually delivered to death for Jeſus ſake; death was always working in him, he expected it every day, and was ready for it; he did not count his life dear unto himſelf, but was very willing to lay it down for the ſake of Chriſt and his Goſpel; which he would never have done, if he had not good reaſon to believe the doctrine of the reſurrection of the dead.

Ver. 32. If after the manner of men, I have fought with beaſts at Epheſus, &c.] This is one of the particulars of the jeopardy and danger of life he had been in: ſome underſtand this in a figurative ſenſe, and think that by beaſts are meant, ſatan the roaring lion, and his principalities and powers; or men of ſavage diſpoſitions, perſecuting principles, and cruel practices; as Herod is called a fox, by Chriſt, and Nero a lion, by the Apoſtle; and ſuppoſe his fighting with them at Epheſus, deſigns his diſputations with the hardened and unbelieving Jews, his concern with the exorciſts, the ſeven ſons of Sceva, and the troubles he met with thro' Demetrius the ſilver-ſmith, and others of the ſame craft; the reaſon of ſuch an interpretation is, becauſe Luke makes no mention of any thing of this kind, that befel the Apoſtle in his hiſtory of the Acts of the Apoſtles: but to this it may be replied, that Luke does not relate every thing that befel him and the reſt; and his omiſſion of this, is no ſufficient argument againſt it; beſides, a literal ſenſe is not to be departed from, unleſs there is a neceſſity for it; and eſpecially when it is ſuitable to the context, and to the thread and reaſoning of the diſcourſe, as it is certainly here; the literal ſenſe beſt agrees with the Apoſtle's argument. There were two ſorts of uſages among the Romans in their theatres; ſometimes they caſt men naked to the wild beaſts, to be devoured by them, as wicked ſervants, deadly enemies and the vileſt of men[m]; and ſo the Syriac verſion renders the words here, if as among men, אשתדית לחיותא, I am caſt to the beaſts; and ſeems to repreſent it as a ſuppoſed caſe, and not as matter of fact, in which the difficulty about Luke's omiſſion is removed, and the argument in a literal ſenſe is juſt and ſtrong: ſometimes they put men armed into the theatre to fight with beaſts[n], and if they could conquer them and ſave themſelves it was well, if not, they fell a prey to them; tis this laſt cuſtom that is here referred to: and if regard is had to what befel the Apoſtle at Epheſus, when Demetrius and his craftſmen made the uprore mentioned in Acts 19. this could not be in reality, but only in the purpoſe and deſign of men; and certain it is, that tho' he was not then had to the theatre, yet Demetrius and his men intended to have hurried him there, as they did Gaius and Ariſtarchus his companions; and he himſelf was deſirous of going thither, had he not been prevented by the diſciples, and by the Aſiarchs his friends, who had the command of the theatre where theſe practices were uſed; and then the ſenſe is this, if after the manner of men, or in the intention and deſign of men, and as much as in them lay, I have fought with beaſts at Epheſus; tho' if this Epiſtle was written, as it is ſaid to be, before that commotion by Demetrius, no reſpect can be had to that; but rather to ſomething in fact before, at the ſame place, when the Apoſtle did actually fight with beaſts, and was wonderfully and providentially preſerved; and may be what he refers to, in 2 Cor. i. 8, 9, 10. when he deſpaired of life, had the ſentence of death in himſelf, and yet was delivered; and then his ſenſe is, if after the manner of brutiſh men, the Romans, I have fought with beaſts at Epheſus; which I was obliged to do, or deny the Goſpel I preached: what advantageth it me, if the dead riſe not? inſtead of its being a glorious action, it was a foolhardy one; and if he had died in it, what profit could he have had by it, if he roſe not again; or if there is no reſurrection of the dead? inſtead of incurring ſuch dangers, and running ſuch riſques, it would be more eligible to ſit down and ſay with the Epicureans, let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die; which words ſeem to be taken out of Iſ. xxii. 13. and are uſed in favour of the doctrine of the reſurrection, ſhewing that the denial of it opens a door to all manner of licentiouſneſs; and are not ſpoken as allowing or approving of ſuch a conduct; nor as his own words, but as perſonating a libertine, and pointing out what ſuch an one would ſay, and might juſtly infer from ſuch a tenet, that there is no reſurrection of the dead.

[m] Alex. ab Alex. Genial. Dier. l. 3. c. 5. Tertul. Apolog. c. 40. & de Spectaculis, c. 19.

[n] Tertul. de Spectaculis, c. 21. & 23. Cicero in Vatinium Orat. 33.

Ver. 33. Be not deceived, &c.] By ſuch as deny the doctrine of the reſurrection, and by their reaſonings about it; or by ſuch libertines who go into the denial of it, and argue from thence in favour of their licentious courſe of life: evil communications corrupt good manners. This is a ſentence taken out of Menander, an heathen poet, ſhewing how dangerous is the converſation of evil men, and what an influence bad principles communicated and imbibed, have on the lives and practices of men. This the Apoſtle cites not out of oſtentation, or to ſhew his reading, learning, and acquaintance with ſuch ſort of writers; but partly to obſerve, that this was a truth obvious by the light of nature, and partly becauſe ſuch a teſtimony might be more regarded by the Corinthians, who might be fond of ſuch authors, and what was ſaid by them; juſt as when he was at Athens among the philoſophers there, he cites a paſſage out of Aratus, Acts xvii. 28. as he does another out of Epimenides concerning the Cretians, Titus i. 12.

Ver. 34. Awake to righteouſneſs and ſin not, &c.] The Apoſtle repreſents the Corinthians as inebriated with bad principles and notions, and as fallen aſleep, and as greatly remiſs, and declined in the exerciſe of grace and diſcharge of duty; and therefore calls upon them to awake out of ſleep, to watch and be ſober, and attend to righteouſneſs; to the juſtice of God, which requires the reſurrection of the dead, and makes it neceſſary that men may receive the things done in the body, whether good or evil; for as it is a righteous thing with God to render tribulation to them that ſin againſt him, and trouble his people; ſo it is but juſt, that thoſe bodies which Chriſt has purchaſed with his blood, who have ſerved him, and ſuffered for his ſake, ſhould be raiſed again, that together with their ſouls, they may enjoy the happineſs provided for them; and to the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, to look unto it, lay hold on it, exerciſe faith upon it, deſiring to be found in it living and dying; and to works of righteouſneſs, to a holy life and converſation, a living ſoberly, righteouſly and godly; and not ſpend their time, and give up themſelves to vain ſpeculations and notions; which were ſo far from being edifying, that they were very detrimental to themſelves and others. The Vulgate Latin verſion reads, awake ye righteous; for righteous perſons, good men, the wiſe as well as fooliſh virgins ſometimes fall aſleep, and need awaking out of it; which is done by one providence or another, or by the miniſtry of the word, and when ever to purpoſe, by the powerful and efficacious grace of God: the words may be rendered, awake righteouſly; or as the Syriac verſion reads, awake your hearts righteouſly; and as the Arabic, with a due awaking; that is, as it becomes you, and as it is juſt, right, and proper you ſhould: and ſin not; not that they could be, or that it could be thought they might be without ſin in them, or without ſin being done by them; but that they ought not to live a ſinful courſe of life, which the denial of the reſurrection led unto, or indulged in; or not ſin by denying that doctrine, and giving themſelves up to a vitious life in conſequence of it: for ſome have not the knowledge of God; are like the Gentiles that are without God, and know him not; they know not, or at leaſt, do not own the truth of God in his word, declaring and teſtifying the doctrine of the reſurrection; they err in that point, not knowing the ſcriptures, the ſenſe of them, and this truth contained in them; nor the power of God in raiſing the dead, nor the juſtice of God, which makes it neceſſary that the dead ſhould be raiſed: I ſpeak this to your ſhame; that there ſhould be ſuch ignorant perſons in their community; that there were any of ſuch bad principles, as to deny the reſurrection of the dead, and of ſuch diſſolute lives as to give up themſelves to ſenſual luſts and pleaſures; that ſuch were continued in the church, kept company with, indulged and careſſed; and that there was ſo great a corruption in doctrine, diſcipline and converſation among them.

Ver. 35. But ſome man will ſay, &c.] Or ſome one of you, as the Syriac and Arabic verſions read; for there were ſome among them members of this church, that denied the reſurrection of the dead, ver. 12. a weak believer indeed, may be deſigned, one of the babes in Chriſt in this church, that could not digeſt ſuch ſtrong meat, but had ſome doubt and difficulties in his mind about this point, tho' he did not abſolutely deny it; but by the manner in which the objections and queries are put, and the ſharpneſs in which the Apoſtle anſwers them, it looks rather that an infidel as to this doctrine is intended, one of thoſe Epicureans who ſaid, ver. 32. let us eat and drink for to-morrow we die; or ſome heathen philoſopher, a mere natural man, that rejected this doctrine becauſe not agreeable to his carnal reaſon, and laughed at it as monſtrous and ridiculous: how are the dead raiſed up? This query is put, not as tho' the perſon merely heſitated, and was in ſome ſuſpenſe about this matter, or with a deſire to be informed; but as denying the thing, and as objecting to it as a thing impoſſible, and impracticable; ſuggeſting it could not be, it was a thing incredible that thoſe dead bodies which have been laid in the earth for ſo many hundred, and ſome, thouſands of years, and have been long ago reduced to duſt, and this duſt has undergone a thouſand forms; that ſuch whoſe bodies have been burnt to aſhes, or deſtroyed by wild beaſts, and digeſted by them, ſhould ever be raiſed again. Such a doctrine muſt be paſt all belief: and with what body do they come? out of their graves, as you ſay, and appear on the earth at the laſt day; will they come forth with the ſame bodies, or with other? with earthly or heavenly ones? mortal or immortal? with bodies different from one another, and from what they now are?

Ver. 36. Thou fool, &c.] Not tranſgreſſing the law of Chriſt, which makes him that calls his brother a fool in danger of hell-fire; for the Apoſtle ſaid not this in anger, and from a malevolent diſpoſition, as that rule ſuppoſes, but out of zeal for truth, and to reprove the ſtupidity and folly of ſuch a bold objector; in oppoſing the veracity and power of God, in ſetting up his reaſon above divine revelation, and in not attending even to natural philoſophy itſelf; in which profeſſing to be wiſe he might be juſtly called a fool, and therefore ſends him to the huſbandman to learn of him how to anſwer his own queries: that which thou ſoweſt is not quickened except it die; and which is more eſpecially true of a grain of wheat: our Lord obſerves the ſame, John xii. 24. ſee the note there, and deſigns by the ſimile his own death, and reſurrection, and the fruit following thereon. This ſeed being caſt into the earth corrupts, rots, and dies, and then is quickened, and riſes up in ſtalk, blade, and ear. Which ſhows that the diſſolution and corruption of the body by death, is ſo far from being an objection to its reſurrection, that it is neceſſary to it, even as the dying and putrifying of the ſeed, or grain of wheat, is neceſſary to its quickening and riſing up again; and that if God is able to quicken a ſeed or grain that is rotten and entirely dead, and cauſe it to riſe up in verdure and with much fruit, as he does every year in millions of inſtances, why ſhould it be thought incredible that God ſhould quicken dead bodies, when the one is as much an inſtance of his power as the other. The Claromontane exemplar reads, except it die firſt; and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion.

Ver. 37. And that which thou ſoweſt, thou ſoweſt not that body that ſhall be, &c.] The ſower, for inſtance, does not take a ſtalk of wheat in its blade, and ear, and full corn in the ear, encompaſſed with the huſk, and ſow it in the earth, which is the body or form in which it appears when it riſes up again, and is come to its full growth: but bare grain (or naked grain) it may chance of wheat, or ſome other grain; wheat, or any other grain, is caſt into the earth naked, beat out of the huſk; and that ſelfſame grain riſes up again, cloathed with additional verdure, beauty, and fruitfulneſs; and ſo the body which comes out of its mother's womb naked, and returns naked again, Job i. 21. to which the Apoſtle ſeems to allude, will riſe again the ſame body, though with additional glories and excellencies; ſo that if it ſhould be aſked, how is it poſſible that a dead body can be raiſed up again? the poſſibility of it may be ſeen, in the quickning and raiſing up of a grain of wheat, that firſt rots and dies; and if it be enquired with what body the dead will be raiſed, it may in ſome meaſure be obſerved in this inſtance, that though it will be the ſame body, yet with different and excelling qualities: this ſimile ſeems to have been much in uſe among the Jews, to illuſtrate this doctrine, and we have ſome traces of it ſtill in their writings[o]: "Cleopatra the queen "aſked R. Meir, ſaying, I know that the dead "ſhall live, for it is written, they of the city ſhall "flouriſh like graſs of the earth, Pſal. lxxii. 16. but "when they riſe, ſhall they riſe naked, or ſhall "they riſe in their cloaths? to which he replied, "much more than wheat: for as wheat is buried, "ערומה, naked, it comes forth, (or ſprings up,) "with many cloathings; and how much more the "righteous, who are buried in their cloaths?" and again[p], "ſays R. Eliezer, all the dead ſhall ſtand "in the reſurrection of the dead, and ſhall riſe "with their garments on; from whence do you "learn this? from the ſeed of the earth, eſpecially from wheat; for as wheat is buried naked, "and comes forth with many cloathings, much "more the righteous, who are buried in their "cloaths."

Ver. 38. But God giveth it a body, as it hath pleaſed him, &c.] It is not the huſbandman, nor the ſun, nor the rain, that give the grain of wheat, or any other, its verdure and beauty, the form in which it ſprings up, its ſtalk, blade, and ear, but God by his own power, and of his ſovereign will and pleaſure; and he does not create this new form, but gives it; and does not barely give it, but gives the body to it; to the ſelf-ſame grain, and not another: ſo the reſurrection of the dead is God's work; it is an inſtance of his power, and of his ſovereign will; and is to his people, a branch of that eternal life, which is his pure gift through Jeſus Chriſt; all that glory in which the body will ariſe, ſprings from his free grace, and is beſtowed upon the ſelf-ſame body, which was carried about here, and laid in the grave: and to every ſeed its own body; which is ſuitable and natural to it, according to its kind; ſee Gen. i. 11. as cummin to cummin, aniſe to aniſe, wheat to wheat, barley to barley, and not on the contrary; ſhewing, that it is the ſame body that is raiſed that dies, though it is in a more glorious, and with more excellent qualities; which is manifeſt, from expreſs paſſages of ſcripture; ſee Job xix. 26, 27. 1 Cor. xv. 42, 43, 44, 53, 54. from the ſignification of the word reſurrection, which is a raiſing up of that which is fallen; and if the ſame body that falls by death, is not raiſed, but another is given, it will not be a reſurrection, but a creation: and alſo from the figurative phraſes by which it is expreſſed, as here by the quickning of ſeed caſt into the earth, and elſewhere by awaking out of ſleep; now as it is the ſame ſeed that is ſown, that ſprings up again, and the ſame body that ſleeps that is awaked out of it, ſo it is the ſame body that is interred in the earth, and falls aſleep by death, that will be quickened and awaked at the reſurrection: and it is clear from the places from whence the dead will be raiſed, the repoſitories of them, as death and hell, or the grave, and the ſea; for none but the ſame bodies that are laid in the grave, or caſt into the ſea, can be ſaid to come forth out of them, or be delivered up by them: and from the ſubject of the reſurrection, the bodies of men, their vile and mortal bodies, which can be no other than their preſent ones; and from the end of the reſurrection, which is that ſome may come to life, and others to damnation; and from the juſtice of God, which requires that the ſame bodies Chriſt has purchaſed, and who have ſerved and ſuffered for him, ſhould be glorified; and the ſame that have done evil againſt him, and abuſed themſelves and his people, be puniſhed: this might be argued from the tranſlations of Enoch and Elijah in their bodies to heaven, in which they were on earth; and from the reſurrection of the bodies of the ſaints at Chriſt's reſurrection, and the change that will be on the bodies of living ſaints at the coming of Chriſt; for it is not reaſonable to ſuppoſe, that ſome of the ſaints ſhall have their own bodies, and others none at all, or not the ſame they lived in here: this may be further confirmed, from the reſurrection of Chriſt's body, which was the ſame he had before; it was not changed into a ſpirit, but conſiſted of fleſh and bones, as it had done; and had on it the very print of the nails, and ſpear in his hands, feet, and ſide; and to this the bodies of the ſaints are to be faſhioned: add to all this, if it is not a reſurrection of the ſame body, but new ones are created, to which the ſoul will be united, it will not be a reſurrection, but a tranſmigration of ſouls into other bodies; but as every ſeed has it own body, ſo will every ſoul have its own body, tho' greatly different as to its qualities, and much improved for the better, as in ſeed ſown: and this is the ſenſe of the ancient Jews [q], "ſays R. Chijah, "דההוא גופא דהוה יקום, that that ſelf-ſame "body that was ſhall riſe, is clear from what is "written, thy dead men ſhall live, Iſa. xxvi. 19. "and it is not written, ſhall be created; from whence "it is evident that they ſhall not be created, but "ſhall be quickned:" and again [r], "in the time "to come, the holy bleſſed God will quicken the "dead, and raiſe them, מעפרם, out of their own "duſt, that they may not be a building of duſt, "as they were at firſt, when they were created out "of duſt itſelf, a thing which is not ſtable, according to Gen. ii. 7. and at that time they ſhall "be raiſed out of the duſt, out of that building, "and ſhall ſtand in a ſtable building, that they "may have ſtability, or duration." So on thoſe words, I kill and I make alive, I wound and I heal, Deut. xxxii. 39. they obſerve [s], that "as wounding and healing are, באחד, in one (and the ſame "body,) ſo death and life are, באחד, in one and "the ſame."

[p] Pirke Eliezer, c. 33.

Ver. 39. All fleſh is not the ſame fleſh, &c.] Or equal, as the Syriac verſion renders it; though all fleſh is fleſh, as to the nature and ſubſtance of it; agrees in its original, being by generation; and is ſupported by food, and is alike frail and mortal; all fleſh is graſs, riſes out of it, or is maintained by it, or withers like that, yet not of equal worth, value, and excellency: but there is one kind of fleſh of men; which is ſuperior to, and more excellent than any other; being animated by a rational ſoul, and is ſet in the firſt place; ſo we read of, בשר איש, the fleſh of man, for mankind, Job xii. 9. ſee Exod. xxx. 32. Another fleſh of beaſts; as ſheep and oxen, and other beaſts of the field: another of fiſhes; which may be obſerved againſt the Papiſts, who diſtinguiſh between fleſh and fiſh, as if there was no fleſh of fiſhes; and on their faſt days prohibit fleſh, but allow the eating of fiſh; thus fleſh is attributed to fiſhes, as here, in Lev. xi. 11. upon which text Aben Ezra obſerves, lo, fiſh is called fleſh; but as our doctors ſay, according to the cuſtom of thoſe times; and ſo it is by the Jews, who ſay [t], "all "fleſh is forbidden to boil in milk, מבשר דגים, "except the fleſh of fiſhes, and locuſts; and it is forbidden to ſet it on a table along with cheeſe, ex- "cept the fleſh of fiſhes, and locuſts:" and another of birds; the fowls of the air. This is another ſimilitude, illuſtrating the reſurrection of the dead; and is not deſigned to point out the difference between the raiſed bodies of the righteous, and the wicked; as if the former were ſignified by the fleſh of men, and the other by the fleſh of beaſts, fiſhes, and birds; nor among the wicked themſelves, with whom there will be degrees of puniſhment; nor among the ſaints, as if the fleſh of one ſhould differ from that of another. The intent of this ſimile, is only to ſhew, that the reſurrection of the dead will be in real fleſh, in their own fleſh, in the ſelf-ſame fleſh, as to ſubſtance, with which they were cloathed when on earth; but that it will, as to its qualities, be different from it, as one ſort of fleſh is now from another; and that if God can, as he does, make different ſorts of fleſh, and yet all for kind are fleſh, there is no difficulty in conceiving, that God is able to raiſe the dead in their own fleſh, and yet different from what it now is; being free from all weakneſs, frailty, corruption, and mortality.

Ver. 40. There are alſo celeſtial bodies, &c.] Or bodies in the heavens, as the ſun, moon, and ſtars: and bodies terreſtrial; or bodies on earth, animate and inanimate, men, beaſts, trees, minerals, &c. But the glory of the celeſtial is one, and the glory of the terreſtrial is another; though both ſorts are bodies, yet their qualities differ, and there is a greater glory in the one than in the other. This is another ſimilitude, ſerving to help our ideas of this doctrine of the reſurrection of the body; that though it is the ſame in ſubſtance, yet different in qualities; and does not deſign any difference between the bodies of good men and bad men, elect and reprobate; as if the one were intended by the celeſtial bodies, and the other by the terreſtrial; and much leſs degrees of glory in the ſaints themſelves, who, imagine them in as low a form as can be, can never be compared to terreſtrial ones; but it ſhews the difference there will be, between the raiſed bodies and the preſent ones; which will be as great as that which now is, between celeſtial and terreſtrial bodies.

Ver. 41. There is one glory of the ſun, &c.] Which is the greater light, the fountain of light, and whoſe glory exceeds that of the other heavenly bodies: and another glory of the moon; which is the leſſer light, and receives its light from the ſun, and conſequently its glory is inferior: and another glory of the ſtars; which though very bright and ſparkling, and are innumerable, have a leſſer glory, at leaſt to our appearance, than the ſun and moon: the Jews have a notion [u], that "all the ſtars and "the orbs are endued with a ſoul, and with know- "ledge, and underſtanding; and that they live, "and ſtand, and know him that ſaid, and the "world was; and every one of them, according to "his greatneſs, ולפי מעלתו, and according to his "dignity, praiſe and glorify their creator, as the "angels; and as they know God, ſo they know "themſelves, and the angels that are above them; "for the knowledge of the ſtars and the orbs is "leſſer than the knowledge of angels, and greater "than the knowledge of men:" for one ſtar differeth from another ſtar in glory; all which is to be underſtood, not as if the glory of the ſun meant the glory of Chriſt, the ſun of righteouſneſs, who excels in glory, even in his human nature; and the glory of the moon, the glory of the church, who receives hers from Chriſt; and the glory of the ſtars, the glory of particular ſaints; and as if there will be in the reſurrection ſtate, degrees of glory among them: for what peculiar glory can be thought to be upon the body of one, that is not upon another, when the righteous ſhall ſhine forth as the ſun, in the kingdom of their Father? and admitting there was any truth in this, 'tis not the truth of this text; the only deſign of which, as the above, is to ſhow, that as not only celeſtial and terreſtrial bodies differ from each other, but even heavenly ones, ſo at the reſurrection, the bodies of the ſaints then will differ in glory from their preſent ones; though theſe are now the members of Chriſt, are preſented to God an holy ſacrifice, and are waſhed with pure water.

Ver. 42. So alſo is the reſurrection of the dead, &c.] This will be the caſe and condition of riſen bodies, they will be as different from what they now are, though they will be the ſame in ſubſtance, as a ſtalk of wheat in its blade and ear, and full corn in the ear, is from the naked grain, when caſt into the earth; or as the fleſh of men is from the fleſh of beaſts, fiſhes, and birds; or as celeſtial bodies, from terreſtrial ones; or as the glory of the ſun, differs from the glory of the moon and ſtars; or as one ſtar differs from another ſtar in glory; that this is the Apoſtle's ſenſe, is clear from the induction of particulars following, by which he explains in clear terms, what he before ſignified by ſimilitudes: it is ſown in corruption; it ſhould be obſerved, that the word ſown in this and the following verſes, does not merely relate to the interment of the body, but alſo to its generation; and includes its ſtate, condition, and character, during life; as well as points out what it is at death, and its ſepulture in the earth: it is from firſt to laſt a corruptible body; it is born frail and mortal, and liable to corruption and death; it is corrupted with ſin, and ſo a vile body; there is a world of iniquity in one of its members, the tongue, and what then muſt there be in all its parts? but beſides this moral corruption, in which it is during the preſent ſtate, it is liable to a natural one; from the crown of the head to the ſole of the foot, it may be covered with wounds, bruiſes, and putrifying ſores; a right-arm may be dried up and withered away, and a leg may corrupt and mortify, and ſo any other part; the whole is ſupported by corruptible things, by meat that periſheth; and which if it did not corrupt and periſh, would not be nouriſhing; and as meats are for the belly, and the belly for meats, in a ſhort time God will deſtroy both it and them; the whole frame and texture of the body will be diſſolved by death, and be brought to worms, corruption, and duſt; and in this caſe will lie in the grave till the reſurrection morn: it is raiſed in incorruption; the very ſame body that was ſown, generated, lived, and died, ſhall be raiſed again, but different from what it was; it will be incorruptible; its parts will be no more ſubject to corruption; it will not be ſupported by corruptible things; it will be immortal, and never die more, and will be clear of all its moral corruption; it will no more be a vile body, but faſhioned like to the holy and glorious body of Chriſt.

Ver. 43. It is ſown in diſhonour, &c.] Its original is diſhonourable, it comes as the Jews often ſay [w], מטפה סרוחה, from a filthy drop; its generated and brought forth, in a manner we are aſhamed of; it is conceived in ſin, and ſhapen in iniquity; it is unclean, and born of the fleſh; and when born, is in ſuch a condition, as is to the loathing of it; ſome of its members are leſs honourable, and ſo uncomely as always to need a covering; it is ſubject to various blemiſhes, defects, and imperfection, and few bodies are without one or another; and liable to many injuries and affronts, as the body of our Lord himſelf was, who gave his back to the ſmiters, his cheek to them that plucked off the hair, and hid not his face from ſhame and ſpitting; and in death, 'tis nauſeous, filthy, and very diſhonourable, ſo that the neareſt relation and friend cannot take pleaſure in it, but deſires to bury it out of ſight; and amidſt the greateſt funeral pomp and ſplendor, it is laid in the grave in diſhonour, to be the companion of corruption and worms: but in the reſurrection, it is raiſed in glory; in perfect beauty and comelineſs, without the leaſt blemiſh, defect, or imperfection; nor will there be any part of it, that will occaſion ſhame; it will be metamorphoſed, and faſhioned like to the glorious body of Chriſt; it will ſhine as the ſun, and be as the brightneſs of the firmament: and ſo the Jews underſtand the paſſage in Dan. xii. 3. they ſay [x], that "God will beautify the bodies of "the righteous in time to come, as the body of "the firſt man when he entered into the garden of "Eden; and that the ſoul whilſt it is in its dignity, "is ſuſtained by the ſuperior light, and is cloathed "with it; and when it enters into the body in "time to come, it enters with the light; and then "will the body ſhine as the brightneſs of the firmament, according to Dan. xii. 3." It is ſown in weakneſs; it comes into the world in great weakneſs; what is weaker than the body of a new born babe? it can't move, nor help itſelf in any reſpect; and how weak and defenceleſs is the body of man, when adult; as he is ſubject to various diſeaſes and diſorders, which weaken his ſtrength in the way, and is ſurrounded with natural infirmities, ariſing from hunger, thirſt, nakedneſs, labour, &c. ſo he is not armed, as many other creatures are, for defence and offence; nor can he reſiſt and overcome many things which do him hurt, much leſs can he reſiſt death, or retain his ſpirit then; and through weakneſs at laſt dies, and is devoid of all ſtrength, and as ſuch is laid in the grave, where there is no work that he can do: but it is raiſed in power; it is raiſed by the power of God, and with great power in itſelf; being able to ſubſiſt without food, and of moving itſelf from place to place, with great agility; and capable of the higheſt ſervices before God and the Lamb, without wearineſs; nor will it be ever more liable to weakneſs or death; death ſhall have no more power over it; nor ſhall it be encompaſſed or attended with any infirmity whatever.

Ver. 44. It is ſown a natural body, &c.] Or an animal one, being generated as animals are, and ſupported with food as they be, and die at laſt as they do; ſee Eccl. iii. 19, 20, 21. It is raiſed a ſpiritual body; not as to ſubſtance, but as to its quality; it will not be changed into a ſpirit; our Lord's riſen body, to which ours will be conformed, was not a ſpirit, but as before, conſiſted of fleſh and bones: but the body will then be ſubject to the ſpirit and ſoul of man; it will be employed in ſpiritual ſervice, for which it will be abundantly fitted and aſſiſted by the Spirit of God; and it will be delighted with ſpiritual objects; it will be like the angels, thoſe excellent ſpirits; it will live as ſpirits do, without natural helps and means, as meat, drink, cloaths, ſleep, &c. and as they, will never die: there is a natural; or animal body, ſuch as the firſt man's was, and thoſe are, that deſcend from him by ordinary generation: and there is a ſpiritual body; ſuch as the body of Chriſt now is, and as will be the bodies of the riſen ſaints; the phraſe is Jewiſh, הגוף הרוחני, the ſpiritual body [y], and the fleſh of the righteous, being בשרם רוחנים, ſpiritual fleſh [z], are to be met with in their writings.

[x] Zohar in Gen. fol. 69. 1.

Ver. 45. And ſo it is written, &c.] In Gen. ii. 7. the firſt man Adam was made a living ſoul; in the Hebrew text it is, man, or Adam, became, or was made a living ſoul; that is, as the Apoſtle ſays, the firſt man Adam: he calls him, as the Jews [a] frequently do, אדם הראשון, the firſt man; he was the firſt man that was made, and the firſt parent of mankind, and the head and repreſentative of all his poſterity, and ſo the firſt in time, cauſality and dignity; whoſe name was Adam, ſo called by God in the day he was created, becauſe he was formed, מן האדמה, from the ground, or earth; when God breathed life into the earthly maſs, or lump; and being animated with a rational ſoul, it became an animal body, or a living creature; and ſo the Apoſtle proves from the firſt man that was upon earth, that there is a natural, or animal body; a body animated by a ſoul, and which was ſupported by eating and drinking, by ſleep and reſt; and was capable of dying, and ſhould die, in caſe of ſin; and which was the ſtate of it in its firſt creation, whilſt in innocence, and before the fall; and this is all he meant to prove by this ſcripture; for what follows, is not mentioned as therein written, or elſewhere, but as the Apoſtle's own aſſertion: the laſt Adam was made a quickning ſpirit; by the laſt Adam is meant Jeſus Chriſt, called Adam, becauſe he is really and truly a man, a partaker of the ſame fleſh and blood as the reſt of mankind; and becauſe he is the antitype of the firſt man Adam, who was a figure of him that was to come; and therefore called Adam, for the ſame reaſon as he is called David and Solomon: he is ſaid to be the laſt, in diſtinction from the firſt Adam, with reſpect to him he ſtood, אחרון, laſt upon the earth, as in Job xix. 25. to which paſſage ſome think the Apoſtle here alludes; and becauſe he appeared in the laſt days in the end of the world, and is the laſt that ſhall riſe up as a common head and repreſentative of the whole, or any part of mankind: now he is made a quickning ſpirit; which ſome underſtand of the holy Spirit, which filled the human nature of Chriſt, raiſed him from the dead, and will quicken our mortal bodies at the laſt day; others of the divine nature of Chriſt, to which his fleſh, or human nature, was united; and which gave life, vigour, and virtue, to all his actions and ſufferings, as man; and by which he was quickned, when put to death in the fleſh, and by which he will quicken others another day: though rather I think it is to be underſtood of his ſpiritual body, of his body, not as it was made of the virgin, for that was a natural, or an animal one; it was conceived and bred, and born as animal bodies are; it grew and increaſed, and was nouriſhed with meat and drink, and ſleep and reſt; and was ſubject to infirmities, and to death itſelf, as our bodies be; but it is to be underſtood of it, as raiſed from the dead, when it was made a ſpiritual body, for which reaſon it is called a ſpirit: not that it was changed into a ſpirit, for it ſtill remained fleſh and blood; but becauſe it was no more ſupported in an animal way; nor ſubject to thoſe weakneſſes that animal bodies are, but lives as ſpirits, or angels do; and a quickning one, not only becauſe it has life itſelf, but becauſe by virtue of the ſaints union to it, as it ſubſiſts in the divine perſon of the Son of God, their bodies will be quickned at the laſt day, and made like unto it, ſpiritual bodies; alſo becauſe he lives in his body as a ſpiritual one, they ſhall live in theirs as ſpiritual ones: and ſo the Apoſtle ſhews, that there is a ſpiritual, as well as an animal body; that as the firſt man's body even before the fall, was an animal or natural one; the laſt Adam's body upon his reſurrection is a ſpiritual and life-giving one, as the Syriac verſion renders it; ſo the Cabaliſtic writers [b] ſpeak of "Adam, who is the holy and ſupreme, who rules over all, and gives ſpirit and life to all."

Ver. 46. Howbeit, that was not firſt which is ſpiritual, &c.] As the Apoſtle before proves the diſtinction of a natural and ſpiritual body, and gives inſtances of both in the two principal men in the world, the firſt and the laſt; and points out the difference between them, the one being animated, and having life given unto it, the other animating, and giving life to others; proceeds to obſerve the order of theſe, how that one was before the other; the ſpiritual body, though the more perfect and moſt excellent, yet was not firſt in being: but that which is natural; Adam's animal body was before Chriſt's ſpiritual body: and afterwards that which is ſpiritual; yea, even Chriſt's animal, or natural body, was before his ſpiritual one; his body taken from the virgin, and formed in her womb, and in which he lived here on earth, was an animal body, as before obſerved; and upon his reſurrection, it commenced a ſpiritual one; being the ſame in ſubſtance as the former, only different in qualities; and juſt ſo it is, and will be, with the bodies of the ſaints; which is the Apoſtle's deſign and view, in obſerving this order; the natural body is firſt, and then the ſpiritual; it is firſt a natural body, as generated and nouriſhed, as weak and dying, and it is afterwards a ſpiritual one, when raiſed from the dead.

Ver. 47. The firſt man is of the earth, earthy, &c.] He was formed out of the earth, Gen. ii. 7. and the word there uſed, ſignifies red earth. Joſephus [c] obſerves, that the firſt man was called Adam, which in the Hebrew tongue ſignifies red, becauſe he was made out of red earth; for ſuch adds he, is the true and virgin earth: Pauſanias [d] makes mention of a clay, which is not the colour of earth, but like the ſand of brooks and rivers; and gives a ſmell very near to that of the ſkin, or body of men; and which is ſaid to be the remains of that clay, out of which all mankind was made: but be that as it will, Adam was certainly made out of the earth, and had his habitation and abode aſſigned him in the garden of Eden, and was made to cultivate and till it; his lordſhip and dominion at moſt and beſt, only extended to the terraqueous globe, and the creatures in it; and having ſinned, he was not only thruſt out of the garden to till the ground out of which he was taken, but doomed to return to the duſt from whence he came; and whoſe ſin and fall had ſuch an influence on him and his poſterity, as to make their ſouls ſenſual and earthly, to mind, affect, and cleave unto earthly things: the ſecond man is the Lord from heaven; as Adam was the firſt man, Chriſt is the ſecond man; and theſe two are ſpoken of, as if they were the only two men in the world; becauſe as the former was the head and repreſentative of all his natural poſterity, ſo the latter is the head and repreſentative of all his ſpiritual offspring: and he is the Lord from heaven; in diſtinction from the firſt man, who was of the earth, and whoſe lordſhip reached only to the earth; whereas Chriſt is Lord of all, not only Lord of lords below, but Lord of angels and ſaints above; the whole family in heaven and in earth, is named of him; and he has all power in heaven and in earth, and a name above every name in this world, and that to come, and is indeed higher than the heavens: this is not to be underſtood of his human nature, or of his human body, as if that came down from heaven, and paſſed through the virgin, as ſome hereticks of old ſaid, as water through a pipe; for though it was conceived and formed in a miraculous manner, under the overſhadowing of the Holy Ghoſt from on high, yet was formed out of the matter and ſubſtance of the virgin, and ſo was of the earth; and was indeed an earthly body, ſupported by earthly means, and at laſt returned to the earth, and was interred in it: but it is to be underſtood either of Chriſt as a divine perſon, as the Son of God, as Lord of all, coming down from heaven at his incarnation; not by local motion, or change of place, but by aſſumption of the human nature into union with him, the Lord from heaven; or rather of him as he ſhall deſcend from heaven, as the Lord and judge of all at the laſt day, when he'll come in his glorious, ſpiritual, and heavenly body; and raiſe the righteous dead, and faſhion their bodies like his own; when what follows, will have its full accompliſhment. The Cabaliſtic doctors among the Jews often ſpeak [e] of, אדם עליון, the ſuperior man, and, ואדם תחתון, the inferior man; and in their Cabaliſtic table [f], in the ſixth Sephirah, or number, they place the man from above, the heavenly Adam; and in one of their writings [g], have theſe remarkable words, "מאן אדם עלאה ואדם תנינא, who is the ſu- " preme man and the ſecond man, but of whom it is " ſaid, Prov. xxx. 4. what is his name, and what " is his ſon's name? what is his name? this is the " ſupreme man; what is his ſon's name? this is the " inferior man; and both of them are intimated in " that ſcripture, Exod. iii. 13. and they ſhall ſay " unto me, what is his name? what ſhall I ſay?" Some copies, and the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions leave out the word Lord, and add the word heavenly, reading the clauſe thus, the ſecond man from heaven, heavenly.

Ver. 48. As is the earthy, ſuch are they alſo that are earthy, &c.] As was Adam's body, ſo are the bodies of thoſe that deſcend from him; they are houſes of clay, earthly houſes of this tabernacle, which riſe out of the earth, are maintained by the things of it, and return to it again: and as is the heavenly, ſuch are, or will be they alſo that are heavenly; as is the glorious and ſpiritual body of Chriſt, the Lord from heaven, as that now is in heaven, and will be when he deſcends from thence; ſo will be the bodies of them that are heavenly, that are heaven-born ſouls now, are partakers of the heavenly calling, and whoſe converſation is in heaven; and who in the reſurrection morn, will have heavenly, ſpiritual, and glorious bodies, like unto Chriſt's: ſo Philo [h] the Jew on thoſe words, and man became a living ſoul, has this note; "there " are two kinds of men, for the one is the heavenly " man, and the other is earthy; the heavenly man " is he, who is made after the image of God, incorruptible, and wholly devoid of earthy ſub- " ſtance; the earthy is made of ſeminal matter, " which is called the ground."

Ver. 49. And as we have born the image of the earthy, &c.] Which regards not ſo much the ſinful image of the firſt man upon the ſoul, or the depravity of the powers and faculties of it, as his image of frailty and mortality on the body, having like him a body ſubject to infirmities and death: we ſhall alſo bear the image of the heavenly; which likewiſe regards not ſo much the ſpiritual image of Chriſt inſtamped on the ſoul in regeneration, when Chriſt is formed in the heart, and the new man is created after his likeneſs, and which more and more appears, through every transforming view of him, and will be compleat in glory, as the image and likeneſs of Chriſt upon the bodies of the ſaints in the reſurrection, when they ſhall be faſhioned like unto his: ſome copies, as the Alexandrian and others, read the words as an exhortation, let us bear the image, &c. as if the words were an improvement of the Apoſtle's reaſoning on this ſubject, engaging ſaints to be more concerned for, and ſeeking after a greater likeneſs to Chriſt in righteouſneſs and true holineſs; but the other reading and ſenſe are beſt.

Ver. 50. Now this I ſay, brethren, &c.] Upon the whole, I aſſert this, and obſerve it to you, out of a truly chriſtian reſpect for you, as brethren in the Lord, that fleſh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God: this ſhows the neceſſity there is, of a difference between the body that now is, and that which ſhall be, which the Apoſtle has ſo largely inſiſted on, and ſo clearly proved and explained, in the preceding verſes; becauſe the body as it now is, is not capable of poſſeſſing the heavenly glory; was it to be introduced into heaven, in the condition it is now, it would break in pieces, and crumble into duſt; it would not be able to bear the glory of that ſtate and place: by fleſh and blood is meant, not human nature as to the ſubſtance of it, or as conſiſting of fleſh and blood, for that can and does inherit the kingdom of God; witneſs the human nature, or body of Chriſt, the bodies of the ſaints that roſe after his reſurrection, and thoſe of Enoch and Elijah, who were tranſlated body and ſoul to heaven; ſo that this paſſage makes nothing for thoſe, that deny the reſurrection of the ſame body, and plead for a new and an aerial one: but the human nature, or body, ſo and ſo qualified, is here meant; either as corrupted with ſin, for without holineſs and righteouſneſs no man ſhall ſee the Lord, or enter into and poſſeſs the kingdom of heaven; or fleſh and blood, or an human body, as it is now ſupported in this animal life, with meat and drink, &c. and as it is frail and mortal, and ſubject to death, in which ſenſe the phraſe is uſed in ſcripture; ſee Matt. xvi. 17. Gal. i. 16. Eph. vi. 12. and often by the Jews; ſo Abraham is repreſented by them as ſaying [i], "I am, בשר ודם, " fleſh and blood, to morrow I ſhall depart out of " the world, or die:" it would be endleſs to give the many inſtances that might be produced, of this uſe of the phraſe with them, and in which ſenſe it is to be taken here: and the meaning is, that ſaints in their frail mortal bodies, ſuch as they now are, are not capable of enjoying the heavenly glory; which is called the kingdom, becauſe of its riches, glory, grandeur, and magnificence; and the kingdom of God, becauſe it is of his preparing and giving;

ing; and what he calls his people to, and makes them meet for, and in which they'll reign with him for evermore: heirs of it they may be, and are now whilſt in this frail and mortal ſtate; but inherit, poſſeſs, and enjoy it, they cannot, as not without holineſs of ſoul, ſo not without immortality of body; and therefore 'tis neceſſary that the body ſhould riſe different in qualities from, though the ſame in ſubſtance with, the preſent body; that it ſhould riſe incorruptible, glorious, powerful, and ſpiritual; that it may be fitted for, and be able to bear the exceeding weight of glory in the other world: neither doth corruption inherit incorruption; by corruption is not ſo much meant ſin, or the corruption of nature, or man as corrupted by ſin, though it is true of ſuch an one, that he does not, and cannot inherit incorruption; the incorruptible crown, the crown of glory that fadeth not away, the incorruptible inheritance, reſerved in the heavens, thoſe riches which moth and ruſt corrupt not; but the body, as it is generated in corruption, is ſupported by corruptible things, and is ſubject to corruption and worms; in ſuch a ſituation 'tis unfit for, and uncapable of inheriting eternal glory; it muſt be different from what it is; it muſt put on immortality, and be cloathed with incorruption: the word inherit in both clauſes ſhews, that the heavenly glory is an inheritance, and belongs to children only; is their heavenly Father's bequeſt unto them; is not bought or acquired by any thing of theirs; and is what they enter into and upon, in virtue and conſequence of the death of the teſtator, Chriſt.

Ver. 51. Behold, I ſhew you a myſtery, &c.] Or a ſecret, which could never have been diſcovered by reaſon, or the light of nature, and what is of pure revelation; and which perhaps the Apoſtle became acquainted with, when he was caught up into the third heaven; and is what is never made mention of by any Prophet, or Apoſtle, but himſelf: he prefaces the account of it in this manner, partly to ſhew the great reſpect he had for theſe Corinthians, that he treated them as his boſom friends, to whom he communicated his ſecrets; and partly to excite their curioſity and attention: we ſhall not all ſleep, but we ſhall all be changed; ſome copies read, we ſhall all riſe again, but we ſhall not all be changed, and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion; according to which the ſenſe is, all will riſe again, both juſt and unjuſt, but all will not be changed into a ſtate of glory; but the Apoſtle is only ſpeaking of the ſaints, of whom it is true, not only that they ſhall riſe again, but ſhall be changed from corruption to incorruption; wherefore this cannot be a true reading: others read the words thus, we ſhall all die, but we ſhall not all be changed; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion, and the Alexandrian copy ſeem to have read; which is juſt the reverſe of the text, and ariſes from a wrong ſenſe of Heb. ix. 27. where it is not ſaid, it is appointed unto all men, but unto men once to die; from which rule there has been ſome exceptions, as the inſtances of Enoch and Elijah ſhew; and there will be more at the time of Chriſt's coming, for all will not ſleep in their graves, or die, for death is meant by ſleeping; they will not die as men ordinarily do, and continue under the power of death, but they will be changed at once, from corruption to incorruption, from diſhonour to glory, from weakneſs to power, from being natural to be ſpiritual bodies; this change all the ſaints will undergo, whether dead or alive, at Chriſt's coming; the dead by a reſurrection from the dead, and the living by a ſecret and ſudden power, which will at once render their bodies without ſeparating them from their ſouls, immortal and glorious: and this reading and ſenſe, are confirmed by the Syriac and Arabic verſions.

Ver. 52. In a moment, &c.] Or point of time; which is very ſhort indeed; what a moment is, according to the Jewiſh doctors, ſee the note on Matt. iv. 8. In the twinkling of an eye; theſe two the Jews not only put together as here, but make one to be as the other; ſo they ſay[k], הרגע כהרף עין, a moment is as the twinkling of an eye. This phraſe as the twinkling of an eye, is frequently uſed in Jewiſh writings[l], to ſignify how ſpeedily and ſuddenly any thing is done, and which is the deſign of it here; and the Apoſtle's meaning is, that the change upon the bodies of living ſaints, will be ſo quick, that it will be done in a trice, before a man can ſhut his eyes and open them again; ſo that it will be as it were imperceptible, and without the leaſt ſenſation of pain: this may alſo be referred to the reſurrection, which will be quick, and done at once; though it ſeems rather, and chiefly to reſpect the change of the living; what follows indeed, favours the other ſenſe alſo; for all will be quick and ſudden, the coming of Chriſt, the raiſing of the dead, and the change of the living: at the laſt trumpet, for the trumpet ſhall ſound; or by the laſt trumpet, as the Syriac and Arabic verſions render it; that is, by means of it, through the ſounding of that: and the dead ſhall be raiſed incorruptible; free from all frailty, mortality, and corruption, when the trumpet ſhall ſound: and at the ſame time alſo, we ſhall be changed; the ſaints that will be found alive; the Apoſtle ſpeaks in the firſt perſon, becauſe of the uncertainty of Chriſt's coming, and of the blowing of the laſt trumpet, he not knowing but it might be in his time; what this laſt trumpet will be, is not eaſy to ſay; it can hardly be thought to be a material one: the Jews[m] have a notion, that a trumpet will be blown at the time of the reſurrection of the dead, as at the giving of the law on mount Sinai; which will quicken the dead, as they ſay it then did; and that this will be blown by Michael the archangel[n]: it ſeems very likely to be the ſame with the ſhout, the voice of the archangel, and the trumpet of God, 1 Theſſ. iv. 16. all which may be no other than the voice of Chriſt; at the hearing of which, the dead will riſe; but whether this will be an articulate one, as at the raiſing of Lazarus, or is only expreſſive of his power, which will then be put forth, is not material, nor a point to be determined: and what if by all this ſhould be meant, ſome violent claps of thunder, as at mount Sinai, which will ſhake the whole earth; and when almighty power will be put forth to raiſe the dead; ſince ſuch are by the Jews[o] called the voices of the Son of David, and are expected by them, a little before his coming? This is called the laſt trumpet, not ſo much with reſpect to thoſe that go before, much leſs to the ſeven trumpets in the Revelations, of which as yet there was no revelation made, but becauſe there will be none after it; ſee 2 Eſdras vi. 23.

Ver. 53. For this corruptible muſt put on incorruption, &c.] The Apoſtle returns to what he had before aſſerted, concerning the neceſſity of an alteration in the qualities of bodies, in order to the enjoyment of the heavenly ſtate; ſhewing, that the ſelf-ſame body the ſaints now have, for he ſeems to point with his finger to his own, and which are incorruptible ones, ſhall and muſt be cloathed with incorruption: and this mortal muſt put on immortality; the body that now is mortal, muſt become immortal; it muſt put off its rags of mortality, and be cloathed with the ſhining robes of immortality; and which muſt be done, either by firſt dying, and then riſing from the dead; or by undergoing alive a quick and ſudden change, which will at once remove all corruption and mortality; ſee 2 Eſdras ii. 45.

Ver. 54. So when this corruptible ſhall have put on incorruption, &c.] As at the coming of Chriſt, both the bodies of living ſaints, and of dead ones being raiſed, will: and this mortal ſhall have put on immortality; which will be the caſe, in the reſurrection morn: then ſhall be brought to paſs that ſaying that is written; then that paſſage will have its full accompliſhment, which ſtands in Iſa. xxv. 8. where it is read, he will ſwallow up death in victory, or for ever. That is, the Meſſiah ſhall by his death and reſurrection from the dead, obtain ſuch an entire victory over death, not only for himſelf, but for all his people, that in the reſurrection morn, when they will be all raiſed from the dead, death will be ſo ſwallowed up, that it will be no more: the Jews acknowledge that this prophecy belongs to the times of the Meſſiah; ſo they ſay [p], that "the Meſſiah ſhall deſcend from Pharez, and in "his day the holy bleſſed God will cauſe death to "be ſwallowed up, as it is ſaid, Iſa. xxv. 8. he "ſhall ſwallow up death in victory:" and again [q], "when the king Meſſiah comes, the holy bleſſed "God will raiſe up thoſe that ſleep in the duſt, as "it is written, he ſhall ſwallow up death in victory:" they alſo ſay [r], that this paſſage refers to future time, and to the world to come. The prophet expreſſes it actively, it being a prediction of what was to be done by the Meſſiah; the Apoſtle cites it paſſively, as being accompliſhed by him after the reſurrection, and conſidered as a part of the ſong ſung by the riſen ſaints; to which is added, Ver. 55. O death, where is thy ſting? &c.] Theſe words, with the following clauſe, are taken out of Hoſ. xiii. 14. and that they belong to the times of the Meſſiah, the ancient Jews acknowledge; and the Chaldee paraphraſe interprets them of the Logos, or Word of God, rendering them thus, "my Word ſhall be among them to kill, "and my Word to deſtroy;" wherefore the Apoſtle is not to be charged with a miſapplication of them, nor with a perverſion of them, as he is by the Jew [s]: in the Prophet they are thus read, O death, I will be thy plagues, O grave, I will be thy deſtruction; between which, and the Apoſtle's citation of them, there is ſome difference; the word אהי, which we render in both clauſes, I will be, the Apoſtle tranſlates where, and that very rightly, and ſo it ſhould be rendered there; and ſo it is by the Septuagint interpreters, who render the whole as he, with a little variation, where's thy revenge, O death? where's thy ſting, O grave? and ſo the Arabic verſion of Hoſea ſtill nearer the Apoſtle, where is now thy victory, O death? or where is thy ſting, O grave? and even the Chaldee paraphraſe on ver. 10. renders the ſame word where; for inſtead of, I will be thy king, the Targum reads, אן מלכך, where is thy king? and Aben Ezra a Jewiſh writer of great note, on ver. 10. obſerves, that there are ſome that ſay the word is to be inverted, as if it was איה, where, and he adds, and it is right; a like obſervation he makes on thoſe words in ver. 14. and that that is the true ſenſe of the word in both verſes, is atteſted by Ebn Jannabius Tanchuma [t]; ſo that the Apoſtle is thus far to be juſtified, in his citation of this paſſage: it is further to be obſerved, that inſtead of thy plagues, he reads, thy ſting; and I doubt not, but that among the many things which דבר ſignifies, as it muſt be owned it does ſignify the plague, or peſtilence, ſee Pſal. xc. 6. and which perhaps is ſo called, from the venemous nature of it, and the poiſonous ſting that is in it, ſo likewiſe a ſting, though there is no inſtance of it; certain it is, that bees are called דברים, and as Cocceius [u] obſerves, from their ſting; and ſo in the Chaldee and Arabic languages, a bee, or a waſp, is called דברא; and it is to ſuch ſort of creatures, that the alluſion is here made; who having loſt their ſtings, can do no hurt; and which will be the caſe of death in the reſurrection morn, when riſen ſaints will inſult over it in this triumphant manner; having nothing more to fear from it, any more than a man has to be afraid of any animal whatever, that has loſt its ſting: and in the following clauſe, O grave, where's thy victory? inſtead of deſtruction, as it muſt be allowed the word קטב, ſignifies, ſee Pſal. xc. 6. the Apoſtle reads victory; but then there is no difference in the ſenſe; for the grave gets its victory over its thouſands, and ten thouſands, and ten thouſand times ten thouſands, and millions of millions, by the deſtruction of them, which now it glories in, and boaſts of; but in the reſurrection morn, when its deſtruction will be at an end, the triumphant ſaints may reaſonably aſk, where's its boaſted victory, ſince it can deſtroy no longer.

Ver. 56. The ſting of death is ſin, &c.] Death has a ſting, and which was originally in it, and that is ſin; ſin is the cauſe of death, it is what has given riſe and being to it; it entered into the world by it, and is ſupported in its empire thro' it; it gives it its reſiſtleſs power, which reaches to all ſorts of perſons, young and old, rich and poor, high and low, bond and free; it gives it all its bitterneſs, agonies, and miſeries; and it is by that, it does all the hurt and miſchief it does; and it may fitly be compared to a ſting, for its poiſonous and venemous nature: and the ſtrength of ſin is the law; not that the law of God is ſinful, or encourages ſin; it forbids it under the ſevereſt penalty; but was there no law, there would be no ſin, nor imputation of it; ſin is a tranſgreſſion of the law: moreover, the ſtrength of ſin, its evil nature, and all the dreadful aggravations of it, and ſad conſequences upon it, are diſcovered and made known by the law; and alſo the ſtrength of it is drawn out by it, through the corruption of human nature; which is irritated and provoked the more to ſin, through the law's prohibition of it; and this is not the fault of the law, but is owing to the vitioſity of nature; which the more it is forbidden any thing, the more deſirous it is of it; to which may be added, that ſin is the more exceeding ſinful, being committed againſt a known law, and that of the great lawgiver, who is able to ſave and to deſtroy; whoſe legiſlative power and authority, are ſlighted and trampled upon by it, which makes the tranſgreſſion the more heinous; it is the law which binds ſin upon a man's conſcience, accuſes him of it, pronounces him guilty, curſes, condemns, and adjudges him to death for it.

Ver. 57. But thanks be to God which giveth us the victory, &c.] Over ſin the ſting of death, over the law the ſtrength of ſin, and over death and the grave; and which will be the ground and foundation of the above triumphant ſong in the reſurrection morn, as it is now at this preſent time, of praiſe and thankfulneſs to God: and it is all thro' our Lord Jeſus; he has got the victory over ſin; he has put it away by the ſacrifice of himſelf; he has finiſhed and made an end of it; for tho' it reigns over his people before converſion, and dwells in them after it, yet in conſequence of his atonement for it, it loſes its governing power thro' the Spirit and grace of God in regeneration, and entirely its damning power over them, and in the reſurrection-morn will not be ſo much as in being in them; the view of which now fills them with joy, thankſgiving, and triumph. Chriſt has obtained a victory over the law; he has ſtopped its mouth, and anſwered all its demands; he has been made under, and ſubject to it; he has obeyed its precepts, and bore its penalty, and has delivered his from the curſe and condemnation of it, ſo that they have nothing to fear from it; it is dead to them, and they to that: he has alſo aboliſhed death by dying and riſing again, ſo as that it ſhall have no more dominion over him; and he has aboliſhed it as a penal evil to his ſaints; and tho' they die, they ſhall not always remain under the power of death, they ſhall live again, and with him for ever: he has conquered the grave by riſing out of it himſelf, and living for evermore, having the keys of the grave in his hands; and will at the laſt day oblige it to give up its dead, when his victory over this, with reſpect to his people, will be abundantly manifeſt: now this victory, in all its branches, is given by God to believers; they are made to ſhare in all the victories of Chriſt their head, and are more than conquerors thro' him; but this is not by merit, but by gift, the gift of God the Father, who gives his Son, and all things with him that are his; and this gift is a diſtinguiſhing one; it is given to us, and not to others; and which therefore calls aloud for praiſe and thankfulneſs. The title of the ninth pſalm may be rendered, to the conqueror over death, or that is the author of victory over death, even to the ſon, a pſalm of David.

Ver. 58. Therefore, my beloved brethren, &c.] This is the concluſion of the whole, and contains the uſe the Apoſtle makes of the above doctrine, addreſſing the ſaints at Corinth in the moſt tender and affectionate manner; owning the ſpiritual relation they ſtood in to him, and expreſſing the great love he had for them, which filled him with a concern for them, that they might be both ſound in principle, and right in practice, and continue ſo: be ye ſtedfaſt, unmoveable; in all the doctrines of the Goſpel, and particularly in this of the reſurrection of the dead, which he had been labouring throughout the whole chapter: always abounding in the work of the Lord; going on in it, being more and more in the practice of it; either in the work of the miniſtry, which ſome of them were in, to which the Lord had called them, and for which he had fitted and qualified them, and in which his glory was greatly concerned, and therefore called his work; or any other work, even all good works, which the Lord commands, requires, calls his people to, and ſtrengthens them to perform; which when they do they may be ſaid to abound, and to be fruitful in every good work: and for their encouragement 'tis added, foraſmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord; the labour of ſuch who were in the miniſtry was not in vain, but was by the Lord made uſeful for the converſion of ſinners, and the edification of ſaints, who would be their joy, and crown of rejoicing another day; and which muſt be no ſmall encouragement to labour; and labour in any kind of good work has here its uſefulneſs: it is profitable unto men, and tho' not meritorious of eternal life, yet the good works of the ſaints will follow them; Chriſt will not forget their work and labour of love which they have ſhown to his name and people, but will take notice of them as fruits of his own grace, and beſtow his rewards upon them, tho' not in a way of debt, but of grace; which the doctrine of the reſurrection aſſures of, and encourages to hope for; and ſo muſt be a friend to the practice of good works, as the contrary doctrine muſt be an obſtruction to them.

CHAP. XVI.

THIS chapter concludes the Epiſtle, with ſome directions to the Corinthians concerning a collection for the poor ſaints; with ſome intimations of himſelf, Timothy, and Apollos coming to them, and giving them a viſit; with exhortations to watchfulneſs, conſtancy, courage, and charity; with recommendations of ſome perſons to them mentioned by name; with divers ſalutations of them by himſelf and others; and with his good wiſhes for them. He urges them to make a collection for the poor ſaints, from the example of the churches of Galatia, according to his order, ver. 1. He points out the time when he would have it made, on the firſt day of the week; and the perſons that ſhould contribute to it, every member of the church; and the act of diſtribution, by laying up in ſtore; and the manner, meaſure, and rule of doing it, according as they were bleſſed in providence with temporal things; and the end of it, that there might be no collections to make when the Apoſtle ſhould come among them, ver. 2. and this, when made, and being ready at his coming, he propoſes to ſend to Jeruſalem, by perſons approved of and recommended by them, ver. 3. and that he would alſo go along with them, ſhould it be thought fit and proper, ver. 4. He ſignifies his reſolution of coming and paying them a viſit, when he ſhould paſs thro' Macedonia, ver. 5. when he had ſome thoughts of tarrying with them for a while, at leaſt throughout the winter ſeaſon, ver. 6. in all which he ſubmits to the will of God, ver. 7. The reaſon why he could not come as yet was, becauſe he had determined to ſtay at Epheſus till Pentecoſt, where he now was, ver. 8. and what prevailed upon him to ſtay there was, becauſe there was an opportunity of preaching the Goſpel with a proſpect of ſucceſs; and there were many enemies to hinder it all they could, and therefore the Apoſtle's preſence ſeemed neceſſary, ver. 9. He intimates, that Timothy would come to them ſhortly, and exhorts them to take care of him, and carry it reſpectfully to him; giving this as a reaſon, becauſe he was engaged in the ſame work of the Lord he himſelf was, ver. 10. He enjoins them, that whilſt he ſhould continue with them they would not deſpiſe him on account of his youth; and when he ſhould depart from them, to conduct him in peace to him who was in expectation of him, along with other brethren, ver. 11. and then he excuſes Apollos not coming to them at preſent; and obſerves, that it was not for want of intreaty in him, but for want of will in Apollos, who notwithſtanding would come when a convenient time ſhould offer, ver. 12. Next follow ſeveral exhortations to be upon their watch and guard, to be ſtedfaſt in the doctrine, grace, and profeſſion of faith, and to behave themſelves like men of a truly chriſtian ſpirit and courage, and to do every thing in their church-ſtate in the exerciſe of the grace of love, ver. 13, 14. and then he recommends unto them the family of Stephanas, and exhorts them to have them in reſpect and reverence, and be ſubject to ſuch, and particularly that family; partly becauſe they were the firſt-fruits of his miniſtry, in thoſe parts; and partly becauſe they had given up themſelves to the miniſtry of the ſaints, ver. 15, 16. as alſo becauſe the coming of Stephanas to him, together with two other perſons, named Fortunatus and Achaicus, had made him glad; ſupplied what was lacking in them; had refreſhed his ſpirit and theirs; and therefore ſhould be took notice of, and reſpectfully uſed, ver. 17, 18. And then follow various ſalutations, firſt of the churches of Aſia in general, then of Aquila and Priſcilla, and the church in their houſe, ver. 19. Next of all the brethren at Epheſus, or that were with the Apoſtle, ver. 20. and laſt of all of the Apoſtle himſelf, ver. 21. And the chapter is cloſed with ſeveral wiſhes of different ſorts, and which reſpect different perſons; thoſe that love not Chriſt, and live and die ſo, he wiſhes they may be accurſed at the coming of the Lord, as they will be; and which is mentioned to deter profeſſors of religion from every thing that looked like want of love to Chriſt, whom they profeſſed, ver. 22. as for others, even as many as loved Chriſt, and which he hoped of them all, he wiſhes the grace of Chriſt might be with them, ver. 23. and gives his love to them all, without any diſtinction; and which is to be underſtood not of a natural, but ſpiritual affection, it being in Chriſt, and for his ſake, ver. 24.

Ver. 1. Now concerning the collection for the ſaints, &c.] Not at Corinth, but at Jeruſalem, as appears from ver. 3. for the poor ſaints there, who were reduced to poverty, either through the ſpoiling of their goods by their perſecuting countrymen; or thro' the ſelling of their poſſeſſions, and putting their ſubſtance into one common ſtock, which was now exhauſted, partly by their living upon it, and partly by the expending of it for the enlargement of the intereſt of Chriſt, and the ſpread of his Goſpel among the Gentiles; ſo that it was but fit and reaſonable that they ſhould aſſiſt them in their neceſſitous circumſtances: wherefore the Apoſtle, after he had gone through the various ſubjects he thought fit to write upon, relating both to doctrine and practice, proceeds to give ſome orders, directions, and inſtructions concerning this matter. As I have given orders to the churches of Galatia, ſo alſo do ye. The churches of Galatia were thoſe he wrote an Epiſtle to, which bears their name, and in which he takes notice of the requeſt of the Apoſtles at Jeruſalem to him, that he would remember the poor as he travelled thro' the Gentile countries, and which, no doubt, he mentions, as a hint unto them to collect for them, Gal. ii. 10. tho' the order he here ſpeaks of was doubtleſs given them when he paſſed thro' the region of Galatia, Acts xvi. 6. and xviii. 23. This he obſerves by way of example to the church at Corinth, and to ſhew them, that what he ordered them was no other than what he enjoined other churches, and which they were ready to come into, as theſe in Galatia, and alſo in Macedonia; and deſigns this as a ſpur unto them, that if the Galatians, who were a more rude and uncultivated people, being now called by grace, were ready to ſuch a good work, they who were a more polite people, and uſed to civility, humanity, and tenderneſs, would not be backward to it.

Ver. 2. Upon the firſt day of the week, &c.] In an ancient copy of Beza's, and in ſome others, 'tis added, the Lord's day. Upon ſome one firſt day of the week, or more, if there was a neceſſity for it, until the collection was finiſhed; tho' the Syriac and Arabic verſions render it, every firſt day: but this is not the Apoſtle's intention, that a collection ſhould be made every firſt day, but only on ſome one day, or as long as it was neceſſary; for at the cloſe of the verſe he gives this reaſon for it, that there be no gatherings when I come: whereas, if this collection was to have been every firſt day, and to have been always continued, it muſt have been when he was preſent, as well as when abſent; but this was only deſigned for a certain time, and on a certain account: the reaſon of his fixing upon the firſt day of the week was, becauſe on this day the diſciples of Chriſt, and the primitive churches, met together for divine worſhip, to hear the word, and obſerve the ordinances of Chriſt; ſee John xx. 19, 26. Acts xx. 7. and was a very fit ſeaſon for ſuch a work, when their hearts were warmed with the preſence of God and Chriſt, with the grace of the Spirit, and the doctrines of the Goſpel, and their affections were knit to one another, and to all the ſaints: and ſo we find from the accounts of Juſtin Martyr [w], and of Tertullian [x], that it was uſual for the primitive churches in the age following that of the Apoſtles, after the worſhip of God was over, to collect money for widows, and orphans, and for ſaints in diſtreſs, ſuch as were baniſhed into diſtant parts, or condemned to the mines; and this practice was very agreeable to the cuſtoms of the Apoſtle's countrymen, the Jews, from whence he might take this, who uſed to collect for, and diſtribute to the poor on their ſabbath [y]. "The alms diſh was "every day, but the alms cheſt from evening of "the ſabbath to the evening of the ſabbath." It was collected and diſtributed then, as their commentators ſay [z]. Let every one of you lay by him in ſtore, as God hath proſpered him. The perſons who are to contribute are every one, of every ſex, age, ſtate, and condition, male and female, young and old, ſervants and maſters, the meaner as well as the richer ſort; the poor widow threw in her mite into the treaſury as well as the rich men: the act of communication or diſtribution is ſignified by laying by him in ſtore; for this is not to be underſtood of ſeparating a part of his ſubſtance from the reſt, and laying it up, בביתה, in his own houſe, as the Syriac verſion renders it, or the putting it in his pocket in order to give it; tho' both theſe acts may be neceſſary, as preparatory to the work: but it intends the very act itſelf; for communicating to the poor is laying up in ſtore a good foundation for the time to come; 'tis a laying up treaſure in heaven, and riches there, which will never corrupt: the manner in which this is to be done, and the meaſure of it, as God hath proſpered him; according to the ſucceſs he has in his worldly buſineſs, and the increaſe of his worldly ſubſtance, and which is the way to have it enlarged. The Jews have a ſaying [*], “if a man obſerves his proviſions to be ſtraitened, let him do alms of them, how much more if they are large.” The Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, laying up what pleaſes him well; and the Arabic verſion, what through liberality he pleaſes, and ſhall be convenient for him; for this ought to be a free-will offering, as a matter of bounty and generoſity, and not of covetouſneſs, or of force and neceſſity, but as a man of himſelf has purpoſed in his own heart, and which he does with cheerfulneſs and freedom. That there be no gatherings when I come; who had other work, and greater ſervice to do among them; beſides, he was deſirous of having this collection over and ready when he came, that he might directly ſend it away to Jeruſalem, knowing the preſſing neceſſities of the ſaints there.

Ver. 3. And when I come, &c.] To Corinth, as he intended very quickly: whomſoever you ſhall approve by your letters; that is, ſuch perſons as this church ſhould approve, and chuſe, and fix upon as proper perſons to go with their collection; which approbation and choice they would ſignify by letters to the church, and principal men of it in Jeruſalem, giving them a character as men of probity and faithfulneſs: them will I ſend. The Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions join the phraſe, by letters, to this clauſe; according to which reading the ſenſe is, ſuch as the church ſhould chuſe for this ſervice, the Apoſtle would ſend with letters of commendation from him, to the elders and church at Jeruſalem, recommending them as brethren in the Lord, and to be had in reſpect, and treated in a chriſtian manner by them; to which their being meſſengers from ſuch a church, and having letters from ſo great an Apoſtle; beſides, the buſineſs they ſhould come about would intitle them to, which was to bring your liberality, or grace, unto Jeruſalem; meaning the money collected for the poor ſaints there; which he calls grace, becauſe it was owing to the goodneſs of God, that they were in a capacity to contribute to others, and to the grace of God that they had a heart to do it; and becauſe it was in a free and gracious manner, and in the exerciſe of grace, of faith in Chriſt, and love to the ſaints, that they did it, and with a view to the glory of the grace of God, of which this was a fruit and evidence.

Ver. 4. And if it be meet that I go alſo, &c.] If it ſhould be convenient for me to go, or it ſhould be thought proper and expedient that I ſhould go; or, as the Syriac verſion renders it, if this work ſhould be worthy that I ſhould go; and the Arabic verſion, if the thing ſhould be worthy to go with me; that is, their beneficence; if ſo large a collection ſhould be made, that it will be worthy of an Apoſtle to go along with it, hereby artfully preſſing them to a good collection: they ſhall go with me; that is, thoſe brethren whom the church ſhall approve and ſend; for he would not go alone, nor propoſe it, to remove all ſuſpicion of converting any money to his own uſe.

Ver. 5. Now I will come unto you, &c.] Which he again aſſures them of, as being his real intention and deſign; tho' ſome had given out that he would not come to them any more, and hoped they ſhould never ſee him more; ſee ch. iv. 18, 19. When I ſhall paſs thro' Macedonia; hereby fixing the time when he intended to viſit them after he had gone thro' that country, and had received their collections for the ſaints at Jeruſalem, which the churches there ſo generouſly made, and preſſed him to the miniſtring of, of which he ſpeaks in his next Epiſtle. For I do paſs thro' Macedonia; not that he was then paſſing through Macedonia, or was in it, and ſo at Philippi, from whence this Epiſtle is ſaid to be written, as the ſubſcription at the end of it expreſſes, for he was now at Epheſus; ſee ver. 8. and from thence was this Epiſtle written; he was not in Macedonia till ſome time after, ſee 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13. but the ſenſe is, that he ſhould take his tour through Macedonia; and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it, for I ſhall paſs thro' Macedonia; and ſo coming into Greece, he intended to come to Corinth, and ſtay ſome time with them.

Ver. 6. And it may be that I will abide, &c.] He could not be certain what calls in providence he might have to ſome other places, where his preſence would be neceſſary: yea, and winter with you; ſtay all winter with them, for the ſpace of three months, as we read he did in Greece, Acts xx. 1, 2, 3. That ye may bring me on my journey whitherſoever I go; both by accompanying him in perſon themſelves, in token of honour and reſpect, and by provding things neceſſary for his journey; ſee Acts xv. 3. and xxi. 5.

Ver. 7. For I will not ſee you now by the way, &c.] Juſt to look upon them, and be gone, be like a wayfaring man that tarries but for a night: but I truſt to tarry a while with you; the whole winter ſeaſon: if the Lord permit; ſubmitting all to the will of God, at whoſe ſovereign diſpoſal he always was, and at whoſe beck and command he deſired to be, and to do nothing, or be any where, but what was agreeable to the will of God.

Ver. 8. But I will tarry at Epheſus till Pentecoſt. The feaſt of weeks, or of harveſt, which was fifty days from the paſſover; ſee the note on Acts ii. 1. which tho' abrogated at the death of Chriſt, was obſerved by the Jews, and is mentioned by the Apoſtle, not as a feſtival that the Chriſtians were obliged to regard, or did regard, but as pointing out the time he intended to ſtay at Epheſus: and we elſewhere read, that he was greatly deſirous of being at Jeruſalem on the day of Pentecoſt, Acts xx. 16. not to keep it, but becauſe there would then be abundance of people from all parts there, to whom he ſhould have an opportunity of preaching the Goſpel.

Ver. 9. For a great door, &c.] Meaning an opportunity of miniſtring the word at Epheſus, a very populous city, and where he might have hope great good would be done. Some think that by this fair opportunity, or hopeful proſpect, he means the populouſneſs of the city; others, the converſion of ſome great men in it, which had made way for the introduction of the Goſpel there: but it ſeems rather to intend the deſire that there appeared in many perſons here to have the Goſpel preached unto them; they flocked unto it; their hearts were opened to attend to it, and great numbers believed; and the Apoſtle found a door of utterance in himſelf, and a door of entrance in them, which were reaſons with him to tarry here. And effectual is opened to me; not by him, but to him: this door was opened by him who has the key of David, that opens, and no man ſhuts; and the door of faith being opened by him, it was effectual to the quickening of ſinners dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, to the enlightening of blind eyes, unſtopping of deaf ears, and ſoftening hard hearts; to the turning of ſouls from the power of ſatan to God, to the quickening, comforting, and eſtabliſhing of ſaints, and indeed deed to ſalvation to all that believe; which is the caſe when the word comes, not in word only, but in power; then it works effectually in them that believe; and ſince there was an opportunity of preaching the Goſpel, with ſuch good effect, the Apoſtle was deſirous of making uſe of it: and there are many adverſaries; as there always are where the Goſpel is preached, and eſpecially with ſucceſs, when ſinners are converted, and ſaints are edified and comforted. The adverſary ſatan roars, and the poſſe of devils under him are employed one way or another to obſtruct the Goſpel if poſſible; falſe teachers are raiſed up to oppoſe it, and profane men are inſtigated by him to perſecute the preachers and profeſſors of it: ſo it was at Epheſus, the Jews diſputed againſt it, and ſpoke evil of it; Demetrius the ſilverſmith, and thoſe of his craft, roſe up in a tumultuous manner, crying, great is Diana of the Epheſians, ſtirring up the people againſt the Apoſtle, and his companions; all which he had ſome fore views of, and found to be true by experience, as may be ſeen in Acts xix. and which, tho' to another man would have been a reaſon to have departed, was a reaſon with him to ſtay; to bear his teſtimony to the Goſpel, to appear in the defence of it, againſt the diſputers of this world, and to ſtrengthen and eſtabliſh the minds of weak believers in it, who might have been in ſome danger thro' ſo many adverſaries; wherefore he ſaw and judged, that his preſence was neceſſary, and that it was proper for him to ſtay the time he mentions.

Ver. 10. Now if Timotheus come, &c.] The Apoſtle had ſent him already, as appears from ch. iv. 17. and he was now gone from him; but whether he might not be prevented by unforeſeen incidents in his journey, he could not ſay; and therefore ſpeaks cautiouſly of his coming; from whence 'tis evident, that this Epiſtle was not ſent by Timothy, as the ſubſcription to it ſuggeſts. See that he may be with you without fear; ſhould he come to them, the Apoſtle deſires they would take care of him, that he might be ſafe and ſecure from enemies of every ſort, of which there were many at Corinth; who, as they were of a malignant diſpoſition to him, would uſe a diſciple of his ill: and theſe were not only, or ſo much, infidels and prophane ſinners, but falſe teachers, and the factions under them, and eſpecially they of the circumciſion. For he worketh the work of the Lord, as I alſo do; which is a reaſon why they ſhould be careful of him, that nobody moleſt him, and put him into fear; ſince though he was not in ſo high an office as the Apoſtle, yet he was called to the ſame work of the miniſtry, was engaged in the ſame ſervice of Chriſt, and was zealous in promoting the ſame common cauſe, intereſt, and kingdom of the redeemer, and faithfully preached the ſame Goſpel as the Apoſtle did; and therefore would doubtleſs meet with the ſame enemies, and be in the ſame danger.

Ver. 11. Let no man therefore deſpiſe him, &c.] On account of his youth; ſee 1 Tim. iv. 12. or neglect to take care of him, which would be to deſpiſe him, ſince he was employed in ſuch an honourable work, equally as the Apoſtle himſelf: hence it is manifeſt, that as the lives of Goſpel-miniſters ought to be defended and ſecured by thoſe to whom they miniſter, their perſons ought to be treated with eſteem and reſpect. But conduct him forth in peace; when he takes his leave, wiſh him all happineſs and proſperity, accompany him ſome part of the way in his journey, and provide things neceſſary for him; all which uſed to be done to ſuch who laboured in the word and doctrine, and were counted worthy of double honour; and ſuch an one Timothy was judged by the Apoſtle to be: that he may come unto me; at Epheſus, where he now was, in peace and ſafety, and relate to him the ſtate and condition of the church; their ſtedfaſtneſs in the faith, their care of him, and the reſpect they had ſhown him; all which would be grateful to the Apoſtle: for I look for him with the brethren; that is, either the brethren that were with the Apoſtle were in earneſt expectation of him, together with himſelf; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion reads, for our brethren with me have expected him; or elſe that he looked for him along with the brethren, that either went with him, or ſhould come with him from Corinth, being ſent by the church.

Ver. 12. As touching our brother Apollos, &c.] Who was a ſenior man to Timothy, an eloquent preacher, one who had been at Corinth, and was well known to the ſaints there, and greatly approved by many of them; wherefore the Apoſtle excuſes it, that he ſhould ſend the one, and not the other, and ſhews that it was no fault of his: for, ſays he, I greatly deſired him to come unto you with the brethren; who ſeem to be Timotheus and Eraſtus, ſee Acts xix. 22. He greatly importuned him to go along with them, knowing how acceptable he would be among them, and hoping he might be of great uſe to them in compoſing their differences, and rectifying their diſorders. But his will was not at all to come at this time; or it was not the will; that is, of God, as ſome ſupply it, for him to come now; or he had no mind himſelf, nor could he be perſuaded; he had reaſons to himſelf why he judged it not proper to come at preſent: however, for their encouragement it is added, but he will come when he ſhall have convenient time; he is not averſe to coming, but ſome things at preſent hinder him; when he has a ſuitable opportunity he'll make uſe of it.

Ver. 13. Watch ye, &c.] The Apoſtle in the mean while, before he cloſes his Epiſtle, thinks fit to give ſome proper and pertinent exhortations, which might be of general uſe to this church; and firſt exhorts them to watchfulneſs, not for the coming of Apollos, and a convenient ſeaſon for that; but over themſelves, over their hearts, thoughts, affections, words, actions, and their whole converſations; and over one another, that they go not into bad principles, and evil practices; and alſo againſt ſin in general, every appearance, and the firſt motions of it, and particularly unbelief; and againſt ſatan, and his temptations, who is an indefatigable enemy, and whoſe wiles, devices, and ſtratagems are many and cunning; and againſt the world, its charms and ſnares; and likewiſe againſt falſe teachers, who lie in wait to deceive, and therefore to be guarded againſt; many of which were among theſe Corinthians, and made this exhortation very neceſſary. It became them likewiſe to watch daily at wiſdom's gates, to wait conſtantly upon God in the word and ordinances, and eſpecially to watch unto prayer, and in it, and after it; to all which 'tis neceſſary that they ſhould be awake, and not aſleep, to which the wiſe as well as fooliſh virgins are ſubject; that they ſhould be ſober, and not be overcharged with ſurfeiting and drunkenneſs, and the cares of this life; and that they be in their proper ſtation, on their watch-tower, keeping a good look-out, and being ready armed, to attack an enemy when deſcried. Many are the reaſons why the ſaints ſhould be upon their watch and guard; as becauſe they have many eyes upon them; the eyes of the omniſcient God are upon them, who ſees and takes notice of all their actions; the eyes of angels are upon them, and even in their ſolemn aſſemblies; the eyes of ſaints are upon them, tho' watching for their good; and the eyes of evil men for their halting; and the eyes of devils are upon them, waiting an opportunity to do them hurt and miſchief, if poſſible. Moreover, unwatchfulneſs expoſes to many evils, temptations, and ſnares; to which may be added, as an inducement to watchfulneſs, the uncertainty of Chriſt's coming either at death, or to judgment. Stand faſt in the faith; which is proper to thoſe that are watchful; for men aſleep can't well ſtand. This exhortation may reſpect either ſtanding in the grace of faith, in oppoſition to doubting and unbelief, and deſign a continuance in the exerciſe of it, notwithſtanding all the corruptions of nature, and the various ſins and infirmities of life, the frequent temptations of ſatan, and the many afflictions and trials in the world, which may occaſion diffidence and diſtruſt; for ſtanding in this grace, and in ſuch a conſtant exerciſe of it, greatly glorifies God, is what is well-pleaſing in his ſight; and in this way ſaints have communion with God, peace and comfort in their ſouls, and much ſpiritual joy and pleaſure: it is the grace by which they ſtand, and therefore ſhould ſtand in it, and by which they overcome the world. Or elſe it may intend ſtanding in the doctrine of faith, in oppoſition to a departure from it, or a giving up any part of it, or wavering about it; it becomes ſaints to be ſtedfaſt in it, and abide by it, whoever is againſt it; let them be ever ſo many, or ever ſo wiſe and learned, and whatever may be ſaid againſt it, as that it is a novel one, a licentious one, and a ſett of irrational principles, and whatever is the oppoſition that is made againſt it, tho' bonds and afflictions, reproach and perſecution in every ſhape attend it, yet none of theſe things ſhould move them from it. Perhaps that particular doctrine of faith, the reſurrection of the dead, may be greatly regarded. Moreover, ſtanding in the profeſſion of faith, both of the grace and doctrine of faith, may be intended; for as this is to be made, it is to be held faſt, and ſtood faſt in, without wavering, by all true believers, who have great encouragement ſo to do from the perſon and grace of Chriſt, and from the love and faithfulneſs of God, and the many gracious promiſes he has made. Wherefore, quit yourſelves like men, be ſtrong; a like phraſe is often uſed by the Septuagint interpreters, as in Deut. xxxi. 6, 23. Joſ. i. 6, 7, 9, 18. and x. 25. 2 Sam. x. 12. 1 Chron. xxii. 13. and xxviii. 20. 2 Chron. xxxii. 7. and Dan. x. 19. from whence the Apoſtle ſeems to have taken it. It anſwers to the Hebrew word התאששו, in Iſ. xlvi. 8. Quit you like men; like men of wiſdom and underſtanding; be not like children for nonproficiency, inſtability, and weakneſs; ſee ch. xiv. 20. act the part of men; believe not every ſpirit; be not carried and toſſed about with every wind of doctrine; ſearch the ſcriptures, and try every doctrine by them; and having found what is truth abide by it, and be proficients in it, inſtructing and eſtabliſhing yourſelves and others. In which ſenſe the Jews uſe this phraſe, ſaying [b], "in a place where there are no men, השתדל להיות איש, ſtudy to be a man, or to ſhew thyſelf a man;" which one of their commentators [c] explains thus; "uſe and accuſtom thyſelf to obtain excellent things, and afterwards when there are no wiſe men to teach, then do thou teach thyſelf." And another [d] after this manner; "in the place where there is no man to ſit at the head and teach doctrines," do thou. Or play the man, as in 2 Sam. x. 12. act like men of valour and courage, ſtand faſt, keep your ground, and contend earneſtly for the faith; be valiant for the truth on earth; fight the good fight of faith: it is a good cauſe believers are engaged in; they have a good captain and commander at the head of them; they are provided with good weapons, may be ſure of victory, and of having the crown of righteouſneſs, life, and glory: wherefore be ſtrong; that is, for the faith: ſo the Targumiſt on Jer. ix. 3. renders the phraſe, they are not valiant for the truth, לא להימנותא תקיפו, they are not ſtrong for the faith: be ſtrong; not in themſelves, but in the Lord, and in the power of his might; in the grace that is in Chriſt Jeſus; believe in him, look to him for ſtrength as well as righteouſneſs; truſt in his power, whoſe arm is not ſhortened; depend on his grace, which is always ſufficient; take heart, be of good courage, and fear no enemy; ſee Joſh. i. 6. which ſeems to be particularly referr'd to here.

Ver. 14. Let all your things be done with charity.] Signifying, that the whole of their obedience to Chriſt, their obſervation of, and ſubjection to all his ordinances and commands, ſhould ſpring from, and be done in love to him; and that the whole of their conduct and behaviour towards one another ought to be with charity, which bears all things, and covers a multitude of ſins; and that all their church affairs, their buſineſs at church meetings, ſhould be tranſacted, not with ſtrife and vain glory, but in peace, and with mutual affection, with a concern for the good of each other, and of the whole body, and for the glory of God; for without charity or love, and the exerciſe of this grace, it ſignifies little, what men either have or do; and ſuch an exhortation was the more neceſſary to this church, ſince it was ſo full of factions, contentions, and diviſions.

Ver. 15. I beſeech you, brethren, &c.] Intreat or exhort you as brethren in the Lord; this intreaty or exhortation, is to ſubmiſſion to fellow-helpers and labourers in the miniſtry, more particularly expreſſed in the following verſe, after the Apoſtle has given a character of the houſhold of Stephanas, who are principally intended, and which contains reaſons and arguments why they ſhould be ſubmitted to; and which account ſtands in the following parentheſis, ye know the houſe of Stephanas; a perſon of note at Corinth, whom the Apoſtle had baptized, together with his family, 1 Cor. i. 16. The Vulgate Latin verſion, and ſome copies, add, and of Fortunatus and Achaicus, perſons mentioned along with Stephanas, in ver. 17. that it is the firſt fruits of Achaia: this family was one of the firſt in the regions of Achaia, of which Corinth was the metropolis that believed in Chriſt; theſe were ſome of the firſt inſtances of converſion, and who received the firſt-fruits of the Spirit in theſe parts, and by the grace of God had been enabled to perſevere hitherto, and were worthy of reſpect: the ſame he ſays of Epenetus, in Rom. xvi. 5. and that they have addicted themſelves to the miniſtry of the ſaints; that is, either to miniſter to the wants of poor ſaints, whether out of their own ſubſtance, or the churches ſtock, being deacons, or to miniſter to the ſaints by preaching the Goſpel; which good work they deſired, willingly gave up themſelves to, and chearfully engaged in, and took the overſight and care of the flock, not by conſtraint, but willingly; not that they thruſt themſelves into an office, or came into it in an irregular way, but being called unto it in an orderly manner by the church, and inveſted with it, they applied to the execution of it with great heartineſs, diligence, and zeal, and ſo were very deſerving of due reſpect, as next mentioned.

Ver. 16. That ye ſubmit yourſelves to ſuch, &c.] To perſons of ſuch a character, and in ſuch an office; if in miniſtring to poor ſaints, by aſſiſting them, and by putting into their hands, and putting it in their power to diſcharge their work fully, in which they were ſo heartily concerned; and if in the work of the miniſtry of the word, by attending their miniſtrations, receiving the truths delivered by them with faith and love, ſo far as they appeared to be agreeable to the word of God; hearkening to their admonitions, counſels, and advice, regarding their cenſures and reprooofs by the authority of the church, and in their name, and by ſubjection to the laws of Chriſt's houſe, as put in execution by them, ſee Heb. xiii. 17. and to every one that helpeth with us; in any form, whether by relieving the poor, or by preaching the Goſpel: and laboureth; in the Lord's vineyard, in the word and doctrine, for the good of ſouls, and the glory of Chriſt: for ſuch are worthy of double honour, and ought to be valued and eſteemed for their works ſake, and ſubmitted to in every thing that is according to the rules of the Goſpel.

Ver. 17. I am glad of the coming of Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, &c.] Who very probably were thoſe of the houſhold of Chloe, mentioned in ch. i. 11. who came either of their own accord, or were ſent as meſſengers from the church at Corinth to the Apoſtle; who was glad to ſee them, one of them being baptized by him, and perhaps all of them converted under his miniſtry: however, they were believers in Chriſt, if not miniſters of the Goſpel, which ſeems very probable. For that which was lacking on your part they have ſupplied; which is not to be underſtood of their ſupplying him with money, in which the Corinthians had been deficient; for as he had never taken any thing of them, he was determined he never would; ſee 2 Cor. xi. 7, 8, 9, 10. and xii. 13, 14. but either of their preſence which ſupplied the want of theirs, the Apoſtle had been for ſome time greatly deſirous of; or whereas they had been greatly wanting in ſending him an account of the ſtate of the church, and how things ſtood with them, theſe brethren greatly ſupplied that defect, by giving him a very particular account of their church affairs.

Ver. 18. For they have refreſhed my ſpirit, &c.] By their coming and preſence; the very ſight of them gave him joy and pleaſure, and more ſo their chriſtian diſcourſe and converſation, and eſpecially the account they brought of this church; for though there were many things in it which were very diſagreeable, and were the occaſion of this epiſtle, yet there were others related, which were exceedingly pleaſing to the Apoſtle, and revived his ſpirit, which had been greatly depreſſed by what he might have heard of them from another quarter, and through fear that it was worſe with them than it really was; for by theſe brethren he underſtood, that there were many in the church that had great grace, and large gifts beſtowed on them, ſo that they came behind none in theſe things; and were ſtedfaſt in the faith of the Goſpel, and with vigour oppoſed the falſe teachers; and in all things ſought the welfare of the church, and the intereſt of Chriſt; and this was good news to the Apoſtle, and which exhilarated his ſpirit: and he adds, and yours; his ſpirit and theirs in divine things, being the ſame; they were of one heart and ſoul; they had the ſame love, and were of one accord, and of one mind; ſo that what was grateful to the one, was ſo to the other: or his ſenſe is, that when theſe brethren ſhould return, and acquaint the church how the ſpirit of the Apoſtle was revived, and refreſhed with the narrative they gave him of the affairs of the church, their ſpirits would be alſo refreſhed too. Dr. Hammond thinks that this phraſe is taken out of the Greek tranſlation of Zech. vi. 8. have quieted my ſpirit, which the Septuagint interpret by ανεπαυσαν τον ϑυμον μȣ, they ſtilled, or cauſed my wrath to ceaſe; and in the ſame way Jarchi, Aben Ezra, and Kimchi explain the words; but the Apoſtle's phraſe is nearer to the original itſelf of that text, הניחו את רוחי, they have ſtilled, or cauſed my ſpirit to reſt; and is the very ſame phraſe, the Syriac verſion uſes here; and which the Chaldee paraphraſe renders thus, עבידו ית רעותי, they have done my will; that which was agreeable and well pleaſing to God; and ſo theſe brethren by their coming and company, and news they brought, did that which was grateful and ſatisfactory to the Apoſtle: and the phraſe of the ſpirit of man having reſt from another, is often uſed in the Rabbinical writings, for having ſatisfaction in them, and approving of them; ſo they ſay [e], “ שרוח הבריות נוחה הימנו, “ that every one from whom the ſpirit of men have “ reſt, the Spirit of God has reſt; and every one
“ from whom the ſpirit of man has no reſt, the “ Spirit of God has no reſt:” and which their commentators [f] explain thus, “ whoever is beloved “ below, 'tis manifeſt that he is beloved above:” therefore acknowledge ye them that are ſuch; as theſe men; know them, have an affection for them, ſhew reſpect to them, highly eſteem of them for their works ſake; ſee 1 Theſſ. v. 12, 13.

Ver. 19. The churches of Aſia ſalute you, &c.] The Syriac verſion renders it, all the churches. This ſhows, that this epiſtle was not written from Philippi, as the ſubſcription to it atteſts, for then he would rather have ſaid, the churches of Macedonia ſalute you, but at Epheſus, where he now was; ſee ver. 8. and this is the more confirmed, by the following ſalutation of Aquila and Priſcilla, who 'tis plain from Acts xviii. 18, 19, 26. were with the Apoſtle at Epheſus: Aquila and Priſcilla ſalute you much in the Lord; Aquila was a Jew of Pontus, and Priſcilla was his wife, who came from Italy, all Jews being obliged to depart from Rome, by the order of Claudius Cæſar. Theſe came to Corinth, where they met with the Apoſtle; and being of the ſame occupation, ſtaid and wrought with him; and when he went from thence to Epheſus, accompanied him thither; ſee Acts xviii. 2, 3, 18, 19. wherefore having perſonal knowledge of the members of this church, through their ſtay with the Apoſtle there, for the ſpace of a year and a half, ſend their chriſtian ſalutations to them, with great affection and reſpect: with the church that is in their houſe; their family conſiſting of believers, and being kept in ſuch good decorum, and employed daily in ſinging, praying, expounding, and conferring together about divine things, looked like a little church; and it may be that at certain times, the principal members of the church at Epheſus, met in their houſe for religious worſhip, and to conſider and debate about the affairs of the church; and very likely as they were of the ſame occupation with the Apoſtle, he himſelf dwelt here; and which might be the more an occaſion of the church aſſembling here at times; and the Vulgate Latin verſion adds, with whom alſo I lodge.

Ver. 20. All the brethren greet you, &c.] Either the brethren, the members of the church at Epheſus; or the Apoſtle's brethren in the miniſtry, that were along with him, as Soſthenes and others; or the brethren that were come to him from Corinth, namely Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus: greet ye one another with an holy kiſs; ſee the note on Rom. xvi. 16.

Ver. 21. The ſalutation of me Paul with mine own hand.] The Apoſtle had an amanuenſis, that wrote the epiſtle for him; but to prevent counterfeits, and that the church to whom he wrote, might be aſſured of the genuineneſs of the epiſtle, that it was truly his own, he wrote with his own hand, his common ſalutation; ſee 2 Theſſ. iii. 17, 18. and which is not in the following words, but what is expreſſed in ver. 23.

Ver. 22. If any man love not the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] The Vulgate Latin, and the Syriac and Ethiopic verſions, read our Lord. The Apoſtle here does not ſo much mean profane and unregenerate ſinners, who are deſtitute of love to Chriſt, from ignorance of him; nor ſuch who from the ſame principle, might perſecute him in his members, for ſuch are to be even prayed for, and wiſhed well unto; and oftentimes ſuch are called by grace, and become true and ſincere lovers of Chriſt; and the Apoſtle himſelf was an inſtance of it: ſome think the Jews are intended, who were the mortal enemies of Chriſt; hated his name and perſon, his Goſpel and intereſt, and maliciouſly perſecuted the ſame; they called Jeſus accurſed, and therefore deſerved an anathema to be pronounced on them; it was propheſied of them, that their name ſhould be left for a curſe; and it was threatned to them, in caſe of non-repentance, upon the coming of John the Baptiſt, in the ſpirit of Elijah, that the Lord would come and ſmite their land with a curſe; which had its accompliſhment in the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; ſee Iſa. lxv. 15. Mal. iv. 6. others think the Gnoſticks are intended, one of whoſe tenets was, that it was lawful not to confeſs Chriſt in a time of perſecution, in order to ſave themſelves; and ſuch might be truly ſaid not to love our Lord Jeſus, and on whom ſuch an anathema as after mentioned, might rightly be denounced: though it ſhould ſeem rather, that ſome perſons in this church, or that infeſted it, are referred to as the falſe teachers, and thoſe who ſided with them, who made factions and diviſions in the church of Chriſt; allowed themſelves in the commiſſion of fornication and inceſt, and ſuch like impurities; had no regard to the peace of the conſciences of weak brethren, but laid ſtumbling-blocks in their way; behaved in a very irreverent manner at the Lord's table, and gave in to very pernicious errors and hereſies, particularly denying the reſurrection of the dead; and by their many bad principles and practices, plainly ſhowed that they did not in deed and in truth, love our Lord Jeſus: wherefore of every ſuch an one the Apoſtle ſays, let him be anathema. The word anathema, anſwers to the Hebrew חרם, and is rendered by it here in the Syriac verſion; and ſignifies any thing ſeparated and devoted to holy uſes; and ſo it is uſed by the Septuagint, in Lev. xxvii. 28. and in the New Teſtament, Luke xxi. 5. and which, if alienated to any other purpoſes, entailed a curſe on perſons; hence it is often tranſlated accurſed, as in Rom. ix. 5. 1 Cor. xii. 3. Gal. i. 8, 9. and here it ſignifies, that ſuch perſons that love not the Lord Jeſus, ſhould be rejected by the ſaints, and ſeparated from their communion; and ſo the Arabic verſion renders it, let him be ſeparated; that is, from the church; let him be caſt out of it, and cut off from it; as, ſo living and dying without love to Chriſt, he will be accurſed by him at the laſt day, and will have that awful ſentence denounced on him, go ye curſed. The Apoſtle adds another word, about which there is ſome difficulty, maranatha; ſome make this to be the ſame with anathema, the one being the Syriac, the other the Greek word, as Abba, father; and think that maranatha is put for, מחרמתא, maharamatha; others think that it is the ſame with, מחרונאתא, maharonatha, which ſignifies from wrath to come; and being joined with the other word, intends an anathematizing, or devoting perſons to wrath to come: others take it to be the laſt, and worſe ſort of excommunication among the Jews; and obſerve, that the firſt ſort was called נדוי, Niddui, which was a ſeparation from company and converſation, to which reference may be had in Luke vi. 22. the ſecond ſort was called, חרם, Cherem, to which anathema anſwers, and was a ſeparation, attended with curſes and imprecations; and a third ſort was called, שמתא, Shammatha, and is thought to anſwer to maranatha, giving the etymology of it, as if it was, שם אתא, the name, i. e. God cometh, as maranatha read as two words, ſignify our Lord cometh: but this is not the etymology the Jews give of Shammatha [g]; they aſk, "what is Shammatha? ſays Rab, שם מיתה, there "is death; and Samuel ſays, שממה יהיה, deſola"tion ſhall be;" but of the other etymology, there is no mention made among them; nor is ever the word maranatha, uſed by them for excommunication; the ſenſe of which certainly is, our Lord cometh; and the Ethiopic verſion joining it with the former word, renders the whole thus, let him be anathema in the coming of our Lord, which ſeems to be pretty much the ſenſe of the Apoſtle: it is beſt to conſider this word, or rather theſe two words, maran atha, our Lord cometh, as added by the Apoſtle, to put perſons in mind of the coming of Chriſt, either at the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, to take vengeance on the Jews, who did not love, but hated him, and maliciouſly perſecuted him, and his; or of the ſecond coming of Chriſt to judgment, when all the wicked of the earth ſhall be accurſed by him, and all ſuch that love him not, will be bid to depart from him.

Ver. 23. The grace of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt be with you.] This is the Apoſtle's ſalutation in all his epiſtles, and is a token of the truth and genuineneſs of them; ſee the note on Rom. xvi. 20. and is a wiſh for a ſupply of all grace from Chriſt, and an increaſe of it in the ſaints; that they may have the communications of it to them, to quicken, invigorate, and draw forth into exerciſe the grace they have received, and to enable and aſſiſt them in the diſcharge of every duty.

Ver. 24. My love be with you all, &c.] Meaning either that he deſired that he might be loved by them, as they were by him, and might always have a place in their hearts and affections, as they had in his; or that his love which extended to all of them without exception, to rich and poor, greater or leſſer believers, might be always acceptable to them; and which he now commended to them, and ſaluted them with, from his very heart: and that it might not be thought to be a carnal affection, or on account of any outward things, he adds in Chriſt Jeſus; he loved them for Chriſt's ſake, becauſe they were his, had his grace beſtowed on them, his image inſtamped upon them, and his Spirit put within them; and concludes as uſual, with an Amen; both by way of requeſt, and for the ſake of confirmation; deſiring that ſo it might be, and believing that ſo it would be. The following ſubſcription is added, not by the Apoſtle, but by ſome other hand ſince. The firſt epiſtle to the Corinthians was written from Philippi, by Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, and Timotheus; but, as has been already obſerved, this epiſtle was not written from Philippi, but from Epheſus, where the Apoſtle now was, as appears from ver. 8. nor was it ſent by Timotheus, for he was ſent out before the writing of this epiſtle, ſee ch. iv. 17. and the Apoſtle puts an if upon his coming to them, in ch. xvi. 10. which he would ſcarcely have done, if he had ſent this letter by him; though very probably it was ſent by the other three, who came from Corinth, at their return thither.

AN EXPOSITION, &c.

The Second Epiſtle of PAUL the Apoſtle to the CORINTHIANS.

THIS Epiſtle, according to the ſubſcription at the end of it, was written from Philippi of Macedonia; and though the ſubſcriptions annexed to the Epiſtles are not always to be depended on, yet it ſeems very likely that this was written from thence; for the Apoſtle not finding Titus at Troas, as he expected, went into Macedonia, where he met with him, and had an account from him of the ſucceſs of his firſt Epiſtle; of the ſtate and condition of the church, and of the temper and diſpoſition of mind in which the members of it were, and which gave him great ſatisfaction; upon which he immediately wrote this ſecond Epiſtle, and ſent it by the ſame perſon to them; ſee ch. ii. 12, 13. and vii. 5, 6, 7. and viii. 6, 16, 17, 18. It is very probable it might be written the year after the former; and ſo it is placed by Dr. Lightfoot in the year 56, as the former is in the year 55; tho' ſome place this in the year 60, and the other in 59. The occaſion of this Epiſtle was partly to excuſe his not coming to them according to promiſe, and to vindicate himſelf from the charge of unfaithfulneſs, levity, and inconſtancy on that account; and partly, ſince what he had wrote about the inceſtuous perſon, had had a good effect both upon him and them, to direct them to take off the cenſure that had been laid upon him, and reſtore him to their communion, and comfort him; likewiſe to ſtir them up to finiſh the collection for the poor ſaints, they had begun; as alſo to defend himſelf againſt the calumnies of the falſe teachers, who were very induſtrious to ſink his character and credit in this church; which he does by obſerving the doctrines of the Goſpel he preached, which were far more glorious than, and abundantly preferable to, the miniſtration of the law of Moſes, which thoſe men deſired to be teachers of; as likewiſe the ſucceſs of his miniſtry in every place; the many ſufferings he had underwent for the ſake of Chriſt, and his Goſpel; the high favours and privileges he had received of the Lord, as well as the ſigns, wonders, and miracles done by him in proof of his Apoſtleſhip; and in which are interſperſed many things uſeful and inſtructive.

CHAP. I.

THIS chapter contains the inſcription of the Epiſtle, the ſalutation of the perſons to whom it is written, the preface to it, and the firſt part of it, in which is the Apoſtle's defence of himſelf from the charge of fickleneſs and inconſtancy. The inſcription is in ver. 1. in which an account is given of the perſon, the writer of this Epiſtle, by his name Paul, and by his office, an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, which is aſcribed to the will of God as the ſpring and cauſe of it; and with himſelf he joins Timothy, whom he calls a brother: alſo an account is given of the perſons to whom the Epiſtle is inſcribed, who are both the church at Corinth, and all the ſaints throughout the region of Achaia, of which Corinth was the chief city: the ſalutation, and which is common to all the Epiſtles of the Apoſtle Paul, is in ver. 2. and the preface begins ver. 3. with a thankſgiving to God, who is deſcribed by the relation he ſtands in to Chriſt, as his Father, by the manifold mercies and bleſſings he is the author and donor of, and by the conſolation he adminiſters; an inſtance of which is given, ver. 4. in the Apoſtle and his companions, who had been comforted by him; the end of which was, that they might be inſtruments of comforting others in like troubles with the ſame conſolations; the great goodneſs of God in which, is illuſtrated by proportioning their conſolation by Chriſt to their ſufferings for him, ver. 5. and the end both of their afflictions and their comforts is repeated and explained; and by a dilemma it is ſhewn, that both were for the good of the ſaints at Corinth, ver. 6. and a ſtrong aſſurance is given, that as they ſhared in ſufferings for Chriſt, they would partake of conſolation by him as they had done, ver. 7. Next the Apoſtle, in proof of what he had ſaid, gives an inſtance of the trouble he had been in, and of the comfort and deliverance he had received, which he would not have the Corinthians ignorant of: he mentions the place where it was, in Aſia, and gives an account of the nature of the affliction, how great it was; it was out of meaſure, above the ſtrength of man, and induced deſpair of life, ver. 8. ſo that the Apoſtle, and thoſe that were with him in it, expected nothing but death, and were under the ſentence of it in their own apprehenſions; the end of God in ſuffering which, was to take them off of all ſelf-confidence, and to engage their truſt in God, to which the conſideration of his power in raiſing the dead is a ſtrong argument, ver. 9. And indeed this deliverance which God wrought for the Apoſtle, and his friends, was a deliverance as it were from death, and a very great one; and which had this effect upon them, the deſigned and deſired end, truſt and confidence in God for future deliverance, having had an experience of paſt and preſent, ver. 10. which deliverance the Apoſtle acknowledges was owing to the prayers of the Corinthians, as a means or helping cauſe of it; and which favour was beſtowed thereby for this end, that as it came by the means of many, thanks might be returned by many for it, ver. 11. And the reaſon why the Apoſtle, and his fellow-miniſters, had ſuch an intereſt in the prayers of the Corinthians, was their agreeable converſation in the world, and particularly at Corinth, which their conſciences bore witneſs to, and they could reflect upon with pleaſure; it being thro' the grace of God with great ſimplicity and ſincerity, and not with carnal craft and ſubtlety: or this is mentioned by the Apoſtle to remove the charge of levity, and to vindicate himſelf and others from it, ver. 12. which he next enters upon, premiſing that the conſtant courſe of their lives were ſuch as before deſcribed, and which there was no reaſon to doubt would always continue ſuch; for the truth of which he appeals to what they had ſeen, and owned to be in them, ver. 13. and that it was acknowledged, at leaſt in part, that the Apoſtles were their rejoicing, or of whom they boaſted as to their conduct and converſation, even as they were perſuaded they would be matter of rejoicing in the day of Chriſt to them, ver. 14. And then the Apoſtle acknowledges his intention and promiſe of coming to them, which was in confidence of their value for him, and of their being real chriſtians, and perſevering ones; and for this end, that he might eſtabliſh them in the grace which they had received, ver. 15. and alſo, after he had paſſed by them into Macedonia, and was returned from thence to them again, that he might be helped on by them in his journey to Jeruſalem, with the collection for the poor ſaints there, ver. 15. But then he denies that he uſed levity, or carnal policy and purpoſes, or was guilty of any contradiction; all which he expreſſes by certain interrogations, ver. 17. which he confirms by the miniſtration of the Goſpel among them, which was all of a-piece, without contradiction, for the truth of which he calls God to witneſs; and ſo argues from the uniformity of his miniſtry, to the conſtancy of his word of promiſe, ver. 18. Which argument he amplifies and enlarges on, by obſerving the ſubject-matter of the Goſpel miniſtry, which is Jeſus Chriſt the Son of God; and which, tho' preached by different miniſters, himſelf, Sylvanus, and Timothy, yet was the ſame, had no contrariety in it, as preached by the one, and by the other, ver. 19. and therefore there was no reaſon to conclude that he was fickle and inconſtant in his promiſe to them, when he was ſo invariable in his miniſtry among them: beſides, as all the promiſes of God are ſure and certain, being made by the God of truth, and being in Chriſt, and the performance of them being for the glory of God by the ſaints; ſo the promiſes of every good man, in imitation of God and Chriſt, are firmly and conſtantly obſerved, as much as can be by frail and finite creatures, ver. 20. and that the Apoſtle, and his fellow-miniſters, were not ſo fickle and changeable, as they were repreſented, neither in their principles, nor in their practices, the Apoſtle takes notice of ſome bleſſings of grace, which they enjoyed in common with other ſaints, and with the Corinthians; ſuch as ſtability in Chriſt, the unction of divine grace, the ſeal and earneſt of the Spirit in their hearts; all which they had from God, and which kept them cloſe to God, and preſerved them in his grace, and from a fickle variable temper of mind, and from changeableneſs either in doctrine or conduct, ver. 21, 22. And then the Apoſtle proceeds to give the true reaſon why he had not as yet come to Corinth, according to his promiſe, which was on their account, and not his own, that they might not come under that ſevere diſcipline and correction, which their faults required; and for the truth of this he calls God to witneſs, ver. 23. But leſt it ſhould be objected that this was aſſuming a dominion over them, a lording it over God's heritage, he obſerves, that he and his fellow-miniſters did not pretend to have dominion over their faith, only to be helpers of their joy, ver. 24.

Ver. 1. Paul an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt by the will of God, &c.] The inſcription of this Epiſtle is pretty much the ſame with that of the former; only whereas here he ſtiles himſelf an Apoſtle of Jeſus Chriſt, there he ſays he was called to be one; for he did not aſſume that character and office without the call of Chriſt, and will of God; and which he chuſes to mention, in oppoſition to the falſe Apoſtles, who had neither. Likewiſe, in the inſcription of the former Epiſtle Soſthenes is joined with him; in this Timothy, whom he calls our brother, not ſo much on account of his being a partaker of the ſame grace, as for his being a miniſter of the ſame Goſpel: and he the rather mentions him, becauſe he had ſent him to them, to know their ſtate, and was now returned to him with an account of it, and who joined and agreed with him in the ſubſtance of this Epiſtle. Moreover, the former Epiſtle is directed as unto the church of God which is at Corinth, ſo to all that call upon the name of Chriſt in every place; and this is directed alſo to the ſame church, together with all the ſaints which are in all Achaia; which was a very conſiderable part of Greece, and of which Corinth was the metropolis: and the Apoſtle's intention in directing it in this form was, that copies of this letter might be ſent to them, who equally, with this church, ſtood in need of the reproofs, exhortations, and inſtructions which are in it.

Ver. 2. Grace be to you, &c.] This ſalutation is the ſame with that in the former Epiſtle, and is common to all his Epiſtles; ſee the note on Rom. i. 7.

Ver. 3. Bleſſed be God, &c.] This is an aſcription of praiſe and glory to God, for he can only be bleſſed of men, by their praiſing and glorifying him, or by aſcribing honour and bleſſing to him: and in this form of bleſſing him he is deſcribed, firſt by his relation to Chriſt, even the Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; whoſe ſon Chriſt is, not by creation, as angels and men, nor by adoption, as ſaints, but in ſuch a way of filiation, as no creatures are, or poſſibly can be: he is his only-begotten Son, his own proper Son, his natural and eternal Son, is of the ſame nature with him, and equal to him in perfections, power, and glory. This is rightly prefaced by the Apoſtle to the other following characters, ſince there's no mercy nor comfort adminiſtred to the ſons of men but thro' the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Son of God, and ſaviour of ſinners. And next he is deſcribed by his attribute of mercy, and the effects of it, or by his merciful diſpoſition to his creatures, the Father of mercies. The Jews frequently addreſs God in their prayers [a] under the title or character of, אב הרחמים, Father of mercies. The plural number is uſed, partly to ſhew that God is exceeding merciful; he delights in ſhewing mercy to poor miſerable creatures, and is rich and plenteous in the exerciſe of it; nothing is more common in the Talmudic writings, than to call him רחמנא, the merciful: and this is partly to expreſs the multitude of his tender mercies, of which he is the Father, author, and giver, both in a temporal and ſpiritual ſenſe; for there are not only innumerable providential mercies which the people of God ſhare in, and partake of, but alſo a multitude of ſpiritual mercies. Such as redemption by Chriſt, pardon of ſin thro' his blood, regeneration by his Spirit, ſupplies of grace out of his fulneſs, and the word and ordinances; all which are owing to the mercy of God, which they have abundant reaſon to be thankful to him, and bleſs him for, being altogether unworthy and undeſerving of them. God is alſo deſcribed by his work of comforting the ſaints, and the God of all comfort; moſt rightly is this character given him, for there's no ſolid comfort but what comes from him; there's none to be had in, and from the creatures; and whatever is had thro' them it is from him: and all ſpiritual comfort is of him; whatever conſolation the ſaints enjoy they have it from God, the Father of Chriſt, and who is their Covenant-God and Father in Chriſt; and the conſolation they have from him thro' Chriſt in a covenant way, is not ſmall, and for which they have great reaſon to bleſs the Lord, as the Apoſtle here does; for it is from him, that Chriſt the conſolation of Iſrael, and the Spirit the comforter come, and whatever is enjoyed by the Goſpel.

Ver. 4. Who comforteth us in all our tribulation, &c.] The Apoſtle in this verſe gives a reaſon of the former thankſgiving, and at the ſame time confirms the above character of God, as the God of all comfort, by his own experience, and that of his fellow-miniſters; who, tho' they had been in great tribulation and affliction for the ſake of Chriſt, and his Goſpel, yet were not left deſtitute of divine help and ſupport under their trials; but had much conſolation and ſweet refreſhment adminiſtred to them by the preſence of God with them, the application of his promiſes to them, the ſhedding abroad of his love in them, and the fellowſhip and communion they enjoyed with Father, Son, and Spirit. The end of this, or why God was pleaſed to comfort them in ſuch a manner, was not ſo much on their own account; tho' it ſhewed that they were loved, and not hated and rejected of God, but for the good of others: that we may be able to comfort them which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourſelves are comforted of God; many are the troubles and afflictions of the ſaints in this life, but it is the will of God that they ſhould be comforted; and the perſons he employs and makes uſe of in this way are his miniſtring ſervants, whoſe principal work and buſineſs it is to ſpeak comfortably to the people of God; ſee Iſ. xl. 1, 2. and that they may be able to do ſo, that they may be fitted and furniſhed for ſo good a work, they are bleſſed with a rich experience of divine conſolation in themſelves, under the various troubles and exerciſes they are attended with in the courſe of their miniſtry; and ſuch perſons are, of all others, the fitteſt, and indeed the only proper perſons to ſpeak a word in ſeaſon to weary ſouls.

Ver. 5. For as the ſufferings of Chriſt abound in us, &c.] By the ſufferings of Chriſt are not meant, thoſe which he ſuffered in his own perſon, for the ſake, and in the room and ſtead of his people, the fruit and effects of which abound to them, and in them; but thoſe which he ſuffers in his members, or which they ſuffer for his ſake; and which are ſaid to abound in them, becauſe of the variety and greatneſs of them; tho' not as if they were more or greater than what Chriſt ſuffered in his ſoul and body, when he was made ſin and a curſe for his people: yet notwithſtanding the abundance of them, ſuch is the goodneſs and grace of God, that he proportions comforts to them; as their afflictions increaſe, ſo do their comforts; as their ſufferings for the ſake of Chriſt, and his Goſpel, are more and greater, ſo, ſays he, our conſolation aboundeth by Chriſt; meaning, either that conſolation which they felt and enjoyed in their own ſouls, under all their tribulations, which abundantly anſwered to them, and which they aſcribe to Chriſt, from and by whom it comes to them; or elſe that conſolation, which, by preaching Chriſt, abounded to the relief of others who were in diſtreſs and trouble.

Ver. 6. And whether we be afflicted it is for your conſolation, &c.] The Apoſtle repeats and explains the end of both his comforts and his troubles, and ſhews, by a dilemma, a ſtrong way of arguing, that the afflictions and conſolations, the adverſity and proſperity of him, and the other miniſters of the Goſpel, were for the good of the ſaints: and it is as if he ſhould ſay, when you ſee us continue to preach the Goſpel with ſo much boldneſs and chearfulneſs, amidſt ſo many reproaches, afflictions, and perſecutions, you muſt be the more eſtabliſhed in the faith, and confirmed in the truth of the Goſpel; and this can't fail of miniſtring much peace, ſatisfaction, and comfort to your minds. This animates you to hold faſt the rejoicing of your hope, and the profeſſion of your faith firm unto the end; and with the greater chearfulneſs and pleaſure meet with, and endure afflictions yourſelves for the ſake of Chriſt, and his Goſpel: nay, he ſays, that the afflictions of Chriſt's miniſters were not only for their conſolation, but alſo for their ſalvation, which is effectual, or is effectually wrought in, or by the enduring, patient bearing, of the ſame ſufferings which we alſo ſuffer. Not that the afflictions of the ſaints, or of others, and their patient enduring of them, are the cauſe of their ſalvation; for Chriſt is only the efficient cauſe, he is the ſole author of ſpiritual and eternal ſalvation; but theſe are means the Spirit of God makes uſe of, as he does of the word and ordinances, to bring the ſaints to a ſatisfaction as to their intereſt in it, and are the ordinary way in which they are brought to the poſſeſſion of it. Or whether we be comforted it is for your conſolation and ſalvation; for whatſoever comfort God is pleaſed to communicate to us, it is not kept in our breaſts, and for our own uſe, but we immediately and readily impart it to you, that you may ſhare with us the advantage of it, and be comforted together with us; that your faith in the doctrine of ſalvation may be eſtabliſhed, your hope of it increaſed, and that you may be more comfortably aſſured you are in the way to it, and ſhall enjoy it.

Ver. 7. For our hope of you is ſtedfaſt, &c.] We have long ago entertained hopes of you, that the good work of God is begun upon your ſouls, and will be carried on, and that you will hold on in the profeſſion of your faith unto the end, and not be moved by the afflictions you ſee in us, or endure in yourſelves; and ſo will paſs on chearfully in your chriſtian race, in the midſt of all your troubles, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God, you may expect to be poſſeſſed of; and this hope, for or concerning you, continues with us firm and immoveable. Knowing, which may refer either to the Corinthians; ſo the Arabic verſion, be ye knowing, or know ye; you may, or ſhould know; this you may aſſure yourſelves of: or to the Apoſtle and other miniſters; ſo the Syriac verſion, ידעינן, we know, we are perſuaded of the truth of this, that as you are partakers of the ſufferings; that is, of Chriſt, and the ſame which we alſo ſuffer for him: ſo ſhall ye be; or rather, ſo you are alſo of the conſolation; for the Apoſtle ſeems to reſpect not future happineſs and glory, in which, as there will be no afflictions and troubles, ſo no comfort under them, but preſent conſolation, which the ſaints enjoy here as a pledge and earneſt of that fulneſs of joy which they ſhall have with Chriſt for evermore.

Ver. 8. For we would not, brethren, have you ignorant of our trouble, &c.] The Apoſtle was very deſirous that the Corinthians might be thoroughly acquainted with the trouble that had lately befallen them; partly becauſe it would clearly appear from hence what reaſon he had to give thanks to God as he had done; and partly, that they might be encouraged to truſt in God, when in the utmoſt extremity; but chiefly in order to remove a charge brought againſt him by the falſe Apoſtles; who, becauſe he had promiſed to come to Corinth, and as yet had not come, accuſed him of lightneſs and inconſtancy, in as much as he had not kept his promiſe. Now to ſhew that it was not owing to any ſuch temper and diſpoſition of mind in him, he would have them know, that tho' he ſincerely intended a journey to them, yet was hindered from purſuing it, by a very great affliction which befel him: the place where this ſore trouble came upon him, is expreſſed to be in Aſia: ſome have thought it refers to all the troubles he met with in Aſia, for the ſpace of three years, whereby he was detained longer than he expected; but it ſeems as tho' ſome ſingle affliction is here particularly deſigned: many interpreters have been of opinion, that the tumult raiſed by Demetrius at Epheſus, is here meant, when Paul and his companions were in great danger of their lives, Acts xix. but this uproar being but for a day, could not be a reaſon why, as yet, he had not come to Corinth: it ſeems rather to be ſome other very ſore affliction, and which laſted longer, that is not recorded in the Acts of the Apoſtles: the greatneſs of this trouble is ſet forth in very ſtrong expreſſions, as that we were preſſed out of meaſure. The affliction was as an heavy burden upon them, too heavy to bear; it was exceeding heavy, καθ' υπερβολην, even to an hyperbole, beyond expreſſion; and above ſtrength, that is, above human ſtrength, the ſtrength of nature; and ſo the Syriac renders it, מן חילן, above our ſtrength; but not above the ſtrength of grace, or that ſpiritual ſtrength communicated to them, by which they were ſupported under it: the Apoſtle adds, inſomuch that we deſpaired even of life; they were at the utmoſt loſs, and in the greateſt perplexity how to eſcape the danger of life; they greatly doubted of it; they ſaw no probability nor poſſibility, humanly ſpeaking, of preſerving it.

Ver. 9. But we had the ſentence of death in ourſelves, &c.] By the ſentence of death is meant, not any decree of heaven, or appointment of God that they ſhould die; nor any ſentence of condemnation and death paſſed on them by the civil magiſtrate; but an opinion or perſuaſion in their own breaſts, that they ſhould die; ſo far were they from any hopes of life, that they looked upon themſelves as dead men, as the Egyptians did, when their firſt-born were ſlain, and ſaid, we be all dead men, Exod. xii. 33. and to this extremity they were ſuffered to be brought by the wiſe counſel of God, for the following purpoſes, to learn to lay aſide all ſelf-truſt and confidence: that we ſhould not truſt in ourſelves; in our ſtrength, wiſdom, and policy, to make our eſcape, and preſerve our lives; and alſo to teach and encourage them to truſt in God alone, and depend on his arm, on his almighty power: but in God which raiſeth the dead; who will raiſe the dead at the laſt day, and ſo is able to deliver perſons when they are in the moſt diſtreſſed condition, and in their own opinion as dead men.

Ver. 10. Who delivered us from ſo great a death, &c.] Accordingly, being enabled to truſt in God, when all human hope and helps failed, to believe in hope againſt hope, then the Lord appeared for them, and delivered them from this heavy affliction; which, becauſe by reaſon of it they were not only in danger of death, and threatened with, but were even under the ſentence of it, is therefore called a death, and ſo great an one, ſee ch. xi. 23. The Apoſtle expreſſes the continuance of the mercy, and doth deliver; which ſhews that they were ſtill expoſed to deaths and dangers, but were wonderfully preſerved by the power of God, which gave great encouragement to them to hope and believe that God would ſtill preſerve them for further uſefulneſs. The Alexandrian copy leaves out this clauſe, and ſo does the Syriac verſion. In whom we truſt that he will yet deliver us; all the three tenſes, paſt, preſent, and future, are mentioned, which ſhews that an abiding ſenſe of paſt and preſent deliverances ſerves greatly to animate faith in expectation of future ones.

Ver. 11. You alſo helping together by prayer for us, &c.] Tho' the Apoſtle aſcribes their deliverance ſolely to God, as the author and efficient cauſe of it; yet he takes notice of the prayers of the ſaints for them, as helping cauſes or means of their obtaining it. It was a very laudable practice in the churches, and worthy of imitation, to pray for the miniſters of the Goſpel, and eſpecially when under affliction and perſecution; ſee Acts xii. 5. and the prayers of thoſe righteous ones were heard by God, and often effectual for the deliverance of them, as they were in the preſent caſe: for by the means of many perſons, who wreſtled together in prayer with God, the gift of deliverance from ſo great a death, which the Apoſtle looked upon as a wonderful mercy, χαρισμα, a free grace gift, was beſtowed upon them, which was granted for this end, that thanks may be given by many on our behalf; which is but reaſonable, and ought to be obſerved; for ſince many were concerned in aſking for, and obtaining the mercy, they ought to join in thankſgiving for it; and the Apoſtle's view in this is to ſtir them up to a joint-acknowledgment of the deliverance with them, which better became them than to ſide with the falſe Apoſtles in their charge againſt him.

Ver. 12. For our rejoicing is this, the teſtimony of our conſcience, &c.] This rejoicing or glorying of the Apoſtle's in the teſtimony of their conſciences, to the goodneſs of their hearts, actions, conduct, and behaviour, was not before God, and in his ſight, but before men, who were ready to accuſe their good converſation in Chriſt: nor are theſe words to be conſidered as they generally are by interpreters, as if it was the teſtimony of a good conſcience, which was the ground of their faith and confidence, that God would deliver them, and was an helping cauſe, together with the prayers of the ſaints of their preſent deliverance. They refer to the charge exhibited againſt the Apoſtle, that he had falſified his word in not coming to Corinth according to his promiſe; under which charge he could ſit eaſy, having a witneſs within him, which was better than a thouſand others, that we have had our converſation in the world, and more abundantly to you-wards; the Corinthians, of which they themſelves muſt be conſcious: in ſimplicity; in oppoſition to double-mindedneſs; they did not ſay one thing, and mean another, and act contrary to both; their heart and mouth went together, and their conduct agreed with both; what they promiſed they meant to perform; and where there was a want of performance, it was owing to intervening providences, which hindered, and not to any deceitfulneſs in them: the conſcience of the Apoſtle bore him witneſs, that he behaved in the ſimplicity and ſingleneſs of his heart; and alſo in godly ſincerity, or in the ſincerity of God; that is, ſuch as God requires, gives, and approves of, and which will ſtand in his ſight, will bear his examination, and to which he gives his teſtimony; and that his conduct was not influenced with fleſhly wiſdom: he uſed no artful ſophiſtical methods to impoſe upon, and delude perſons, for any ſiniſter ends, or worldly advantage: but by the grace of God; which was beſtowed upon him, implanted in him, and which taught him to deny ungodlineſs and worldly luſts, and to live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly in this world.

Ver. 13. For we write none other things to you, &c.] The things we write unto you concerning our conduct and behaviour, are no other than what you read; not in our letters to you, but in our lives and converſations, when we were among you, and which you muſt own and acknowledge to be juſt and right; we can appeal to you, that what we ſay, and are obliged to ſay of ourſelves, in our own defence, is what, upon a recollection, you will eaſily remember to have ſeen and obſerved: and I truſt; or hope, thro' the grace of God, we ſhall be enabled ſo to walk, as that you ſhall acknowledge even to the end; that our converſations are as become the Goſpel of Chriſt, and are clear of that hypocriſy and deceit our adverſaries would inſinuate concerning us.

Ver. 14. As alſo you have acknowledged us in part, &c.] This may refer either to the thing known and acknowledged, namely, the integrity of the Apoſtle's converſation, and others; which tho' they did not know thoroughly and perfectly, yet did in part, and that ſo far as that they might acquit them from the charge brought againſt them; or to the perſons who knew this, as that there were ſome in the church of Corinth, a part of them, tho' not all, who knew and had acknowledged them to be upright and ſincere miniſters of the word, and had declared that they had reaſon to rejoice and bleſs God that ever they heard them: and that we are your rejoicing; or glorying in, or unto the day of the Lord Jeſus; when he ſhall come to judge the world in righteouſneſs, then they ſhould before him, angels and men, rejoice and glory in this, that they had been bleſſed with ſuch ſincere and faithful miniſters, who ſought not any worldly advantage, but the glory of Chriſt, and the ſalvation of ſouls: even as, adds the Apoſtle, ye alſo are ours; we do now, and ſo we ſhall then, rejoice and glory in this, that our labour among you was not in vain, but was bleſſed for your converſion and edification.

Ver. 15. And in this confidence I was minded, &c.] Being fully perſuaded of your affection for me, as having been inſtrumental in the converſion of many of you, and of your eſteem of me as a faithful and upright miniſter of the word, and of your being my rejoicing in the day of Chriſt, I was deſirous, and had determined, and ſo promiſed, to come to you before; when I ſent my firſt Epiſtle to you, or before now, or before I went into Macedonia; and what I now ſay was the ſincere intention of my mind; I thought really to have done what I had ſuch an inclination to: and my view in it was, that you might have a ſecond benefit; the meaning of which according to ſome is, firſt by his letter to them, and then by his preſence with them; or as others, one benefit when he ſhould paſs by them to Macedonia, and a ſecond, when he ſhould return to them from thence, according to the following verſe; or rather, as the firſt benefit which they received from him, and under his miniſtry, was their converſion, ſo this ſecond benefit may deſign their edification, and eſtabliſhment in the faith, their growth in grace, and improvement in ſpiritual knowledge.

Ver. 16. And to paſs by you into Macedonia, &c.] It was his firſt intention and determination, to have come firſt to Corinth, and then to Macedonia, to have took this city in his way thither; which was an argument of his love to them, and his great deſire to ſee them; ſince he might have gone, as he did, a nearer way to Macedonia, than by Corinth: and to come again out of Macedonia to you; when he had gone through that, and done his buſineſs there unto the Corinthians; and after ſome ſtay with them, of you to be brought on my way towards Judea; where he intended to go, with the collections he had made for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, in the ſeveral churches in Aſia; but though this was his firſt reſolution, which he had ſignified either by letter, or meſſengers, yet he afterwards changed his mind, for ſome reaſons within himſelf; it may be, having heard ſome things diſagreeable of them, which he thought more convenient to acquaint them with in an epiſtle firſt, and to try what effect that would have upon them, before he came in perſon: that he changed his mind, appears from the former Epiſtle, ch. xvi. 5. where he ſays, I will come unto you, when I ſhall paſs through Macedonia; and upon this account it is, he excuſes and vindicates himſelf in the following verſe.

Ver. 17. When I was therefore thus minded, did I uſe lightneſs? &c.] When I had thus determined to come to you, and had ſignified the ſame by writing, or meſſengers, did I uſe lightneſs in my reſolutions and promiſes? did I act raſhly, unadviſedly, and without conſideration? did I promiſe certainly that I would come, without annexing any condition to it? did I not ſay, I would come to you ſhortly, if the Lord will? ſee 1 Cor. iv. 19. Or the things that I purpoſe, do I purpoſe according to the fleſh? do I conſult myſelf? my own intereſt and advantage? do I ſeek the gratification of any carnal affection, as covetouſneſs, ambition, or vain-glory? &c. what ſiniſter end could have been obtained, if I had come as I purpoſed, or is anſwered by my not coming? or when I have purpoſed any thing, have I reſolved upon it in my own ſtrength? have I thought it lay in my own power to effect it? that with me there ſhould be yea, yea, and nay, nay? as if I could make my yea continue yea, and my nay, nay? when all actions are weighed by God, and all events are at his diſpoſe; man appoints, and God diſappoints; and who can help theſe things? or thus, has there appeared ſuch contradictions in my words, and ſuch inconſtancy in my conduct, that my yeas are nays, and my nays yeas? that I ſay one thing at one time, and another at another time, or both in the ſame breath? that I ſhould ſay one thing, and mean another, on purpoſe to deceive, and change my mind and conduct without any reaſon?

Ver. 18. But as God is true, &c.] It ſeems that the falſe Apoſtles had inſinuated, that as the Apoſtle had not kept his word in coming to them as he had promiſed, that he was not to be depended upon in his miniſtry; that he might as well contradict himſelf, and deceive others in the one, as well as in the other: wherefore he appeals to God in a very ſolemn manner, calls him to witneſs to the truth of his doctrine; for theſe words may be conſidered as the form of an oath; or he argues from the truth and faithfulneſs of God, to the certainty and invariableneſs of the word preached, who is ſo true and faithful as that he will never ſuffer his word to be yea and nay: for when the Apoſtle ſays, that our word towards you was not yea and nay, he does not mean his word of promiſe to come to Corinth; but the word of his preaching, the doctrine of the Goſpel, which was not uncertain, changeable, ſometimes one thing, and ſometimes another, and contradictory to itſelf. And by this the Apoſtle would intimate, that ſince he was faithful and upright, uniform, conſiſtent, and all of a-piece in preaching the Goſpel to them; ſo they ought to believe, that he was ſincere in his reſolutions and promiſes to come and ſee them, tho' as yet he had been hindered, and had not been able to perform them.

Ver. 19. For the Son of God, Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] The Apoſtle having aſſerted that the Goſpel preached by them was not yea and nay, variable and different, or what was affirmed at one time was denied at another, proceeds to point out the ſubject of the Goſpel-miniſtry, the Son of God, Jeſus Chriſt; that Chriſt is the Son of God: this article he began his miniſtry with, Acts ix. 20. and all the Apoſtles affirmed the ſame thing; and which is of the greateſt moment and importance, and ought to be abode by, inſiſted on, and frequently inculcated; as that he is the eternal Son of God, exiſted as ſuch from everlaſting, is of the ſame nature, and has the ſame perfections with his Father; and therefore is able to deſtroy the works of the devil, for which he was manifeſted in the fleſh, and every way equal to the buſineſs of redemption, which he has finiſhed; and having paſſed into the heavens under this character, is a powerful advocate with the Father; and which renders him a ſure foundation for the church, and a proper object of faith: that the Son of God is Chriſt, anointed to bear and execute the office of a mediator in the ſeveral parts and branches of it; a prophet to teach his people, a prieſt to make atonement and interceſſion for them, and a king to govern and protect them: and that the Son, who is become the Lord's Chriſt, is Jeſus, a ſaviour; and that ſalvation is alone by him, to which he was appointed from eternity, and was ſent in the fulneſs of time to effect it; and by his obedience, ſufferings, and death, is become the author of it, and is the only able, willing, and ſuitable ſaviour for poor ſinners. This is the principal ſubject and ſtrain of the Goſpel-miniſtry; and which makes it good news, and glad tidings to loſt periſhing ſinners. The agreement between the faithful miniſters of the Goſpel is here plainly hinted, who was preached among you by us, even by me, and Sylvanus and Timotheus. Theſe miniſters being mentioned by the Apoſtle with himſelf, ſhews his humility in putting them on a level with himſelf; and his modeſty and candour in not monopolizing the Goſpel to himſelf, but allowing others to be preachers of it as well as he: and his deſign herein ſeems to be for the confirmation of the Goſpel, and to ſhew that he was not ſingular and alone, and could not be blamed by them, without blaming others; and chiefly to expreſs the harmony and unanimity of Goſpel preachers. The prophets of the Old Teſtament, and the Apoſtles of the New, agreed in all the doctrines and truths of the Goſpel; ſo did the Apoſtles themſelves; and ſo all faithful diſpenſers of the word have in all different times and places agreed, and ſtill do agree; which ſerves greatly to corroborate the truth of the Goſpel. The Goſpel being faithfully preached by theſe perſons, was not yea and nay; it had no contradiction in it; each part agreed together, was entirely harmonious, and conſiſtent. Their doctrine was, that Chriſt is the Son of God, truly and properly God; that he took upon him the office of a mediator, and executes it; that he is the only ſaviour of ſinners; that God has choſen a certain number of men in Chriſt before the foundation of the world, has made a covenant with them in Chriſt, and bleſſed them in him; that Chriſt has redeemed them by his blood; that theſe are regenerated by the Spirit and grace of Chriſt, are juſtified by his righteouſneſs, and ſhall finally perſevere, and be partakers of eternal life; which is all of a-piece, and in it no yea and nay. Yea and nay doctrines are particular election, the poſſibility of the ſalvation of the non-elect, the ſalvability of all men, and univerſal redemption; juſtification by faith, and, as it were, by the works of the law; converſion, partly by grace, and partly by the will of man; preparatory works, offers, and days of grace; and final perſeverance made a doubt of: but ſuch is not the true miniſtry of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, but in him was yea; the Goſpel, as in Chriſt, and as it comes from him, and has been preached by his Apoſtles, and faithful miniſters, is all of a-piece; its conſtant and invariable ſtrain, and by which it may be known and diſtinguiſhed, is, to diſplay the free, rich, and ſovereign grace of God, to magnify and exalt the perſon and offices of Chriſt, to debaſe the creature, and to engage perſons to the performance of good works, on Goſpel principles, and by Goſpel motives, and for right ends. The Apoſtle uſing thoſe words, yea and nay, conforms to the language of the Jews, his countrymen, who to magnify their doctors and rabbins, and to raiſe their credit, ſay ſuch things of them; "yea, yea, are the words of the houſe or "ſchool of Shammai; הן הן, yea, yea, are the "words of the ſchool of Hillell[b]." And in another place[c]; "the receiving and giving, or the dealings "of a diſciple of a wiſe man, are in truth and "faithfulneſs. He ſays, על לאו ועל הן הן, "concerning [c] Maimon. Hilch. Dayot, c. 5. §. 13.

“ concerning nay, nay, and concerning yea, yea.” But what is here ſaid better agrees with the principles and practices of the diſciples and followers of Chriſt.

Ver. 20. For all the promiſes of God in him are yea, &c.] This is a reaſon or argument proving what is before ſaid, that in Chriſt was yea, ſince all the promiſes of God in him are yea; and ſhews, that God has made many promiſes to his people: mention is here made of promiſes, and of all the promiſes; or, as the words may be rendered, as many promiſes of God. There are ſome which concern the temporal good of the ſaints; as that they ſhall not want any good thing; and tho' they ſhall be attended with afflictions, theſe ſhall work for their good, and they ſhall be ſupported under them. Others concern their ſpiritual good; ſome of which relate to God himſelf, that he will be their God, which includes his everlaſting love, his gracious preſence, and divine protection. Others relate to Chriſt as their ſurety and ſaviour, by whom they are, and ſhall be juſtified and pardoned, in whom they are adopted, and by whom they ſhall be ſaved with an everlaſting ſalvation: and others relate to the Spirit of God, as a Spirit of illumination, faith, comfort, ſtrength and aſſiſtance, and to ſupplies of grace by him from Chriſt: and others concern everlaſting life and happineſs; and are all of them very ancient, which God, that cannot lye, promiſed before the world began; are exceeding great and precious, ſuited to the various caſes of God's people; are free and unconditional, immutable and irrevocable, and will all of them have their certain accompliſhment. Theſe promiſes are all in Chriſt; with and in whom could they be but in him, ſince he only exiſted when they were made, which was from everlaſting? with and in whom ſhould they be of right, but in him with whom the covenant, which contains theſe promiſes, were made, and who undertook the accompliſhment of them? where could they be ſafe and ſecure but in him, in whoſe hands are the perſons, grace, and glory of his people? not in Adam, nor in angels, nor in themſelves, only in him. Moreover, theſe promiſes are in him yea, and in him amen; they are like the Goſpel which exhibits them, conſiſtent, and all of a-piece; like the covenant which contains them, and is ordered in all things, and ſure; and like the author of them, whoſe faithfulneſs and loving kindneſs to his in Chriſt ſhall never fail; and like Chriſt himſelf, in whom they are, who is the amen, the true and faithful witneſs, the ſame to-day, yeſterday, and for ever; by whoſe blood, the covenant, and all the promiſes of it, are ratified and confirmed, and in whom, who is the truth of them, they are all fulfilled. And theſe are unto the glory of God by us; theſe ſerve to illuſtrate and advance the glory of God, when they are preached by us, and held forth by us in the Goſpel, juſt as they are in Chriſt, free, abſolute, and unconditional; and when they are received by us as believers in Chriſt; for the ſtronger we are in the faith of the promiſes, the more glory we give to God; faith by laying hold on, and embracing the promiſes, glorifies the veracity, faithfulneſs, power, and grace of God. The Syriac verſion puts the Amen into this laſt clauſe, and reads it thus, therefore by him we give Amen to the glory of God.

Ver. 21. Now he which ſtabliſheth us with you, &c.] Two things are in this verſe aſcribed to God. Firſt, the eſtabliſhing of the ſaints in Chriſt; in which may be obſerved, that the people of God are in a firm, ſettled, eſtabliſhed ſtate and condition; they are incircled in the arms of everlaſting love; they are ſecure of the favour of God; they are engraven on his hands, and ſet as a ſeal on his heart, from whence they can never be removed; they are taken into his family by adopting grace, and will never be turned out; they are in a ſtate of juſtification, and ſhall never enter into condemnation; they are regenerated and ſanctified by the Spirit of God, and ſhall never finally and totally fall from that grace they have received. This their eſtabliſhment is in Chriſt, and in no other. They had no ſtability in Adam, nor have they any in themſelves; their ſtanding is alone in him; the unchangeable love and favour of God, which is their grand ſecurity, is in Chriſt; the covenant of grace, in which is all their ſalvation, is made and ſtands faſt with him; their perſons, with all their grace and glory, are put into his hands, and made his care and charge, and there they are ſafe. They are eſpouſed unto him, made one with him, incorporated into him, and are built upon him the rock of ages, where they are ſo eſtabliſhed, that hell and earth can't ſhake them, ſo as to remove and unſettle them from this foundation: one and all of them, and all together, are eſtabliſhed in him, us with you; all the elect of God are alike, and together in Chriſt, and have the ſame place and ſtanding in his love, power, and care; they make up one body, of which Chriſt is the head; and not one of them ſhall be loſt, whether they be Jews or Gentiles, miniſters or private believers; for ſo this phraſe may be interpreted, us Jews with you Gentiles, or us miniſters with you believers. This work of eſtabliſhing the ſaints in Chriſt is wholly the Lord's act; he is God that does it; which does not contradict the word and ordinances, being means of eſtabliſhment; nor does it hinder or diſcourage perſons making uſe of means for their ſtability; for the Apoſtle here is not ſpeaking ſo much of the ſtability of hearts, frames, and exerciſe of grace, as of ſtate; tho' a firm, ſteady, and ſtable aſſurance of intereſt in Chriſt, is what God gives by his Spirit. The Apoſtle's view ſeems to be this, that whatever ſtedfaſtneſs and ſtability the ſaints have, whether miniſters or people, they ought to aſcribe it entirely to God, Father, Son, and Spirit. Secondly, the anointing of them: he hath anointed us; which is to be underſtood either of the unction of miniſters, with the gifts of the Spirit for miniſterial ſervice; or rather of the anointing of private Chriſtians with the grace of the Spirit, compared to oil or ointment, in alluſion to the anointing-oil under the law, by which the tabernacle, and its veſſels, Aaron, and his ſons, were anointed, who were typical of the ſaints and prieſts of God under the Goſpel; or to the lamp-oil in the candleſtick, which was pure, and for light; or to oil in common, for its ſweet ſmell, refreſhing nature, and for its uſefulneſs for ornament and healing. This alſo is the Lord's work, and not man's; this unction comes from the God of all grace, thro' Chriſt, by the Spirit.

Ver. 22. Who hath alſo ſealed us, &c.] Two things more are here attributed to God; firſt, the ſealing of his people. The uſe of ſeals is various, as to denote property in things, to diſtinguiſh one thing from another, to ſhew eſteem and affection for perſons or things, and for ſecurity and protection, and to hide and conceal; all which might be applied to ſealing, as expreſſive of the grace of God to his people, in claiming a property in them, diſtinguiſhing them from the reſt of the world, ſetting his affections on them, ſecuring and protecting their perſons, and hiding them under the ſhadow of his wings: but ſometimes a ſeal is uſed to certify, make ſure, or aſſure the truth of a thing; ſee John iii. 33.

1 Cor. ix. 2. Jer. xxxii. 10. in which ſenſe the word ſealing is uſed here, and intends that aſſurance which God gives his people of their intereſt in his love, and the covenant of grace; of their election of God, and redemption by Chriſt; of their intereſt in Chriſt, and union with him; of their juſtification by him, and adoption thro' him; of the truth of grace in their hearts, their perſeverance in it, and ſure and certain enjoyment of eternal glory. The perſons thus ſealed are not carnal and unconverted perſons, only believers in Chriſt, and theſe, after they commence ſuch; the ſeal by which they are ſealed, is not any of the ordinances, as circumciſion under the Old Teſtament, or baptiſm, or the Lord's ſupper under the New; for theſe are no ſeals, nor are they ever ſo called; but the Spirit of God himſelf, as the holy Spirit of promiſe; for the ſame, who, in the next clauſe, is called the earneſt, is the ſeal; ſee Eph. i. 13. Secondly, the giving of the earneſt of the Spirit: and given the earneſt of the Spirit in our hearts; by the Spirit is meant, not the gifts and graces of the Spirit merely, but the Spirit of God and Chriſt himſelf; who was concerned in the creation of the world, in inditing the ſcriptures, in forming and filling the human nature of Chriſt, and in his reſurrection from the dead; he himſelf is given as an earneſt: the word αρραβων, here uſed, and in ch. v. 5. Eph. i. 14. is the Hebrew word ערבון, and comes from ערב, which ſignifies to become a ſurety, to give a pledge; and is uſed for a pledge in covenants and bargains, both in ſcripture, ſee Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18, 20. and in Jewiſh writings[d]; which is given as an earneſt, and in part of what it is a pledge of, and is never returned: the Spirit of God is an earneſt or pledge of the heavenly inheritance, which is not only prepared for us, and promiſed to us, and Chriſt is in the poſſeſſion of in our nature, in our room and ſtead, and as our repreſentative; but the Spirit of God alſo is ſent down into our hearts as a pledge of it; where he dwells as in his temple, ſupplies us with all grace, witneſſes to us our Sonſhip, and aſſures us of the heavenly glory: and as ſuch he is given; and an unmerited free-grace gift he is; for him to be given in this manner, and for ſuch a purpoſe, is a wonderful diſplay of the love of the Father, and of the Son, and is a ſurprizing inſtance of the grace and condeſcenſion of the Spirit, and for which we ſhould be abundantly thankful.

Ver. 23. Moreover, I call God for a record upon my ſoul, &c.] The Apoſtle having aſſerted his ſtability, both as a miniſter and a chriſtian, which, with others, he had from God, appeals to him in the moſt ſolemn manner, in full form of an oath, for the truth of what he was about to ſay; and is all one as if he had ſaid, I ſwear by the living God, the ſearcher of all hearts; I call upon him to atteſt what I ſay, and bear witneſs to my ſoul, that it is true, that to ſpare you, I came not as yet unto Corinth; however fickle, unſtable, and inconſtant, it may be inſinuated to you, I am, or you may take me to be, I do aſſure you in the name and preſence of God, that the true reaſon of my not coming to you hitherto, ſince I gave you reaſon to expect me, was, that I might not be burdenſome or chargeable to you; or I have delayed coming to you, hoping for a reformation among you, that when I do come, I may not come with a rod, and ſeverely chaſtiſe you for the many diſorders among you; that I might not uſe ſharpneſs according to the power God has given me, in an extraordinary way, as an Apoſtle, to puniſh for offences committed. Hence we learn, that an oath is a ſolemn appeal to God, and may be lawfully made in caſes of moment and importance, as this of the Apoſtle's was; whoſe character was traduced, and with which was connected the uſefulneſs of his miniſtry; and it being an affair that could not be determined in any other way, and an oath being for confirmation, and to put an end to ſtrife, he makes one in this ſerious and awful manner.

Ver. 24. Not for that we have dominion, &c.] Since he had ſpoke of ſparing of them, leſt it ſhould be thought that he and his fellow-miniſters aſſumed to themſelves any tyrannical power over the churches, or lorded it over God's heritage, theſe words are ſubjoined; in which there is ſomething denied of the miniſters of the Goſpel, as that they have not dominion over your faith; by which may be meant both the grace and doctrine of faith: they cannot give or produce in the heart the grace of faith; that is the gift of God; of which Chriſt is not only the object, but the author; it is of the operation of the Spirit, and the effect of almighty power; it flows entirely from the free grace of God; all that miniſters can do is to propoſe the object of faith, and by arguments taken from the word of God, encourage ſouls to believe in the object propoſed, and ſo are, thro' a divine bleſſing on their miniſtrations, inſtruments by which ſome believe; but they themſelves can't command faith in any; nor can they increaſe or add unto it where it is; this alſo is the Lord's work: nor have they any dominion over the doctrine of faith; they are to deliver nothing to the people but what is contained in the ſcriptures, and the people are obliged to believe no more than what they find there; no alteration is to be made in the rule and doctrine of faith; miniſters have no power to make and impoſe new articles of faith, tho' they may require and inſiſt upon an aſſent to thoſe truths which they deliver, according to the word of God. Likewiſe, ſomething is aſſerted of them, but are helpers of your joy. Joy is a grace wrought in the ſoul by the Spirit of God, of which Chriſt is the object; it goes along with faith, and as that improves, ſo does this; it is often interrupted by the corruptions of the heart, the temptations of ſatan, and divine deſertions, and ſo is in this life imperfect; tho' it may be increaſed, as it ſometimes is, and that by the miniſtration of the Goſpel; for as the miniſters of it are the means and inſtruments of that joy which is firſt felt in converſion, ſo likewiſe of increaſing it by their comfortable doctrines and inſtructions; for their miniſtry is, and is often bleſſed for the furtherance and joy of faith. A reaſon of which is given, for by faith ye ſtand; and ſo are not ſubject to men, nor to us, nor to any tyrannical government of ours; nor have we any thing to charge you with concerning your faith: which may deſign the grace of faith, and expreſs its uſe in the perſeverance of the ſaints, who ſtand not upon their faith, but by it; and by it, not as a cauſe, but as a means of their perſeverance; by which they rely on the power and faithfulneſs of God, lean upon Chriſt, and walk on in him, live upon him, continually receive from him, and in his ſtrength ſtand againſt the temptations of ſatan, and ſnares of the world: and it may alſo denote the ſtrength and continuance of faith; a man may be ſaid to ſtand by it, when he ſtrongly believes his intereſt in God, in his love, and the covenant of his grace, his intereſt in Chriſt, and ſalvation by him; is ſatisfied about the truth of grace on his ſoul, makes no demur upon the promiſes, nor heſitates about the doctrines of grace, or his future happineſs, but rejoices in hope of the glory of God; as alſo, when he continues in the exerciſe of faith, notwithſtanding the corruptions of his nature, the temptations of ſatan, the hidings of God's face, and the many afflictions and trials he meets with in the world. Moreover, this paſſage may be applied to the doctrine of faith, in and by which the ſaints may be ſaid to ſtand, in oppoſition to any wavering or heſitation about it, to a cowardly ſpirit in giving way in the leaſt to the adverſaries of it, or to a departing from it; which by no means ſhould be done, though a greater number is on the other ſide, and they be the rich and learned; tho' the doctrines of it are diſagreeable to the carnal reaſon of man, are loaded with reproach, and followed with the rage, malice, and perſecutions of men: or theſe words may relate to a profeſſion of faith; care ſhould be uſed in taking up a profeſſion of faith; where the true grace of God is, it ought to be done; when it is made, it ought to be ſtood in, and abode by; and it is the honour of ſaints to ſtand in it, and to it, and hold it faſt.

[d] Midraſh Megillath Eſther, fol. 94. 2. Maimon Hilch. Mechira, c. 7. §. 1. & c. 11. §. 4.

CHAP. II.

THE Apoſtle, in this chapter, goes on to give reaſons of his not coming, as yet, to Corinth; and removes the charge of ſeverity, which ſome might think him guilty of, in what he had written in his former Epiſtle concerning the inceſtuous perſon, who having repented of his ſin, he would now have comforted, and the cenſure laid on him by the church taken off; after which he gives an account of the ſucceſs of the Goſpel in ſeveral parts, of its power and purity, and of the faithful diſpenſation of it by himſelf and others: in ver. 1. he aſſigns this as a reaſon why he had determined with himſelf not to come to Corinth as yet, and why he deferred his coming, that when he came he might not be ſorrowful himſelf, nor make others ſorrowful, which neceſſarily involve each other; for if he made others ſorrowful by his ſharp rebukes, which as things had been he could not but in faithfulneſs give, he muſt be in ſorrow himſelf, ſince there would be none to make him chearful, but ſuch whom he made ſorrowful, ver. 2. wherefore to meet together under ſuch circumſtances muſt be uncomfortable; and hence he choſe to put off his coming until things took another turn; and this was the reaſon of his writing with ſo much ſeeming ſeverity concerning the inceſtuous perſon, in the former Epiſtle, to bring him and them to repentance, and ſo prevent that ſorrow which he otherwiſe muſt have had, had he in perſon come to them whilſt they were unconcerned about that affair; and that he might have that joy, which he was confident of, every one was deſirous he ſhould have, ver. 3. and he was ſo far from being of a cruel and uncompaſſionate diſpoſition, that it was with an aking heart, and with flowing eyes, that he wrote that letter to them; nor was it written with that view merely to grieve them, but to let them know the tender and affectionate concern he had for their welfare, ver. 4. Beſides, this affair of the inceſtuous perſon was not only matter of grief to the Apoſtle, but to them all; or he was not the only perſon he was grieved with, but with them all, and therefore it was neceſſary to uſe greater ſeverity and roughneſs, ver. 5. However, inaſmuch as the end he had in view was anſwered, the humbling of the delinquent, and bringing him to repentance, nothing more was to be done, the puniſhment of excommunication was ſufficient, ver. 6. and that ought now to be removed, and the man forgiven, and comforted, leſt he ſhould be overwhelmed with ſorrow, and be reduced to deſpair, ver. 7. Wherefore the Apoſtle intreats them to give ſome freſh aſſurances of their love to the repenting brother, and ſignify it by their hearty reception of him into communion again, ver. 8. in doing which they would give proof of their obedience to him the Apoſtle, which was an end he had in writing to them before, concerning the excommunication of the ſame perſon, ver. 9. and which he urges them to from his own example, who was ready to join with them in forgiving him, out of love to them, and in the name of Chriſt, ver. 10. and the rather it became them to do ſo, leſt ſatan ſhould get an advantage of them, and eſtabliſh a bad principle and practice among them, that ſuch as fall into ſin, tho' they repent, ſhould not be reſtored to the communion of the church, of whoſe devices in different forms and ſhapes, to do miſchief to the churches of Chriſt, and particular believers, the Apoſtle and others were not ignorant, ver. 11. Moreover, what had took up his time, and had prevented him from coming to Corinth as yet, was his being called to, and employed in the preaching of the Goſpel elſewhere, particularly at Troas, where he was the rather inclined to ſtay, and there was a neceſſity of it, becauſe there was a door opened for it, ver. 12. and yet not finding Titus there, as he expected, he was uneaſy, and departed thence into Macedonia, in queſt of him, ver. 13. where, as in other places, he preached the Goſpel with ſucceſs, which he aſcribes to God, and gives him thanks for it, ver. 14. which ſucceſs he illuſtrates by dividing the perſons to whom he preached the Goſpel, into two claſſes, they that are ſaved, and they that periſh, ver. 15. on whom it had different effects, diffuſing death, and adding death to death in the one, and communicating life, and adding life to life in the other: and leſt he ſhould be thought to arrogate too much to himſelf, and other miniſters of the word, of whom he ſpeaks, he acknowledges his and their inſufficiency to preach the Goſpel, and make it effectual; and that all fitneſs for it, and all the virtue and efficacy of it, were from the Lord, ver. 16. and then gives the reaſon why he, and the reſt of the faithful miniſters of the Goſpel, were a ſweet ſavour to Chriſt, as he had aſſerted, becauſe they did not, as others, corrupt this box of ointment, but faithfully and ſincerely poured it out, without mixing and adulterating it; and this they did as being in the view of the omniſcient God, to whom they could appeal for their integrity and honeſty, ver. 17.

Ver. 1. But I determined with myſelf, &c.] The Apoſtle having removed the charge of levity and inconſtancy brought againſt him, goes on to excuſe his delay in coming to them, and to ſoften the ſeverity which ſome thought too much, he had uſed in his former Epiſtle: he determined with himſelf, he took up a reſolution within his own breaſt ſome time ago, ſays he, that I would not come again to you in heavineſs; that he would not come with ſorrow and heavineſs, bewailing their ſins unrepented of, and by ſharp reproofs and cenſures, which in ſuch a caſe would be neceſſary, be the cauſe of grief and trouble to them; wherefore he determined to wait their repentance and amendment before he came again.

The word again, may be connected with the phraſe in heavineſs; and the ſenſe be, that in his former epiſtle, which was a ſort of coming to them, he made them heavy and ſorry, by ſharply rebuking them for ſome diſorders that were among them; and ſince, it has been a ſettled point with him, that he would not come in heavineſs again: or with the word come; and then the meaning is, as his firſt coming among them, was to the joy of their ſouls, ſo it was a determined caſe with him, that his ſecond coming ſhould not be with grief, either to them or himſelf, or both; and this is the true reaſon, why he had deferred it ſo long.

Ver. 2. For if I make you ſorry, &c.] That is, ſhould he come among them, and be the means of freſh grief and ſorrow: who is he then that maketh me glad? ſuch was his love and affection for them, and ſympathy with them, that ſhould they be grieved, he ſhould grieve alſo; they were the only perſons he could take any delight in at Corinth; wherefore ſhould they be in heavineſs, he would be ſo too, and then what pleaſure would he have in being among them? ſince not a man of them would be in a condition and capacity to make him chearful: but the ſame which is made ſorry by me. The Ethiopic verſion without any authority reads this clauſe, except he whom I have made glad; but the Apoſtle is to be underſtood either of ſome particular man, the inceſtuous perſon, who had been made ſorry, by that awful puniſhment of being delivered up to ſatan, inflicted on him; or elſe the ſingular number being put for the plural collectively, it is to be underſtood of all the members of the church at Corinth, who had been greatly grieved by the ſharp reproofs he had given them; and therefore unleſs this trouble was removed, he could not expect to have much comfort and pleaſure with them.

Ver. 3. And I wrote this ſame unto you, &c.] Not what he had written in the preceding verſe, or in ch. i. 23. where he ſays, that his not coming to them as yet, was to ſpare them; but what he had written to them in his former epiſtle, concerning the excommunication of the inceſtuous man, which had ſo much grieved both him and them; and this the Apoſtle choſe rather to order by writing, than in perſon; hoping to hear of their repentance and amendment, before he came among them: leſt, ſays he, when I came, or ſhould come, I ſhould have ſorrow from them of whom I ought to rejoice; ſome copies and the Complutenſian edition read, ſorrow upon ſorrow; and ſo does the Vulgate Latin verſion, which ſeems to be tranſcribed from Phil. ii. 27. that is, he took this method of ſending a reproving letter, in order to bring to a ſenſe, and acknowledgment of ſin; leſt ſhould he come in perſon, ſome would have been a grief and trouble to him, having fallen into ſin unrepented of; who ought to have been matter of rejoicing to him, as being the ſeals of his Apoſtleſhip, and his work in the Lord: and this ſtep he was the more encouraged to take, through the confidence he had of them, having confidence in you all; being fully perſuaded of their affection for him, and opinion of him: that my joy is the joy of you all; that their joy and grief were mutual and common; that what he rejoiced in, they did likewiſe; and what was diſpleaſing to him, was diſpleaſing to them; and therefore upon the firſt hint given, he took care to remove the occaſion of ſuch diſpleaſure, that their mutual comfort might take place; aſſuring them, and of which they might be aſſured, that it was no joy to him to grieve them; he could have none when theirs was gone; his ultimate view in writing to them in the manner he had, was not to grieve, but to bring them to repentance and reformation, which iſſued in the mutual joy of him and them.

Ver. 4. For out of much affliction and anguiſh of heart, &c.] Being greatly preſſed in his ſpirit, and grieved at his heart, for the abominable iniquities among them, which they ſeemed to take no notice of, and to be unconcerned about, yea, rather to be puffed up with: I wrote to you with many tears; as ſigns and expreſſions of, and by which were vented, the inward anguiſh and diſtreſs of his ſoul; and the letter he ſent to them, in ſome meaſure bore witneſs to it: which was written, not that you ſhould be grieved; that is, not merely for the ſake of grieving of them, in which he took no pleaſure; not but that the Apoſtle deſigned and deſired to affect their minds with a holy grief and godly ſorrow for ſin, and hereby their amendment; but his chief view was, next to their ſpiritual good, and God's glory, to expreſs the greatneſs of his love to them: as he ſays, that ye might know the love which I have more abundantly unto you; as his love was very vehement towards them, he was deſirous they ſhould know it, and how exceeding abundant it was; and that it was even greater towards them, than to others; and he thought he could not give a greater proof and evidence of it, than by reproving them faithfully, and that ſharply too, as the neceſſity of the caſe required.

Ver. 5. But if any have cauſed grief, &c.] The inceſtuous perſon is here manifeſtly deſigned, tho' he is not named, who had been the cauſe and occaſion of much grief and ſorrow, both to himſelf and others; for the Apoſtle is not to be underſtood, as though he doubted whether he had cauſed grief or no, but rather takes it for granted, as a certain point; if, ſeeing, or although he has cauſed grief: he hath not grieved me but in part; or in ſome meaſure; as it has reflected diſhonour on God and his ways, truths and ordinances; and has brought trouble upon himſelf, and the church of which he is a member; for the Apoſtle now rejoiced, that he was truly humbled for his ſin, and ſincerely, and in an evangelical manner, repented of it; his grief was over, and it was as if it was not; and the offence he took was now wholly removed: beſides, though this man did grieve him, it was but in part; he was not the ſole cauſe of his grief; they alſo greatly added to it, by their unconcernedneſs for him, and negligence in reproving him, though he takes notice only of this ſingle man: that I may not overcharge you all; bear hard upon them, aggravate their ſin, and increaſe their trouble: or thus, that man has not grieved me only, but in ſome meaſure all of you; for the phraſe all you, may be conſidered, not in connexion with the word overcharge, but with the word grieved; and the reading and ſenſe of the whole be this, he hath not grieved me, but in part, or in ſome meaſure; or as the Syriac reads it, בציר קליל לכלכון, almoſt all of you; but this, as if he ſhould ſay, I do but juſt mention, would not dwell upon it, that I may not overcharge him, or be thought to be overbearing, or ſhould aggravate his ſin and ſorrow: for,

Ver. 6. Sufficient to ſuch a man is this puniſhment, &c.] By this puniſhment is meant, the excommunication of the inceſtuous perſon, or the cenſure that was laid upon him by the church: for this was inflicted by many; not by the paſtor only, or by the elders, or more eminent perſons in the church, but by the multitude, by the whole congregation, at leaſt υπο των πλειονων, by the more; the greater, or major part; and not by one, or a few only: in inflicting this puniſhment, or laying on this cenſure in the publick manner they did, they were certainly right, and to be commended; but inaſmuch as there appeared ſigns of true repentance, it was ſufficient, it had anſwered the purpoſe for which it was inflicted, and therefore it was high time to remove it: from whence we learn, that in caſe of groſs enormities, there ought to be a publick excommunication; and that this is to be done by the vote, and with the conſent of the whole church, or the major part of it; and that in proceſs of time, when the perſon thus dealt with, has given the church ſatisfaction as to the truth and genuineneſs of his repentance, the cenſure ought to be taken off, and he be cordially received into the communion of the church again. This puniſhment, or rebuke, επιτιμια by many, is the ſame which the Jews call [c], התוכחה ברבים, a reproof by many; which is given by many, or in the preſence of many.

Ver. 7. So that contrariwiſe ye ought rather to forgive him, &c.] On the other hand, ſo far the Apoſtle ſuggeſts they ſhould be from inflicting any other puniſhment on him, or by any means adding to, and increaſing what was inflicted, that they ought to forgive him his offence, by taking off the cenſure from him, which had been ſufficient for the purpoſe, and had continued on him a ſufficient time: and comfort him; by reſtoring him to the communion of the church, and to an enjoyment of all the privileges and ordinances of the houſe of God: and this was neceſſary to be done, leſt perhaps ſuch an one ſhould be ſwallowed up with over much ſorrow; be overwhelmed with trouble, ingulphed in deſpair, and ſo become unfit for the exerciſe of grace, and diſcharge of duty; to prevent therefore ſuch dangerous and pernicious conſequences, it is incumbent on the churches of Chriſt, as ſoon as ever they obſerve that cenſures have anſwered the end in bringing perſons to a ſenſe and acknowledgment of ſin and amendment of life, to remove them, and reſtore to fellowſhip.

Ver. 8. Wherefore I beſeech you, &c.] Or exhort you: that ye would confirm your love towards him; expreſs your love to him in the moſt kind and tender manner, ſhew the ſame, and as ſtrong love to him as you did before, and as if he had never offended; receive him as a brother in the moſt affectionate manner, and embrace him with the moſt endearing expreſſions of reſpect and friendſhip; and let your reception of him in this kind and friendly way be with the full conſent, and by the joint vote and ſuffrage of the whole church, for ſo the word tranſlated confirm ſignifies; for as the ejection of a perſon out of a church, muſt be done by the decree and vote of the church, or it is not authentic, ſo the reception of a perſon into it, muſt be in like manner; and ſince this was to be done by the ſuffrage of the church, the Apoſtle beſeeches and exhorts them to do it.

Ver. 9. For to this end alſo did I write, &c.] Or I have written, both in this and in his former epiſtle to them, and in both with this view, that I might know the proof of you; that he might try, prove, and know them: whether ye be obedient in all things; he wrote unto them in his former epiſtle, to put away that wicked man from them; which he did not do, merely to reproach the man, and fix a brand of infamy on him; nor merely to grieve and afflict their minds; nor only to ſhew his own power and authority, which he as an Apoſtle had received from Chriſt, but to make trial of their obedience; and he had had a proof of it in their rejection of him; and now he writes unto them, that ſince this man was truly humbled for his ſin, and had repentance unto life not to be repented of, that they would as chearfully receive him, and reſtore him to his place; that as the Apoſtle had a proof of their obedience in the one, he might alſo have in the other, and ſo in all things: hence it appears, that though it belongs to the whole church, and that only, to reject or receive members, yet as miniſters of the Goſpel are ſet over the churches, to govern, guide, direct, and go before in matters of diſcipline; ſo whatever they propoſe according to the rule of God's word, ought to be carefully attended to and obeyed.

Ver. 10. To whom ye forgive any thing, I forgive alſo, &c.] This may extend to the forgiveneſs of any perſon, in any caſe; either in time paſt, or at the preſent time, or in time to come; though it has a particular reſpect to the forgiveneſs of the inceſtuous man, which the Apoſtle had determined in his own mind, and was very ready to come into, and very deſirous to join with the church in, as they had joined with him in the excommunication of him; and in order to engage them in ſuch a temper and diſpoſition, he tells them it was on their account he did it: for if I forgave any thing, to whom I forgave it, for your ſakes forgave I it; which is as if he ſhould ſay, whenever I have forgiven any offender, as I now do forgive this man, I always do it for your ſake; either at your requeſt, or in confidence of this, that you yourſelves have forgiven; or for your good, peace, and welfare: and beſides, what I do of this kind, I do it in the perſon of Chriſt; in his ſight and preſence, who knows that what I do this way, I do it ſincerely, and with my whole heart and ſoul; or rather I do it in his name, and by his authority; and ſince I forgive this man for your ſakes, and in the name of Chriſt, you ought to do ſo likewiſe.

Ver. 11. Leſt ſatan ſhould get an advantage of us, &c.] Or make gain of us, or we ſhould be circumvented by him; a metaphor taken from covetous perſons, who take every occaſion, and make uſe of every advantage to circumvent and deceive perſons in trading with them: ſatan gets an advantage of the churches, when church diſcipline is brought into neglect and contempt, or turned into tyranny; or when he can draw off any perſon from a church, or keep him out of it: wherefore the Apoſtle's argument is, that ſince the inceſtuous perſon had true repentance for his ſin, he ought to be forgiven, comforted, and received into the church; leſt by too great ſeverity, and a too long continuance of the cenſure on him, he ſhould be either plunged into deſpair, or be drawn into a denial of the faith, or into an open ſcandalous courſe of wickedneſs; and ſo the church entirely loſe a member, that might by the proper uſe of diſcipline, have been an uſeful one, and ſatan gain one: for we are not ignorant of his devices; and cunning ſtratagems; ſome of his crafty contrivances and deſigns are known, though not all of them; and this particularly, that he ſometimes transforms himſelf into an angel of light, and under pretence of ſhewing a juſt indignation againſt ſin, and keeping up a ſtrict and righteous diſcipline, deſtroys ſouls, ruins churches, and brings religion into contempt. This was one of his devices in former times, that perſons who fell into any groſs ſin after baptiſm, and a profeſſion of religion, were never to be reſtored and received into the communion of the church again, let their repentance be ever ſo ſincere. This cruel and inexorable ſpirit, under the ſhew of ſtrict religion and diſcipline, is what the Apoſtle here would caution againſt, as one of the wiles of ſatan.

Ver. 12. Furthermore when I came to Troas, &c.] The Apoſtle proceeds in this latter part of the chapter, to take notice of, and remove the charge of oſtentation and inſincerity in preaching the Goſpel, and hints at other reaſons of his not coming to Corinth; particularly that he took a journey to Troas, expecting to meet with Titus there, who was to give him an account of the affairs of the church at Corinth, which he was deſirous of knowing before he went thither; but miſſing of Titus, is uneaſy, and goes for Macedonia; though he was firſt detained a while at Troas, having a good opportunity of preaching the Goſpel there, with a proſpect of ſucceſs. Troas was a city of the leſſer Aſia near the Helleſpont, formerly called Troy; of Paul's being at this place more than once, ſee 2 Tim. iv. 13. Acts xvi. 7, 8. and xx. 6. and of this place, ſee the note on Acts xvi. 8. and of the church there, ſee the note on Acts xx. 7. Hither he came, to preach Chriſt's Goſpel; that Goſpel, of which Chriſt is both the author and ſubject; and is no other than the good news and glad tidings, of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, life, and ſalvation, by a crucified Jeſus; this was his work and buſineſs; his heart was in it, he took delight in this ſervice, and it was what he purſued in every place wherever he came; and in this place he had much encouragement: for he adds, and a door was opened unto me of the Lord; ſuch an one as was opened to him at Epheſus, 1 Cor. xvi. 9. he had a good opportunity of preaching the Goſpel to many ſouls, many were inclined to attend his miniſtry, from whence he conceived great hopes of doing good; a door of utterance was given to him to preach the Goſpel boldly and freely, and a door of entrance for the Goſpel to paſs into their hearts: all which was not of men, but of the Lord; who has the key of David, who opens and no man ſhuts, ſhuts and no man opens.

Ver. 13. I had no reſt in my ſpirit, &c.] Though there was ſuch a door opened to preach the Goſpel, and ſuch an opportunity of doing good, yet he was greatly diſtreſſed in his mind, very reſtleſs and uneaſy in his ſpirit, and could not be ſatisfied to ſtay; which ſhows, that though he was ſo great a man, he was but a man, and of like paſſions with others: and the occaſion of this diſſatisfaction and uneaſineſs was, becauſe, ſays he, I found not Titus my brother; whom he ſo ſtiles, not merely becauſe he was a fellow chriſtian, but becauſe he was a fellow labourer in the Goſpel; and by calling him ſo, puts an honour upon him, and expreſſes his affection for him: now not finding him as he expected, he grew uneaſy; not that he wanted him as an interpreter for him, or his aſſiſtance in preaching the Goſpel at Troas, where ſo many were inclined to hear the word; but becauſe he was exceedingly deſirous of knowing from him, the ſtate of affairs in the church at Corinth; ſo that this whole account is given, to ſhew his affectionate concern for, and care of that church; which he goes on with, ſaying, but taking my leave of them; the diſciples at Troas, and ordering and preſcribing, as the word here uſed ſignifies, how things ſhould be managed for the beſt after his departure; for as there was a door opened for the miniſtry of the word, it can't be thought he would leave it thus, without fixing proper perſons to go on with the work, and proper directions how to conduct themſelves; and very likely he ordained Carpus to be their elder, biſhop, or overſeer: and having done this, he went into Macedonia; in queſt of Titus, whom he ſo earneſtly deſired to ſee, and by whoſe coming to him he was greatly refreſhed and comforted; ſee ch. vii. 5, 6, 7.

Ver. 14. Now thanks be unto God, &c.] The Apoſtle having mentioned the door that was opened for him at Troas, to preach the Goſpel with ſucceſs, calls to mind the great and manifold appearances of God for him and his fellow miniſters, in bleſſing their labours to the converſion of many ſouls; which cauſes him to break forth into thankſgiving to God, on this account: what he takes notice of, and is thankful to God for is, that he always cauſeth us to triumph in Chriſt; not only had done ſo, but continued to do ſo: ſome verſions aſcribe this act of triumph to God, as his act, reading the paſſage thus, now thanks be unto God, who triumphs over us, or by us in Chriſt; who has conquered us by his grace, and made uſe of us as inſtruments for the converſion of ſinners; and ſo firſt triumphed over us, having ſubdued us to himſelf, and then over others by us, in whoſe hearts the arrows of his word have been ſharp and powerful: ſo the word is uſed for the perſon's own act of triumph ſpoken of, Col. ii. 15. but here it ſignifies, as words do in the Hebrew conjugation Hiphil, which moſt commonly denote an effect upon another, or which is cauſed and produced in another, and is rightly rendered, which cauſeth us to triumph; and refers not to the triumph of faith, common with the Apoſtles to other believers; though this is in Chriſt, in his righteouſneſs, death, reſurrection, aſcenſion, ſeſſion at God's right-hand, and interceſſion; and is what God cauſes, and to whom thanks is to be given for it: but this is a triumph peculiar to miniſters of the Goſpel, who are made to triumph over men and devils, over the world, the reproaches, perſecutions, ſmiles, and flatteries of it; over wicked men, by ſilencing them, ſtopping the mouths of gainſayers, refuting falſe teachers, and preſerving the Goſpel pure, in ſpite of all oppoſition; and by being made uſeful to the turning of many ſouls from darkneſs to light, and from the power of ſatan unto God: and this is in Chriſt; 'tis owing to the victory he has got; 'tis by his ſtrength, 'tis in his name, for his ſake, and becauſe of his glory herein concerned: and always; wherever the miniſters of Chriſt are called to labour, and whereever the Goſpel is purely and powerfully preached by them, ſome good is done; and they are made to triumph over hell and earth, over ſin, ſatan, and the world; and for all this, thanks is due to God; for he it is that cauſes them to triumph, or they never could; as will eaſily appear, if we conſider what poor weak inſtruments they themſelves are; what oppoſition is made againſt them; what wonderful things are done by them; by what means they triumph, by the preaching of the croſs, and that in the midſt of the greateſt preſſures and afflictions. Thanks are alſo given to God, that he maketh manifeſt the ſavour of his knowledge by us in every place; by his knowledge is meant, either the knowledge of God, who cauſes the miniſters of the Goſpel to triumph; or the knowledge of Chriſt, in whom they triumph; or rather of both, of the knowledge of God in Chriſt; and deſigns the Goſpel, which is the means thereof: and which is ſaid to have a ſavour in it, and denotes the acceptableneſs of it to ſenſible ſouls; and the good name, fame, and credit, which Chriſt has by the faithful miniſtration of it; and is an alluſion to Cant. i. 3. Now this, God is ſaid to make manifeſt; it was hid before, hid in himſelf, and to the ſons of men; it was like a box of ointment ſhut, but now opened by the preaching of the word, which diffuſes a fragrant ſmell; and therefore he is ſaid to make it manifeſt by us; the miniſters of the Goſpel, who openly, boldly, and faithfully preach it; and by manifeſtation of the truth, ſpread the ſavour of it, and that in every place, where they come; their commiſſion being at large, to go into all the world, and preach the Goſpel to every creature.

Ver. 15. For we are unto God a ſweet ſavour, &c.] Here a reaſon is given, why the ſavour of the knowledge of God in Chriſt, is made manifeſt by the miniſters of the Goſpel, becauſe they themſelves are a ſweet ſavour; not that they are ſo in themſelves, for they have the ſame corrupt hearts and natures, and complain of them as other men; but as having the gifts and graces of the Spirit of God, comparable to fragrant and ſweet ſmelling ointments, Cant. i. 3. and iv. 10. by which they are enabled to preach the ſavoury doctrines of the Goſpel, and to adorn and recommend them by their exemplary lives and converſations: the alluſion is to Aaron and the prieſts under the law, who were anointed with the anointing oil, which was poured upon their heads, ran down upon their beards, and deſcended to the ſkirts of their garments, ſo that they were all over a perfume, a ſweet ſmell and ſavour; and ſo are the miniſters of the word, being anointed with that, which the other was typical of. They are ſaid to be a ſweet ſavour of Chriſt, becauſe they have their gifts, grace, and Goſpel from him, and he is the ſubject of their miniſtry; ſo that this ſweet ſavour of theirs, is not properly theirs, but his, whoſe perſon, blood, righteouſneſs, ſacrifice, grace, and the fulneſs of it, as held forth in the Goſpel miniſtry, are ſweet and ſavoury to believers. Moreover, it is unto God they are ſuch a ſavour, not unto men, mere carnal men, for with them they are the filth of the world, and the offscouring of all things; but they are grateful and well pleaſing to God, as their miniſtrations make for, and ſhew forth his honour and glory; and this they are in them that are ſaved; who are choſen by God unto ſalvation, for whom Chriſt has wrought it out, to whom it is applied by the Spirit of God, who are heirs of it, and are kept unto it, and for it, by the power of God, and ſhall certainly enjoy it: yea, they are a ſweet ſavour in them that periſh; all mankind are thro' ſin, in a periſhing condition; ſome of them ſhall never periſh, but are, and ſhall be ſaved with an everlaſting ſalvation; others will periſh in their ſins, to which they are abandoned; and in what ſenſe the miniſters of the Goſpel are a ſavour in theſe, is ſhewn in the following verſe.

Ver. 16. To the one we are the ſavour of death unto death, &c.] Who are for death, or appointed to it; ſee Jer. xliii. 11. What the Apoſtle ſays of the Goſpel, and Goſpel-miniſters, the Jews his country men uſed frequently to ſay of the law, and to which he ſeems to refer; "ſaith Rabba[f], to " them that go on the right hand of it, (the law) " it is סמא דחיי, the ſavour of life; but to them " that go on the left hand of it, it is סמא דמותא, " the ſavour of death." Again[g], " every one that " ſtudies in the law for the ſake of it, to him it be" comes סם חיים, the ſavour of life, according to " Prov. iii. 18. and viii. 35. but every one that " ſtudies in the law, not for the ſake of it, to him " it becomes סם המות, the ſavour of death;" once more[h], " if a man is worthy or righteous, to " him the law becomes סם חיים, the ſavour of " life; but if he is not righteous, it becomes to " him סם מיתה, the ſavour of death:" and this they not only ſay of the written law, but alſo of their oral law[i], and are not contented with thoſe general deſcriptions of perſons to whom the law is ſo, but particularly mention the Gentiles; " the " words of the law, ſay they[k], are סם חיים, the " ſavour of life, to the Iſraelites; and סם המות, " the ſavour of death, to the nations of the world:" that the law ſhould be the ſavour of death, ſince it is the miniſtration of it, and can't give life, ſee Gal. iii. 21. is no wonder; but that the Goſpel and the miniſters of that, ſhould be the ſavour of death unto death, may ſeem ſtrange, but ſo it is. Theſe preach up ſalvation by the death of Chriſt, and ſo are the ſweet ſavour of the death of Chriſt; but this being deſpiſed and rejected by the ſons of men, is unto the death, and iſſues in the eternal death of the deſpiſers and rejecters of it; likewiſe this doctrine preached by them, ſtrikes with death all a man's wiſdom, righteouſneſs, and holineſs, and declares that life and ſalvation are only by Chriſt and his righteouſneſs; and beſides, is attended with perſecution and death, and therefore is fooliſhneſs to them that periſh; and ſo becomes, the ſavour of death unto death; a ſavour, but not a ſweet ſavour, nor the ſweet ſavour of Chriſt; a ſweet ſavour indeed to God, whoſe juſtice, holineſs, power and wiſdom are diſplayed, in the death and righteous deſtruction of ſinners, but not to them: to the other, the ſavour of life unto life; thoſe who are ordained to eternal life. The Goſpel preached by Chriſt's faithful miniſters, is the means of quickning ſouls, and giving them ſpiritual life; and of ſupporting and maintaining that life, and of nouriſhing them up unto eternal life; and ſo becomes the ſavour of life ſpiritual, unto life eternal. The Alexandrian copy, and ſome others, and ſo the Ethiopic verſion read both clauſes, from death to death, and from life to life; with which compare Rom. i. 17. 2 Cor. iii. 18. and then the meaning may be, either as Grotius obſerves, that the ill report of the Goſpel from men dead in ſin, brings death to thoſe who give credit to it; and the good report of it from God, the author of life, to which may be added from miniſters, who are alive in a ſpiritual ſenſe, is the means of life to others; or they are the means of adding death to death, death eternal, to death ſpiritual, or moral; death for ſin, to death in ſin, the Goſpel being deſpiſed; and of increaſing ſpiritual life, the comforts of it; and of adding eternal life to ſpiritual life: upon the whole of which, the Apoſtle makes this exclamation, and who is ſufficient for theſe things; the meaning of which is either, who is able to ſearch and find out the reaſon of this different influence of the Goſpel-miniſtry upon the ſouls of men? no man can do it; it muſt be aſcribed to the ſovereign will and pleaſure of God, who hides the Goſpel from ſome, and reveals it to others; or who is ſufficient for the preaching of the Goſpel? no man is ſufficient of himſelf, very inſufficient in the beſt ſenſe, and none ſo but by the grace of God, and gifts of his Spirit; or who is ſufficient to give ſucceſs to the Goſpel when preached? none can do this; Paul may plant, and Apollos water, but tis God alone that gives the increaſe.

Ver. 17. For we are not as many, &c.] The Apoſtle here removes from himſelf, and other miniſters of the Goſpel, a character which belonged not to them, but to the falſe apoſtles; who are deſcribed by their number many; there were great ſwarms of falſe teachers in the early times of chriſtianity; ſee 1 John ii. 18. and iv. 1. ſome copies read, as the reſt; and ſo the Syriac and Arabic verſions: and alſo by their quality, which corrupt the word of God; by the word of God, may be meant the ſcriptures in general, which are from God, contain his will, and which he uſes for the good of men, and his own glory, and may be corrupted by falſe gloſſes, and human mixtures, and by adding to them, or taking from them; or the Goſpel in particular, which is the word of truth, of faith, righteouſneſs, reconciliation, and ſalvation, and which was corrupted by theſe falſe teachers, by making merchandize of it; they huckſtered the word of God, made gain of it, ſought merely their own worldly intereſt and advantage in it, and ſo mixed it with their own vain philoſophy, to pleaſe the carnal ears and hearts of men; they blended law and Goſpel, grace and works, in the buſineſs of ſalvation; they did, as pedling merchants do, mix good and bad commodities together, and then vend them for ſound ware; or as vintners, who mix their wine with water, and ſell it for neat wine. The Septuagint interpreters on Iſ. ii. 22. tranſlate the laſt clauſe of that verſe thus, οι καπηλοι σου μισγουσι τον οινον υδατι, thy vintners mix wine with water; which may be underſtood in a moral or ſpiritual ſenſe; ſo did theſe men mix, and hereby corrupt the Goſpel, the word of God; and ſo the Syriac verſion reads the words, דממזגין, who mix the word of God: now the Apoſtle ſays, they did not do ſo; they delivered out the word pure and unmixed, without any corruption or adulteration: but as of ſincerity, but as of God, in the ſight of God, ſays he, ſpeak we in Chriſt; they ſpoke in Chriſt, in the name of Chriſt, of or concerning him, and him only, and freely, fully, and plainly, as God's free gift, and the only way of ſalvation without the works of men: and they ſpoke, as of ſincerity; what they delivered was the ſincere milk of the word; the manner in which they did it, was ſincere, with all integrity and faithfulneſs; and ſo were their views, which were not their own profit and applauſe, but the glory of God and the good of ſouls; they ſpoke in Chriſt, and with all ſincerity, as of God; by whom they were called and ſent forth to ſpeak in his name, and from whom they received the Goſpel, and gifts, and abilities to preach it; and all this they did, in the ſight of God, as the ſearcher of hearts, and to whom they knew, they muſt give an account of their miniſtry another day.

CHAP. III.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle clears himſelf, from the charge of arrogance and ſelf-commendation, and aſcribes both the virtue and efficacy of his miniſtry, and his qualifications for it to the Lord; and forms a compariſon between the miniſtration of the Goſpel, and the miniſtration of the law, ſhewing the preferableneſs of the one to the other; and conſequently how much more happy and comfortable, the ſtate and condition of the ſaints under the Goſpel-diſpenſation, is than under the legal one: on account of what the Apoſtle had ſaid in the latter part of the preceding chapter, concerning the excellency, uſefulneſs, and ſucceſs of the Goſpel-miniſtry, he foreſaw an objection would ariſe; that he and his fellow-miniſters were proud and arrogant, and commended themſelves, which was unſeemly, and not agreeable to the character they bore; which objection he obviates, ver. 1. by putting ſome queſtions, ſignifying that they were not guilty of vain boaſting; nor did they need any commendations of their own, or others, nor any letters to recommend them, either from Corinth to other places, or thither; a practice which he ſuggeſts, the falſe teachers made uſe of; and in ver. 2. he gives the reaſon why they did not ſtand in need of ſuch letters, becauſe the members of the church at Corinth, were their epiſtle or letter, declaring to all men the efficacy and ſucceſs of their miniſtry among men; but leſt he ſhould be charged with arrogating to himſelf and others, he declares, ver. 3. that tho' the Corinthians were their epiſtle, yet not ſo much theirs as Chriſt's; Chriſt was the author and ſubject, they only were inſtruments; the writing was not human, but the writing of the Spirit of God; and that not upon outward tables, ſuch as the law was written upon, but upon the tables of mens hearts, which only God can reach; however, that they had been uſeful, ſucceſsful, and inſtrumental in the converſion of ſouls, thro' the miniſtry of the word, that he was confident of, ver. 4. tho' the ſufficiency and ability to think, ſtudy, and preach, were not of themſelves, and ſtill leſs to make the word effectual for converſion and comfort, but of God, ver. 5. wherefore he aſcribes all fitneſs, worthineſs, and ability to preach the Goſpel to the grace and power of God, by which they were made miniſters of it; and hence he takes occaſion to commend the excellency of the Goſpel-miniſtry, above that of the law, which he does by obſerving their different names and effects; the Goſpel is the New Teſtament or covenant, or an exhibition of the covenant of grace in a new form; the law is the Old Teſtament or covenant which is vaniſhed away; which tho' not expreſſed here, is in ver. 14. the Goſpel is Spirit, the law the letter; the one gives life, and the other kills, ver. 6. wherefore the Apoſtle argues from the one to the other, that if there was a glory in the one which was only a miniſtration of death, as the law was, ver. 7. then the Goſpel, which was a miniſtration of ſpiritual things, and of the Spirit of God himſelf, muſt be more glorious, ver. 8. and if that was glorious which was a miniſtration of condemnation, as the law was to guilty ſinners; much more glorious muſt be the Goſpel, which is a miniſtration of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, for the juſtification of them, ver. 9. yea, ſuch is the ſurpaſſing glory of the Goſpel to the law, that even the glory of the law is quite loſt, in that of the Goſpel, and appears to have none in compariſon of that, ver. 10. to which he adds another argument, taken from the abolition of the one, and the continuance of the other; that if there was a glory in that which is aboliſhed, there muſt be a greater in that which continues, ver. 11. and from hence the Apoſtle proceeds to take notice of another difference between the law and the Goſpel, the clearneſs of the one, and the obſcurity of the other; the former is ſignified by the plainneſs of ſpeech uſed by the preachers of it, ver. 12. and the latter by the vail which was over Moſes's face, when he delivered the law to the children of Iſrael; the end of which they could not look to, and which is a further proof of the obſcurity of it, ver. 13. as well as of the darkneſs of their minds; which ſtill continues with the Jews in reading the law, and will do until it is taken away by Chriſt, ver. 14. and that there is ſuch a vail of darkneſs upon the hearts of the Jews, when reading the law of Moſes; and that this continues to this day, is again aſſerted, ver. 15. and an intimation given that there will be a converſion of them to the Lord, and then it will be removed from them, ver. 16. and who that Lord is to whom they ſhall be turned, and by whom they ſhall have freedom from darkneſs and bondage, is declared, ver. 17. and the happy condition of the ſaints under the Goſpel-diſpenſation, thro' the bright and clear light of it, is obſerved, ver. 18. in which the Goſpel is compared to a glaſs; the ſaints are repreſented as without a vail looking into it; thro' which an object is beheld, the glory of the Lord; the effect of which is a transformation of them, into the ſame image by degrees; the author of which grace, is the Spirit of the Lord.

Ver. 1. Do we begin again to commend ourſelves? &c.] The Apoſtle having aſſerted that he and his fellow-miniſters always triumphed in Chriſt, and made manifeſt the ſavour of his knowledge in every place; were a ſweet ſavour of Chriſt to God, did not corrupt the word of God, as ſome did, but ſincerely and faithfully preached Chriſt; ſome might inſinuate from hence, that he was guilty of arrogance and vain glory; wherefore to remove ſuch a charge, or prevent its being brought, he aſks, do we begin again to commend ourſelves? we do not; what we ſay, we ſay honeſtly, ſincerely, in the ſimplicity of our hearts, without any view to our own glory and applauſe among men, or for any worldly profit and advantage, or to ingratiate ourſelves into your affections; we have no ſuch views: ſome read theſe words without an interrogation, we do begin again to commend ourſelves; as we have done already, in this and the former epiſtles; and as it is but juſt and right that we ſhould vindicate our characters, ſupport our good name and reputation, and ſecure and maintain our credit, which ſome would maliciouſly deprive us of: tho' we have no need as ſome others, of epiſtles of commendation to you, or letters of commendation from you; our perſons, characters, and uſefulneſs are too well known, to require commendatory letters from others to you, or from you to others. The falſe Apoſtles are here ſtruck at, whoſe practice it was to get letters of commendation from place to place; which they carried about and made uſe of for their temporal advantage, having nothing truly good and excellent in them to recommend them to others. The Apoſtle does not hereby condemn letters of recommendation, which in proper caſes may be very lawfully given, and a good uſe be made of them; only that he and other Goſpel-miniſters, were ſo well known, as to ſtand in no need of them.

Ver. 2. Ye are our epiſtle, &c.] Here a reaſon is given why they ſtood in no need of letters of commendation, to or from the church at Corinth, becauſe that church was their living epiſtle, and which was much preferable to any written one. The Apoſtle calls them their epiſtle in the ſame ſenſe, as they are ſaid to be his work in the Lord, and the ſeal of his apoſtleſhip, 1 Cor. ix. 1, 2. they were ſo as perſons regenerated by the Spirit and grace of God, in whoſe converſion he was an inſtrument; now it was the work of converſion in them, which was the epiſtle ſaid to be written in our hearts; ſome think it ſhould be read, in your hearts; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion reads it; and it looks as if it ſhould be ſo read, from the following verſe, and from the nature of the thing itſelf; for the converſion of the Corinthians was not written in the hearts of the Apoſtle, but in their own; and this was ſo very notorious and remarkable, that it was known and read of all men; every one could read, and was obliged to acknowledge the hand-writing; it was ſo clear a caſe, what hand the Apoſtle, as an inſtrument, had in the turning of theſe perſons from idols to ſerve the living God; and which was ſo full a proof of the divinity, efficacy, truth, and ſincerity of his doctrine, that he needed no letters from any to recommend him.

Ver. 3. Foraſmuch as ye are manifeſtly declared, &c.] But leſt it ſhould be thought that the Apoſtle attributed too much to himſelf, by ſaying, that the Corinthians were our epiſtle; here he ſays, they were manifeſtly declared to be the epiſtle of Chriſt miniſtered by us; ſo that the Apoſtles and miniſters of the word were only amanuenſes, Chriſt was the author and dictator; yea, he himſelf is the very matter, ſum, ſubſtance, and ſubject of the epiſtle; he is formed in the hearts of his people in converſion, his image is enſtamped, his grace is implanted, his word, his Goſpel dwells richly, his laws and ordinances are written here; he alſo is the exemplar, believers are but copies of him, in grace and duty, in ſufferings, in the likeneſs of his death and reſurrection: and they are manifeſtly declared to be ſo, by the impreſſes of Chriſt's grace upon them; by the fairneſs of the copy; by the ſtile and language of the epiſtle; by their likeneſs to Chriſt; by their having not the form only, but the power of godlineſs; and by their lives and converſations: now in writing theſe epiſtles, the miniſters of the Goſpel are only inſtruments, miniſtered by us. They are made uſe of to ſhew the ſinner the black characters which are written upon him, and that what is written in him, and to be read by him, by the light of nature is not ſufficient for ſalvation; they are employed as inſtruments in drawing the rough draught of grace in converſion, and in writing the copy over again, fairer and fairer; being the happy means bleſſed by God, for the building up of ſouls in faith and holineſs, in ſpiritual knowledge and comfort. Theſe epiſtles are not written with ink; of nature's power, or of rhetorical eloquence, and moral ſuaſion; but with the Spirit of the living God; every grace that is implanted in the ſoul, is wrought there by the Spirit of God; or he it is that draws every line, and writes every word and letter; he begins, he carries on and finiſhes the work of grace on the ſoul; and that as the Spirit of the living God: hence ſaints become the living epiſtles of Chriſt; and every letter and ſtroke of his making, is a living diſpoſition of the ſoul in likeneſs to him; and ſuch are written among the living in Jeruſalem, and ſhall live and abide for ever as the epiſtles of Chriſt: again, the ſubjects of theſe epiſtles, or that on which they are written are, not tables of ſtone; ſuch as the law was written upon, on mount Sinai: of theſe tables there were the firſt and ſecond; the firſt were the work of God himſelf, the latter were hewed by Moſes, at the command of God, Exod. xxxii. 16. and xxxiv. 1. the former being broken when he came down from the mount, which by the Jewiſh writers are ſaid to be miraculouſly made, and not by the means and artifice of men [l]; yea, that they were made before the creation of the world [m], and which they commonly ſay, were made of ſapphire; ſee the note on ver. 7. theſe, as the latter, were two ſtones, which Jarchi ſays [n], were of an equal bigneſs; and were as Abarbinel ſays [o], in the form of ſmall tables, ſuch as children are taught to write upon, and therefore are ſo called: ſome pretend to give the dimenſions of them, and ſay [p], that they were ſix hands long, and as many broad, and three thick; nay, even the weight of them, which is ſaid [q] to be the weight of forty Seahs, and look upon it as a miracle that Moſes ſhould be able to carry them: on theſe ſtones were written the ten commands; and the common opinion of the Jewiſh writers is, that five were written on one table, and five on the other; this is the opinion of Joſephus [r], Philo [s], and the Talmudic writers [t]; and the tables are ſaid to be written on both ſides, Exod. xxxii. 15. Some think that the engraving of the letters perforated and went thro' the tables, ſo that in a miraculous manner, the letters were legible on both ſides; others think, only the right and left hand of the tables are meant, on which the laws were written, five on a ſide, and which folded up like the tables or pages of a book; tho' others are of opinion, that they were written upon, both behind and before, and that the law was written twice, both upon the fore part and back part of the tables, yea, others ſay four times; and ſome think the phraſe only intends the literal and myſtical, the external and internal ſenſe of the law: howewever, certain it is, as the Apoſtle here ſuggeſts, that the law was written on tables of ſtone, which may denote the firmneſs and ſtability of the law; not as in the hands of Moſes, from whence the tables fell and were broken, but as in the hands of Chriſt, by whom they are fulfilled; or elſe the hardneſs of man's heart, his ſtupidity, ignorance of, and unſubjection to the law of God: but fleſhly tables of the heart; alluding to Ezek. xxxvi. 26. and deſigns not carnal hearts, but ſuch as are made ſoft and tender by the Spirit of God. The table of the heart is a phraſe to be met with in the books of the Old Teſtament; ſee Prov. iii. 3. and vii. 3. Jer. xvii. 1. and very frequently in the writings of the Jews [u].

Ver. 4. And ſuch truſt have we, &c.] This refers to what he had ſaid in the latter end of the foregoing chapter, and the beginning of this; as that they made manifeſt the ſavoury knowledge of God and Chriſt every where, and were the ſweet ſavour of Chriſt to many ſouls; were ſufficient in ſome meaſure, thro' the grace of Chriſt, to preach the Goſpel ſincerely and faithfully, and were attended with ſucceſs, had many ſeals of their miniſtry, and particularly the Corinthians were ſo many living epiſtles of commendations of the power and efficacy of their miniſtry; ſuch confidence and firm perſuaſion of the truth of grace on your ſouls, and of our being the happy inſtruments of it, we have thro' Chriſt, the grace of Chriſt, to God-ward; who is the object of our confidence and hope, and the ground thereof.

Ver. 5. Not that we are ſufficient of ourſelves, &c.] Tho' we are ſufficient for this work to which God has called us, and have ſuch truſt and confidence that he has bleſſed and owned us, and done ſuch great things by us; yet we don't aſcribe any thing to ourſelves, to any power of ours, to any ſelf-ſufficiency in us: for we are not ſufficient of ourſelves; neither for the work of the miniſtry, nor for the converſion of ſinners, nor for faith and hope in God, nor for any ſpiritual work whatever; not even to think any thing as of ourſelves; any good thing, either for our own uſe and benefit, or for the advantage of others; we are not able of ourſelves, to meditate with judgment and affection upon the word of God, to ſtudy the ſcriptures, to collect from them things fit for the miniſtry; and much leſs with freedom and boldneſs to ſpeak of them to edification; and ſtill leſs able to impreſs them upon the heart: for tho' you who are the epiſtle of Chriſt are miniſtered by us, yet not by any power and ſelf-ſufficiency of ours; but our ſufficiency is of God; to think, to ſpeak, and to act for his glory.

Ver. 6. Who alſo hath made us able miniſters, &c.] This is an anſwer to the queſtion in chap. ii. 16. who is ſufficient for theſe things? no man is of himſelf; we are indeed ſufficient for them, but not of ourſelves; our ſufficiency is of God, he hath made us able, or ſufficient miniſters: ſuch miniſters as are not of men's, but God's making, are ſufficient ones; and none are ſufficient but whom God makes ſo; and thoſe he makes able and ſufficient, by giving them ſpiritual gifts, fitting them for the miniſtry: and theſe are miniſters of the New Teſtament, or covenant; the covenant of grace, of which Chriſt is the mediator and ſurety; called new, not becauſe newly made, for it was made with Chriſt from everlaſting; nor newly revealed, for it was made known to Adam after his fall, and to all the Old Teſtament patriarchs, and was exhibited under the legal diſpenſation, tho' but darkly, in types, ſhadows, ſacrifices, &c. which therefore waxing old is vaniſhed away; and the covenant of grace is now more clearly revealed under the Goſpel-diſpenſation, free from all the obſcurity it before laboured under; and therefore is called new, as well as becauſe it will always continue ſo, and never give way to another covenant: now the Goſpel and the miniſtry of it, is nothing elſe but an exhibition of the covenant of grace, its bleſſings and promiſes; and the work and buſineſs of thoſe who are miniſters of it, is not to inſiſt upon the covenant of works, the terms, conditions, obligations, promiſes, and threatnings of that covenant; but to open and explain the nature, promiſes, and bleſſings of the covenant of grace: for ſuch who are fit and proper miniſters, are miniſters not of the letter, but of the Spirit; which is to be underſtood, not of any difference between the books of the Old and the New Teſtament, for a faithful miniſter of the word, may and will bring forth things new and old, out of the one as well as the other; nor of the literal and allegorical, or myſtical ſenſe of the ſcriptures, as if the latter and not the former was only to be attended to; nor of the difference of communicating the Goſpel by letters, and preaching it by word of mouth; ſince both methods may be uſed for the ſpread of it, as were by the Apoſtles themſelves; but of the difference there is between the law and the Goſpel. The law is the letter, not merely becauſe written in letters, for ſo likewiſe is the Goſpel; but becauſe it is a mere letter, hereby ſhewing what is to be done or avoided, without any efficacy in it, or communicating any to enable perſons to obey its commands, to give life to its obſervers, or either to ſanctify or juſtify any who are under it, or of the works of it; it is a mere letter, as obſerved by an unregenerate man, who only regards the externals of it, being unacquainted with its ſpirituality. The Goſpel is the Spirit; ſee John vi. 63. it contains ſpiritual things, and not things merely natural, moral and civil, as does the law, but ſpiritual bleſſings and promiſes; it penetrates into the ſpirit and ſoul of man, and comes from, and is attended with the Spirit of God. The law is the letter that killeth, by irritating and provoking to ſin, the cauſe of death, which tho' not the deſign and natural tendency of the law, and therefore not to be blamed, yet ſo it is, thro' the corruption of human nature; and by convincing of ſin when the ſinner is killed, and is dead in his own apprehenſion; and by not only threatning with death, but by curſing, condemning, and puniſhing with it: but the Goſpel is the Spirit, which giveth life; it is a means in the hand of the Spirit of God, of quickning dead ſinners, of healing the deadly wounds of ſin, of ſhewing the way of life by Chriſt, and of working faith in the ſoul, to look to him, and live upon him; it affords food for the ſupport of the ſpiritual life, and revives ſouls under the moſt drooping circumſtances. The Apoſtle may allude to a diſtinction among the Jews, between the body and ſoul of the law; the words they ſay, are גופא תורה, the body of the law; and the book of the law is the cloathing; and beſides theſe, there is נשמתא דאוריתא, the ſoul of the law; which wiſe men look into [w].

Hieroſ. Shekalim, fol. 49. 4. Shemot Rabba, §. 47. fol. 143. 2. Zohar in Exod. fol. 35. 1. [u] Vid. Targum Jon. in Deut. vi. 5. & in Cant. iv. 9.

Ver. 7. But if the miniſtration of death, &c.] The Apoſtle having obſerved the difference between the law and the Goſpel, the one being a killing letter, the other a quickning Spirit, enlarges upon it, and more fully explains it; and proceeds to take notice of other things in which they differ; and to ſhew the ſuperior glory and excellency of the one to the other; for that by the miniſtration of death, he means the law, as delivered to Moſes on mount Sinai, is clear from its being ſaid to be written and engraven in ſtones; as that was by the finger of God himſelf: rightly does the Apoſtle ſay, that it was both written and engraven; for the two tables of the law are expreſsly ſaid to be written with the finger of God, Exod. xxxi. 18. meaning either the Spirit of God, who is ſometimes ſo called, Luke xi. 20. compared with, Matt. xii. 28. or the power of God, which at once cauſed this writing to exiſt; and it is in ſo many words affirmed, that the writing was the writing of God; and not of man, nor of any creature, no not of an angel, Exod. xxxii. 16. yea, even the two tables which were hewn out by Moſes, after the firſt were broken, were written upon by the Lord himſelf, and not Moſes, Exod. xxxiv. 1. So that as the work of the tables was the work of God, and wonderfully made, the form of the letters, as Abarbinel [x] obſerves, were miraculouſly made by him; for this law was εν γραμμασι, in letters, as the Apoſtle here ſays; and as it was written in the Hebrew language, very likely it was in the ſame form of letters now in uſe with the Jews; tho' ſome have thought that the Samaritan letters are the original ones: moreover, the law was not only written, but engraved; for ſo it is ſaid, that the writing was graven upon the tables, Exod. xxxii. 16. and tho' the word ſo rendered, is no where elſe uſed but there, it is rightly rendered graven, as appears by the Apoſtle in this place; and which may be confirmed by the Targumiſt on that, who renders it by חקיק, engraven; and by the Septuagint κεκολαμμενη, which ſignifies the ſame; and ſo in the book of Zohar [y], the letters are ſaid to be, אתגליפו, engraven on the tables: and that the tables were tables of ſtone, it is certain; they are often ſo called, Exod. xxiv. 12. and xxxi. 18. and xxxiv. 1. Deut. ix. 9, 10. and x. 1. wherefore the Apoſtle very properly ſays, that the law was engraven in ſtones; but what ſtones theſe tables were made of, cannot be ſaid; the Jews, who affect to know every thing, will have them to be precious ſtones, but what they were they are not agreed in; for tho' they generally ſay [z], they were made of the Sapphire ſtone, and ſometimes ſay [a], thy were hewed out of the ſapphire of the glorious throne of God; yet at other times they call them marble tables [b]; and Aben Ezra [c] was of opinion, that the tables which Moſes hewed, were not of any precious ſtone, for he aſks where ſhould a precious ſtone of ſuch bigneſs be found? tho' others pretend to ſay [d], that Moſes in a miraculous manner was ſhewn a ſapphire quarry in the midſt of his tent, out of which he cut and hewed the ſtones; but very likely they were common ones; however, certain it is, that the tables of ſtone as written and engraven by the Lord himſelf, were made as the Apoſtle here ſays, in glory, εγενηθε εν δοξη; and ſo Jarchi on Exod. xxxii. 16. and the tables were the work of God, ſays, this is to be underſtood literally, ובכבודו, and in or for his glory; or by his glorious power he made them: now this law, tho' thus written and engraven, and glorious, it was the miniſtration of death; and is ſo called, becauſe it threatned and puniſhed the tranſgreſſors of it, with a corporal death; they that ſinned againſt it died without mercy upon proper evidence and witneſſes; every precept of it had this penalty annexed to it, in caſe of diſobedience; as the having any other Gods but one, making of graven images, taking the name of God in vain, the violation of the ſabbath, diſhonouring of parents, murder, adultery, theft, and covetouſneſs; inſtances there are of each of theſe being puniſhable by this law, with a bodily death: and beſides, it is the miniſtration of eternal death, the wages of ſin the tranſgreſſion of the law; which is that wrath of God, a ſenſe of which it is ſaid to work; the curſe it threatens with, and the ſecond death or lake of fire it caſts into: and may be ſaid to be the miniſtration of it; as it ſhews perſons they are deſerving of it, pronounces the ſentence of it on them, and will execute it upon them, if grace prevent not; now tho' it was the miniſtration of death, yet it was glorious. There were many things which made it ſo; but what the Apoſtle here particularly takes notice of is, the glory that was upon the face of Moſes, when he received it and brought it from the Lord, which was very great; ſo that the children of Iſrael could not ſtedfaſtly behold the face of Moſes, for the glory of his countenance, which glory was to be done away. The hiſtory of this may be read in Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30, 35. it was a real viſible glory that was upon the ſkin of his face, ſo that it ſhone again; it is ſaid, the ſkin of his face ſhone; and this ſhining of his face, the Apoſtle very properly calls, the glory of his countenance; agreeable to the Septuagint verſion, which renders it, the appearance of the ſkin, or colour of his face, was glorified; and ſtill nearer to the paraphraſe of Onkelos, which is, the ſplendor of the glory of his countenance was great; and to the Targum of Jonathan, which alſo aſſigns the reaſon of it, and which ſeems to be the true one, the ſplendor of the form of his countenance was glorious, becauſe of the ſplendor of the glory of the majeſty of God, at the time he talked with him. The Vulgate Latin verſion has lead many wrong, to paint Moſes with two horns, rendering it, his face was horned, the Hebrew word having the ſignification of an horn in its derivative; becauſe glory darted from him like horns, as rays of light do from the ſun; ſee Hab. iii. 4 and this brightneſs and glory were ſo very great, and ſo dazzling, that Aaron and the people of Iſrael were afraid to come nigh; which Jarchi a Jewiſh writer imputed to their ſin, and ſhame, and fear, having worſhipped the calf; but our Apoſtle aſcribes it to the luſtre of his countenance, which was ſuch that they could not ſtedfaſtly look upon it; they ſaw it indeed, as it is ſaid in Exod. xxxiv. 35. yet they could not look wiſhly at it, nor bear the ſplendor of it; tho' this was only a glory, which was to continue but a while; according to the opinion of Ambroſe[e], this glory continued on Moſes's countenance as long as he lived; but be it ſo, it at laſt was done away: now this glory was put there to bear a teſtimony to the divine authority of the law, that it came from God, and was to be received at the hands of Moſes, with awful reference as from God, and to make them afraid of violating a law which came with ſuch majeſty and glory; and alſo to command awe and reſpect from the Iſraelites to Moſes, whom they were inclined at every turn to treat with contempt, and to let them ſee that he had communion with God, which this was the effect of: now this was a circumſtance which rendered the law glorious, and was expreſſive of a real glory in it; which, tho' as this on Moſes's face, was to be done away; wherefore the Apoſtle argues;

Ver. 8. How ſhall not the miniſtration of the Spirit, &c.] By the miniſtration of the Spirit, is meant the Goſpel; ſo called not only becauſe it miniſters ſpiritual things, as peace, pardon, righteouſneſs and ſalvation, ſpiritual joy and comfort, and even ſpiritual life; but becauſe it miniſters the Spirit of God himſelf, by whom it is not only dictated, and by him at firſt confirmed, and who qualifies perſons for the preaching of it; but by it he conveys himſelf into the hearts of men, and makes it powerful for illumination, conſolation, edification, and an increaſe of every grace; and therefore muſt be rather glorious, or much more glorious than the law, the miniſtration of death.

Ver. 9. For if the miniſtration of condemnation be glory, &c.] So the Jews call the law, for they ſay, אין כבוד אלא תורה, there is no glory but the law[f]; this is another head of oppoſition or difference between the law and the Goſpel, from whence the ſuperior glory of the one to the other is argued. The law is the miniſtration of condemnation; as ſin is a tranſgreſſion of the law, it accuſes for it, convinces of it, pronounces guilty, and adjudges to death on account of it; which is the condemnation it miniſters; and this it does to all Adam's poſterity, and for his ſin too; and to all the actual tranſgreſſors of it, to all unbelievers, to all that are under it; even to God's elect themſelves, as conſidered in Adam, and in themſelves as tranſgreſſors; and this it miniſters to their conſciences when convicted, tho' it is never executed on them, becauſe of the ſuretyſhip-engagments and performances of Chriſt. The Goſpel is the miniſtration of righteouſneſs; not of a legal one, or a man's own, but of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, by which the law is honoured, juſtice is ſatisfied, and God's elect juſtified from all ſin and condemnation; this being perfect, pure, and ſpotleſs, and for ever: the Goſpel is the miniſtration of it, as it is a means of ſtripping a man of his own righteouſneſs, of revealing Chriſt's to him, and of working faith in him, and encouraging him to lay hold upon it for himſelf; and thus it is not to righteous perſons, but ſinners, to all believers, to all the ſecond Adam's poſterity; now as much more as righteouſneſs exceeds condemnation, and a juſtified ſtate a condemned one, ſo much more does the Goſpel exceed the law in glory.

Ver. 10. For even that which was made glorious, &c.] The Apoſtle grants that there was a glory in the law; it was made glorious; it was glorious in the author of it, who is God; it was of his appointing and ordaining, agreeable to his nature, and a declaration of his will; his authority was enſtamped upon it, and it was written by himſelf, which cannot be ſaid of any other law whatever; it was glorious in its promulgation, God himſelf appeared in great glory at the giving of it; Chriſt was then preſent; it was ordained by angels, and by them delivered into the hands of Moſes, on whoſe face ſuch a glory was left as could not be ſtedfaſtly looked upon; and it was attended with thunderings, lightnings, the ſound of a trumpet, &c. it was glorious in the matter of it, it contained great and excellent things; the ſubſtance of it is love to God, and to our neighbour; and it was glorious in its properties, being in its nature and ſubſtance, holy, juſt, good, ſpiritual, perfect, immutable and eternal; but yet had no glory in this reſpect, by reaſon of the glory that excelleth. There is ſuch an excelling glory in the Goſpel, that the other is ſwallowed up and loſt in it; it excels it in thoſe things in which it was ſo glorious: on the author of it, which tho' the ſame, yet with this difference; the law was given by God as a judge, the Goſpel by him as a father, as the Father of Chriſt, and of his people in him; the law is the birth of his holineſs and righteouſneſs, the Goſpel of his wiſdom, grace, and love; the law declares his will with reſpect to duty, the Goſpel with reſpect to ſalvation; the authority of God is enſtamped on the law, but the Goſpel is the image of Chriſt; the law was written by the finger of God, but the Goſpel was hid in his heart, and came from thence: in the promulgation of it, thro' the long train of patriarchs and prophets, that went before it to uſher it in; it was publiſhed by Chriſt the Son of God himſelf, confirmed by the gifts and miracles of the Holy Ghoſt, and in it is a greater diſplay of the glory of God; it was attended with angels too, and a voice from heaven delightful and not terrible; and there was a glory on Chriſt's countenance, far exceeding that of Moſes's: in the matter of it; which is the love, grace, and mercy of God; the Lord Jeſus Chriſt in all the glories and fulneſs of his perſon and offices; ſalvation by him, ſpiritual bleſſings, exceeding great and precious promiſes; neither of which are to be obſerved in the law: the ordinances of it vaſtly exceed the legal ones; and it has greatly the advantage of it in its effects on the ſouls of men, when accompanied by the Spirit of God.

[e] Comment. in Pſal. cxix. 135.

[f] Raya Mehimna in Zohar in Lev. fol. 33. 4.

Ver. 11. For if that which is done away, &c.] Here another difference is pointed out, which ſubſiſts between the law and the Goſpel, and proves that the one is more excellent and glorious than the other. The law is that which is done away; not merely the ceremonial law, or the judicial law, but the whole miniſtry of Moſes, and particularly the law of the decalogue: for the better underſtanding of this, diſtinguiſh between the matter and miniſtry of it; the miniſtry of it by Moſes is done away, the matter of it ſo far as of a moral nature abides: diſtinguiſh between the law, as in the hands of Moſes and of Chriſt; as in the hands of Moſes it is broken to pieces and aboliſhed, as in the hands of Chriſt, as king in his church, it remains: diſtinguiſh between precepts and precepts; ſome are mixt, being partly moral and partly ceremonial, as the 4th and 5th commands, and others are not; what is ceremonial, or purely related to the Jews whilſt in their civil policy, and in the land of Canaan, is done away; but what is purely moral, is as to the matter of it, ſtill obliging: diſtinguiſh between the law as a covenant of works, and as a rule of walk and converſation; as a covenant of works it is done away, as a rule of walk and converſation it ſtill continues: diſtinguiſh between perſons and perſons; to them that are redeemed from it, it is done away; to them that are under it, it remains; and laſtly, diſtinguiſh between a right and a wrong uſe of it; as to any uſe of it to juſtify us before God, by our obedience to it, it is done away; but as it may be of uſe to convince ſinners of ſin, and to direct ſaints in a courſe of righteouſneſs, ſo it abides. The Goſpel is that which remaineth; which denotes the continued efficacy, the incorruptibleneſs, the inexpugnableneſs, and duration of it; notwithſtanding all the oppoſition of men and devils to it, ſtill its bleſſings, promiſes, doctrines, ordinances, and effects continue; it remains in the ſcriptures, in the church, in the hearts of believers, and in the world too, until all the elect of God are gathered in: now as things that remain are much more glorious than thoſe which are done away, ſo the Goſpel muſt be much more glorious than the law.

Ver. 12. Seeing then that we have ſuch hope, &c.] Having this confidence, and being fully perſuaded that God has made us able and ſufficient miniſters of the Goſpel, has called and qualified us for ſuch ſervice; and ſince we have ſuch a miniſtry committed, which ſo much exceeds in glory the miniſtry of Moſes, a miniſtry not of death and condemnation, but of the Spirit and of righteouſneſs; not which is aboliſhed and done away, but which does and will remain, maugre all the oppoſition of hell and earth: we uſe great plainneſs of ſpeech; plain and intelligible words, not ambiguous ones: or boldneſs; we are not afraid of men nor devils; we are not terrified by menaces, ſtripes, impriſonment, and death itſelf: or freedom of ſpeech; we ſpeak out all our mind, which is the mind of Chriſt; we declare the whole counſel of God, hide and conceal nothing that may be profitable to the churches; we are not to be awed by the terror, or drawn by the flatteries of men to cover the truth; we ſpeak it out plainly, clearly, with all evidence and perſpicuity. The Apoſtle from hence paſſes on to obſerve another difference between the law and the Goſpel, namely the obſcurity of the one, and the clearneſs of the other.

Ver. 13. And not as Moſes, which put a vail over his face, &c.] This he did, becauſe there was ſuch a glory upon his face when he came down from the mount, that the Iſraelites could not bear to look upon him; and alſo to take off that dread of him which was upon them, for they were afraid to come nigh him; and that ſo they might be able to hearken and attend to the words of the law, he delivered to them: the account of Moſes's putting on this vail, is in Exod. xxxiv. 33. where Onkelos renders it by, בית אפי, the houſe of the face, or a maſk; and Jarchi on the place ſays it was a garment, which he put before his face; and both the Targums of Jonathan and Jeruſalem, call it, סודרא, a linnen cloth: now this vail upon his face, had a myſtery in it; it was an emblem of the Goſpel being vailed under the law, and of the darkneſs and obſcurity of the law in the buſineſs of life and ſalvation; and alſo of the future blindneſs of the Jews, when the glory of the Goſpel ſhould break forth in the times of Chriſt and his Apoſtles; and which was ſuch, that the children of Iſrael, the Jews, as in the times of Moſes, ſo in the times of Chriſt and his Apoſtles, could not ſtedfaſtly look to; not upon the face of Moſes, whoſe face was vailed; not that they might not look, but becauſe they could not bear to look upon him; but they could not look to the end of that which is aboliſhed; that is, to Chriſt, who is the end of the law, which is abrogated by him: to him they could not look, nor could they ſee him to be the fulfilling end of the law for righteouſneſs; which being fulfilled, is done away by him; and this becauſe of the blindneſs of their hearts, of which blindneſs the vail on Moſes's face was typical: though the Alexandrian copy, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, to the face of him which is aboliſhed.

Ver. 14. But their minds were blinded, &c.] This confirms the ſenſe given of the foregoing verſe, and ſhews, that not the Iſraelites only in Moſes's time, but the Jews in the times of the Goſpel, had their minds ſo blinded, that they could not behold the glory of the Goſpel, nor Chriſt the end of the law; ſee Rom. xi. 7, 8, 25. For until this day, to this very time, remaineth the ſame vail untaken away; not the ſelf-ſame vail that was on Moſes's face, but the vail of blindneſs, darkneſs, and ignorance, upon the hearts of the Jews: in the reading of the Old Teſtament; the books of the Old Teſtament, which were uſed to be read in their ſynagogues every ſabbath-day; the true ſpiritual meaning of which, as they reſpect Chriſt and the Goſpel diſpenſation they underſtood not; of which darkneſs, the vail on the face of Moſes was a type and emblem: which vail is done away in Chriſt; can only be removed by Chriſt, by his Spirit and grace, and through the light of the Goſpel of Chriſt, ſhining into the heart; and ſo diſpel that blindneſs and ignorance which is in the underſtanding; whereby the books of the Old Teſtament are underſtood, and appear to agree exactly with the Goſpel of Chriſt, in the books of the New Teſtament.

Ver. 15. But even unto this day, when Moſes is read, &c.] Theſe words are an explanation of the former, and ſhew that by the Old Teſtament is deſigned, more eſpecially Moſes, or the writings of Moſes; which were frequently read, and preached upon in the Jewiſh ſynagogues; ſee Acts xiii. 15. and xv. 21. and that by the vail untaken away, is meant, the vail upon their heart; that is, the vail of blindneſs, ignorance of Chriſt, and the Goſpel; of the prophecies of the Old Teſtament, and even of the law itſelf, its nature, uſe, and end; preferring the traditions of their fathers, before the written law of Moſes.

Ver. 16. Nevertheleſs, when it ſhall turn to the Lord, &c.] The heart, upon which the vail now is; or the body of the Jewiſh nation, as in the latter day; when they ſhall turn, or be turned, by the Spirit, power, and grace of God, to the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and look upon him whom they have pierced and mourn, and embrace him as the true Meſſiah and only Saviour: the vail ſhall be taken away; the vail of blindneſs and ignorance, reſpecting themſelves, caſe, ſtate, and condition, and the way of ſalvation by Chriſt; the vail of unbelief, with regard to his perſon, offices, and grace, and of error in points of the greateſt moment and importance; then all the darkneſs and obſcurity that is upon the books of Moſes and the prophets, and which is now upon their hearts in reading them, will be gone. The prophecies of the Old Teſtament will be ſeen in their proper light, and to be evidently fulfilled in Chriſt; the true nature, uſe, and end of the law, will be diſcovered; and both they and that, will be freed from all darkneſs that now attends them. The Jews themſelves acknowledge, that though the law is light, yet there is an obſcurity in it, by reaſon of the ſeveral ways of interpreting it; and therefore "he that ſtudies in it, "has need to remove, מסוה אחר מסוה, vail after "vail, which is upon the face of it, in order to "come at the light of it[g]:" and intimate, that the vail on Moſes's face, was an emblem of this obſcurity, which agrees with what the Apoſtle hints in this context; and alſo own, that there is now upon them a vail of ignorance; and ſay they[h], God has promiſed to remove, מסך הסכלות מעל שכלנו, perhaps it ſhould be, מסוה, the vail of folly off of our underſtanding, referring as is thought, to Iſa. xxv. 7.

Ver. 17. Now the Lord is that Spirit, &c.] The Lord, to whom the heart is turned, when the vail is removed, is Jeſus Chriſt; and he is that Spirit, or the Spirit; he as God, is of a ſpiritual nature and eſſence; he is a ſpirit, as God is ſaid to be, John iv. 24. he is the giver of the Spirit of God, and the very life and ſpirit of the law, without whom as the end of it, 'tis a mere dead letter: or rather as by Moſes in ver. 15. is meant, the law of Moſes, ſo by the Lord here may be meant, the Goſpel of Chriſt; and this is that Spirit, of which the Apoſtles were made miniſters, and is ſaid to give life, ver. 6. And where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty; which may be underſtood of the third perſon in the Godhead; where he is as a Spirit of illumination, there's freedom from former blindneſs and darkneſs; where he is as a Spirit of regeneration and ſanctification, there's freedom from the bondage of ſin, and captivity of ſatan; where he is as a comforter, there's freedom from the fear of hell, wrath, and damnation; where he is as a Spirit of adoption, there's the freedom of children with a Father; where he is as a Spirit of prayer and ſupplication, there's liberty of acceſs to God with boldneſs. Though rather the Goſpel as attended with the Spirit of God, in oppoſition to the law, is here deſigned; and which points out another difference between the law and the Goſpel; where the law is, there is bondage, it genders to it; it has a natural tendency to it: quite contrary is this to what the Jews[i] ſay, who call the law, חירות, liberty; and ſay, "that he that ſtudies in the law, hath, "חירו מכלא, freedom from every thing:" whereas it gives freedom in nothing, but leads into, and brings on perſons a ſpirit of bondage; it exacts rigorous obedience, where there's no ſtrength to perform; it holds men guilty, curſes and condemns for non-obedience; ſo that ſuch as are under it, and of the works of it, are always under a ſpirit of bondage; they obey not from love, but fear, as ſervants or ſlaves for wages, and derive all their peace and comfort from their obedience: but where the Goſpel takes place under the influence of the Spirit of God, there's liberty; not to ſin, which is contrary to the Goſpel, to the Spirit of God in believers, and to the principle of grace wrought in their ſouls; but a liberty from the bondage and ſervitude of it; a liberty from the law's rigorous exaction, curſe, and condemnation, and from the vail of former blindneſs and ignorance.

Ver. 18. But we all with open face, &c.] We are not like Moſes, who had a vail on his face; nor like the Jews, who have one on their hearts: but we all; not miniſters and preachers of the Goſpel only, but all believers, whether Jews or Gentiles, greater or leſſer believers, who are enlightened by the Spirit of God, and are converted to Chriſt: with open face; which may regard the object beheld, the glory of Chriſt unveiled, that has no vail on it, as Moſes had on his face, when he delivered the law; or the perſons beholding, who are rid of Jewiſh darkneſs; the vail of the ceremonial law, and of natural darkneſs and blindneſs of mind; and ſo clearly and fully, comparatively ſpeaking, beholding as in a glaſs; not of the law, but of the Goſpel, and the ordinances of it; not with the eyes of their bodies, but with the eyes of their underſtandings, with the eye of faith; which ſight is ſpiritual, delightful, and very endearing; throws a vail over all other objects, and makes ſouls long to be with Chriſt: the object beheld is, the glory of the Lord; Jeſus Chriſt: not the glory of his human nature, which lies in its union to the Son of God, and in its names which it has by virtue of it; and in its being the curious workmanſhip of the Spirit of God, and ſo is pure and holy, and free from all ſin; and was outwardly beautiful and glorious, and is ſo at the right-hand of God, where we ſee him by faith, crowned with glory and honour; and ſhall behold him with the eyes of our bodies, and which will be faſhioned like to his glorious body; but this ſight and change, are not yet: rather the glory of his divine nature is meant, which is eſſential and underived, the ſame with his Father's; is ineffable, and incomprehenſible; it appears in the perfections he's poſſeſſed of, and in the worſhip given to him; it was manifeſted in the doctrines taught, and in the miracles wrought by him; there were ſome breakings forth of this glory in his ſtate of humiliation, and were beheld by the Apoſtles, and other believers, who ſaw his glory, as the glory of the only begotten of the Father. Though the glory of Chriſt as mediator, being full of grace and truth, ſeems to be chiefly deſigned; this he has from God, and had it from everlaſting; this he gives to his people, and is what makes him ſo glorious, lovely, and deſireable in their eye: and whilſt this delightful object is beheld by them, they are changed into the ſame image; there was a divine image in man, in his firſt creation; this image was defaced by ſin, and a different one took place; now in regeneration another diſtinct from them both is enſtamped, and this is the image of Chriſt; he himſelf is formed in the ſoul, his grace is wrought there; ſo that 'tis no wonder there is a likeneſs between them; which lies in righteouſneſs and holineſs, and ſhews itſelf in acts of grace, and a diſcharge of duty. The gradual motion of the change into this image, is expreſſed by this phraſe, from glory to glory; not from the glory of the law, to the glory of the Goſpel; or from the glory of Moſes, to the glory of Chriſt; rather from the glory that is in Chriſt, to a glory derived in believers from him; or which ſeems moſt agreeable, from one degree of grace to another, grace here being ſignified by glory; or from glory begun here, to glory perfected hereafter; when this image will be compleated, both in ſoul and body; and the ſaints will be as perfectly like to Chriſt, as they are capable of, and ſee him as he is: now the efficient cauſe of all this, is the Spirit of the Lord. 'Tis he that takes off the vail from the heart, that we may with open face unveiled, behold all this glory; it is he that regenerates, enſtamps the image of Chriſt, and conforms the ſoul to his likeneſs; it is he that gradually carries on the work of grace upon the ſoul, increaſes faith, enlarges the views of the glory of Chriſt, and the ſpiritual light, knowledge, and experience of the ſaints, and will perfect all that which concerns them; will quicken their mortal bodies, and make them like to Chriſt; and will for ever reſt as a Spirit of glory on them, both in ſoul and body: ſome read theſe words, by the Lord of the Spirit, and underſtand them of Chriſt; others read them, by the Lord the Spirit, as they very well may be rendered; and ſo are a proof of the true and proper deity of the Holy Spirit, who is the one Jehovah with the Father and the Son. The ancient Jews owned this; “the Spirit of the living God, ſay [k] they, “היינו הבורא, this is the Creator himſelf, from “him all ſpirits are produced; bleſſed be he, and “bleſſed be his name, becauſe his name is he him-“ſelf, for his name is Jehovah.”

CHAP. IV.

IN this chapter, the Apoſtle declares the conſtancy, ſincerity, and integrity of him, and his fellow miniſters, in preaching the Goſpel; aſſerts the clearneſs and perſpicuity of it; removes the charge of pride and arrogance from them; takes notice of the afflictions he and others endured, for the ſake of the Goſpel; what ſupports they had under them, and what comforts they enjoyed: in ver. 1. he obſerves, that ſeeing they were employed in ſuch a miniſtry, as before deſcribed in the preceding chapter, though they met with troubles in it, they did not ſink under them; the reaſon of which were, partly the excellency of the miniſtry, and partly the grace and mercy of God; and they were no leſs ſincere, than they were diligent; and were the reverſe of the falſe teachers, who uſed diſhoneſt methods, craftineſs and deceit; theſe they diſclaimed, and delivered out naked truth, with all ſimplicity and evidence, and as in the ſight of God, in confirmation of which they could appeal to the conſciences of all that heard them, ver. 2. and whereas the Apoſtle had affirmed the plainneſs and clearneſs of the Goſpel miniſtry, both in the preceding chapter, and in the foregoing verſe, he foreſaw that an objection would be raiſed againſt it, which he anticipates, ver. 3, 4. ſhewing, that though the Goſpel was not ſpiritually diſcerned, and ſavingly underſtood by ſome perſons, yet this was not to be charged upon the Goſpel, as if it was attended with darkneſs and obſcurity; but it was owing to the unbelief of men, and the power of ſatan over them, in blinding their minds; otherwiſe the Goſpel in itſelf was light and glorious, in which Chriſt the image of God, in a moſt reſplendent manner appears; and thoſe on whom ſatan thus wrought, were ſuch as did not belong to God's elect, but were of the number of them that periſh: moreover, the integrity of the Apoſtle and other miniſters, appeared in their preaching Chriſt, and not themſelves; and in ſerving the churches in that way, for the ſake of Chriſt; ſo that they were far from being chargeable with pride, vanity, and arrogance, ver. 5. and they readily acknowledged, that all the Goſpel light they had, was from that God, who ſpoke light out of darkneſs in the firſt creation, whereby they were qualified to communicate light to others, in the name of Chriſt, ver. 6. and though they had a treaſure committed to their truſt, and which they had within them, yet they freely owned they were but earthen veſſels; and the reaſon why ſuch treaſure was put there was, that the power ſeen in the converſion of ſinners by their miniſtry, might appear to be not of themſelves, but of the Lord, ver. 7. and then the Apoſtle proceeds to give an account of the afflictions endured by them, and of the divine ſupports they had, by which they were preſerved from being overwhelmed with them, ver. 8, 9. one end of which afflictions, and which are ſignified by bearing the dying of Jeſus in their bodies, and by being expoſed to death for his ſake, was, that his life might be manifeſt in them, or his power in the upholding of them, ver. 10, 11. and herein lay the difference between them and the Corinthians; the one were in deaths oft, and in very great diſtreſſes, and the other in proſperous circumſtances, ver. 12. but however, they had much conſolation amidſt their ſorrows and troubles, and which they had partly thro' the ſpirit of faith, and in a way of believing; and who after the example of David, and having the ſame ſpirit as he had, believed and ſpake, ver. 13. and partly through the hope of the reſurrection of the dead, to which they were encouraged by the reſurrection of Chriſt, ver. 14. as alſo by conſidering what valuable ends were anſwered by their bearing afflictions for the ſake of Chriſt, and preaching the Goſpel, namely the good of the churches of Chriſt, and the glory of God, ver. 15. and beſides, they had an experience of the daily renovation of the inward man, or of the carrying on of the work of grace upon their ſouls; and of an increaſe of grace, light, and joy in them; and this kept them from fainting, though their outward circumſtances and outward man were but in a poor condition, ver. 16. but more eſpecially what raiſed their ſpirits, and kept them from ſinking under their afflictions, was the view they had of eternal glory and happineſs, to which they had reſpect; and the compariſon they were led to make between their preſent afflictions, and future glory, which their afflictions were working for them; as, that their afflictions were light, glory heavy; their afflictions were but for a moment, their weight of glory was for ever; their afflictions were ſeen and temporal, their glory unſeen and eternal; or the things of this world, which they often needed, and yet did not regard, were viſible and temporary things; but the things of another world they had their eye upon were inviſible, only viſible to faith, and would endure for ever.

Ver. 1. Therefore ſeeing we have this miniſtry, &c.] The Apoſtle having largely inſiſted on the difference between the law and the Goſpel, the miniſtration of the one, and of the other, proceeds to give an account of his own conduct, and that of his fellow Apoſtles and miniſters: we, ſays he, faint not; under all the reproaches caſt upon us, perſecutions raiſed againſt us, and tribulations that attend us; we don't ſink in our ſpirits, or give out from the miniſtry; we go on chearfully in our work, in the face of all oppoſition, encouraged by the conſideration of the excellency of the miniſtry, which they had from the Lord, were put into, and continued in; which was ſo valuable in itſelf, and ſo uſeful in its effects; being the miniſtration of the Spirit and of righteouſneſs, having in it ſuch an excelling glory to the law, and attended with ſo much light and liberty: to which he adds the conſideration of the mercy of God they were partakers of, as we have received mercy; which may refer either to the grace and mercy of God, which they had received in converſion; a ſenſe of which abiding upon them, ſo influenced their minds, to hold forth the riches of abounding grace and mercy to poor ſinners in the Goſpel, that nothing could deter them from it; or to the grace, favour, and good-will of God, in making, ſupporting, and continuing them as miniſters of the word; all which they were ſenſible, was owing not to men, but God; not to their merit, but to his mercy; not to their worthineſs, parts, learning, &c. but to his free gift, favour, and grace, by which only they were what they were, as preachers of the Goſpel.

Ver. 2. But have renounced the hidden things of diſhoneſty, &c.] Or ſhame; this is a further account of the conduct of the firſt miniſters of the Goſpel, and very worthy of our imitation, and in which the Apoſtle ſtrikes at the different manner of behaviour in the falſe Apoſtles: this may reſpect both doctrine and practice; they abhorred and rejected every thing that was ſcandalous and reproachful to the Goſpel of Chriſt; in ſimplicity and godly ſincerity, not with fleſhly wiſdom, but by the grace of God, they had their converſation in the world; they were open and above board, both in principle and practice; the ſame men in publick, as in private; they uſed no art to cover their doctrines, or hide their converſations; every thing of this kind was deteſtable to them; whereas the falſe teachers took a great deal of pains, to colour over both their ſentiments and their lives; and a ſhame it was to ſpeak of the things that were done of them in ſecret, Eph. v. 12. Moreover, they were not walking in craftineſs; they uſed no ſly and artful methods to pleaſe men, to gain applauſe from them, or make merchandize of them; they did not lie in wait to deceive, watching an opportunity to work upon credulous and incautious minds; they did not by good words and fair ſpeeches, deceive the hearts of the ſimple; nor put on different forms, or make different appearances, in order to ſuit themſelves to the different tempers and taſtes of men, as did the falſe Apoſtles: not handling the word of God deceitfully. They did not corrupt it with human doctrines, or mix and blend it with philoſophy, and vain deceit; they did not wreſt the ſcriptures to ſerve any carnal, or worldly purpoſe; nor did they accommodate them to the luſts and paſſions of men; or conceal any part of truth, or keep back any thing which might be profitable to the churches: but by the manifeſtation of the truth, commending themſelves to every man's conſcience in the ſight of God; that is, they with all plainneſs and evidence, clearly preached the truth as it is in Jeſus, preſenting it to, and preſſing it upon the conſciences of men; where they left it, and to which they could appeal; and all this they did, in the ſight and preſence of the omniſcient God, to whom they knew they muſt give an account of themſelves and their miniſtry.

Ver. 3. But if our Goſpel be hid, &c.] When the Goſpel is called ours, the meaning is, not that miniſters are the authors or ſubject of it; but it is ſo ſtiled, becauſe they are entruſted with it; it is preached by them; and is in oppoſition to another Goſpel, the Goſpel of the falſe Apoſtles. Here an objection is obviated, which the Apoſtle ſaw would be made againſt the clearneſs and perſpicuity of the Goſpel, aſſerted by him in the foregoing chapter; taken from ſome perſons, who though they ſat under the miniſtry of the word, were not enlightened by it, ſaw no glory nor excellency in it, nor were their minds in the leaſt affected with it: to which he replies ſaying, if our Goſpel be hid, it is hid to them that are loſt. But why ſhould the Apoſtle put an if upon its being hid? is it not hid? is it not the wiſdom of God in a myſtery, even the hidden wiſdom? To which may be anſwered, that it was hid in God from the beginning of the world; and in Chriſt, in whom are hid all the treaſures of wiſdom and knowledge; and in the ceremonial law, which contained types and ſhadows of many things in it; and was hid from whole nations, and for whole ages formerly: but now God has made known the myſtery of his will; Chriſt is manifeſt in the fleſh; the ceremonial law is done away, and the Goſpel is preached to Jews and Gentiles; ſo that it is hid to none, as to the outward miniſtration of it; and if the internal, ſpiritual, and ſaving knowledge and experience of it is hid from any, eventually and finally, it is to them that are loſt: all mankind are in a loſt and periſhing condition through ſin; tho' ſome will not be loſt eternally, whom God has choſen, Chriſt has redeemed, and who by the Spirit are brought ſavingly to believe in Chriſt; but there are others, that will be loſt for ever; and to theſe the Goſpel is hid; and they are ſuch, who are left to the native blindneſs of their minds, and are given up to a reprobate mind, to judicial darkneſs, and are ſuffered to be under the influence of the prince of darkneſs, as in the following verſe; now ſuch inſtances are no more an objection to the clearneſs and perſpicuity of the Goſpel, and the miniſtration of it, than men born blind, who never could, nor never will ſee light, are to the bright and clear ſhining of the ſun at noon-day.

Ver. 4. In whom the God of this world hath blinded, &c.] The deſcription of the perſons to whom the Goſpel is hid, is here further carried on; in which the character of ſatan is given, who is here ſtiled the God of this world; juſt as he is by Chriſt, the prince of this world, John xii. 31. and xiv. 30. not becauſe he had any hand in the making of it, or has any concern in the government of it, or in the diſpoſal of men or things in it; but becauſe of his influence over the worſt, and greateſt part of the world; which lies in wickedneſs, under the power of this wicked one, being led captive by him at his will; who have voluntarily given themſelves up to him, and whoſe luſts they will do; and ſo declare themſelves to be his children, and him their father, yea, their God: the influence he has over them is, he hath blinded the minds of them that believe not. The Apoſtle here ſeems to refer to one of the devils, which the Jews [l] frequently ſpeak of, סמאל, Samael; who they ſay is the head of all the devils; a very malignant ſpirit, and who deceived our firſt parents; the word is compounded of אל, God, and סמא, to blind; him they call the angel of death, and ſay [m], that he hath, אחשיך פני עלמא, brought darkneſs upon the face of the world, or the creatures, the Gentiles: agreeable to which the Apoſtle calls the devil, the God that hath blinded: what he blinds in men, is their mind; the more excellent and knowing part of man; not the eyes of their bodies, but of their underſtandings; which ſhews the near acceſs ſatan has to the ſouls of men; he penetrates into their very hearts and minds, and has an influence there: the perſons whoſe minds he blinds, are thoſe who believe not; which diſtinguiſhes them from others that periſh, who never enjoyed the Goſpel, and therefore he ſays, in, or among whom; and from true believers, on whom ſatan can have no ſuch influence; and is a reaſon of theſe mens periſhing, and of ſatan's influence over them; and muſt be underſtood of reprobates, and final unbelievers: the influence he has over them, is expreſſed by blinding them; which he does, by diverting them from hearing the Goſpel, and by ſtirring up the enmity of their minds againſt it, and by increaſing their natural darkneſs and blindneſs with reſpect to it. The end which ſatan has in doing this is, leſt the light of the glorious Goſpel of Chriſt, who is the image of God, ſhould ſhine unto them; here many things are hinted, in commendation of the Goſpel, as that it is the Goſpel of Chriſt; becauſe he was not only the greateſt and beſt preacher of it that ever was, but alſo is the author and ſubject of it; Chriſt is the ſum and ſubſtance of the Goſpel, the principal thing in it, or perſon that is ſpoken of therein; and then Chriſt who is the grand ſubject of the Goſpel is deſcribed, in order to recommend it the more, as the image of God. The Jews [n] call the Meſſiah, צלם אל, the image of God; ſome copies, and the Complutenſian edition, and the Arabic verſion read, the image of the inviſible God, as in Cal. i. 15. So Chriſt is as the Son of God, being the natural, ſubſtantial, eſſential, eternal, increated, and perfect image of his Father; and ſo he is as man and mediator: further, the Goſpel is ſaid to be the glorious Goſpel of Chriſt, as it muſt needs be, ſince it ſo clearly and illuſtriouſly ſets forth the glory of Chriſt; contains ſuch glorious doctrines and promiſes in it, and is attended with ſuch glorious effects, where it comes with power: add to all this, that light is attributed to it; the Jews [o] ſpeak of the light of the law, and the law is called light; and ſay, that, אין אור אלא תורה, there is no light but the law; but this may be more truly ſaid of the Goſpel, by which not only perſons may be notionally enlightened, who never were made really partakers of the grace of God, but is the means of ſpiritual and ſaving illumination to thouſands, when it is attended with the demonſtration of the Spirit: now all theſe excellent characters of the Goſpel, ſerve to enhance the ſpite and malice of ſatan, in endeavouring all he can, to hinder the bright ſhining of this glorious Goſpel, to and upon any of the ſons of men; and his reaſon for ſo doing is, becauſe he knows, that ſhould the Goſpel ſhine unto them, the intereſt and glory of Chriſt would be advanced, and his own would decline.

Ver. 5. For we preach not ourſelves, &c.] Theſe words contain a reaſon, why the Apoſtles behaved themſelves in the manner deſcribed, ver. 2. and ſerve to explain in what ſenſe this inſpired writer is to be underſtood, when he calls the Goſpel our Goſpel, ver. 3. and moſt clearly proves the Goſpel to be a glorious one, which he had aſſerted, ver. 4. ſince Chriſt, and not themſelves, is the ſubject of it, for we preach not ourſelves. They did not preach any doctrine of their own deviſing; they did not ſet up themſelves as lords over the faith and conſciences of men; nor was their view in preaching, to ſet forth their learning, parts, and eloquence, or to amaſs wealth and riches to themſelves; nor did they aſſert the purity of human nature, or the power of man to do any thing of himſelf that is ſpiritually good; or that juſtification and ſalvation, are by works of righteouſneſs done by men. To do any, or each, or all of theſe, as did the falſe Apoſtles, is to preach a man's ſelf: but ſo did not theſe faithful diſpenſers of the word, but they preached Chriſt Jeſus the Lord; that is, the doctrines reſpecting the perſon, office, and grace of Chriſt; as that he is truly and properly God, the eternal and only begotten Son of God, God and man in one perſon, the only mediator between God and man, and the ſaviour and redeemer of loſt ſinners; that Jeſus of Nazareth is the Chriſt, the true Meſſiah; and that this Chriſt is Jeſus, a Saviour, the only able, and willing one; and that this Jeſus Chriſt, is Lord of all, eſpecially of the ſaints; not only as creator, but as their head, huſband, and redeemer; that peace and reconciliation, pardon and righteouſneſs, life and ſalvation, are only by him: and they alſo declared themſelves the ſervants of the churches, and ourſelves your ſervants. The Apoſtle does not ſay they were the ſervants of Chriſt, tho' they were, and eſteemed it their greateſt honour to be ſo; for he had no need to obſerve this, ſince this is included in their preaching him as Lord; nor does he ſay they were the ſervants of men, or men pleaſers, for then they would not be the ſervants of Chriſt; but he aſſerts them to be the ſervants of the churches: and which muſt be underſtood, not with reſpect to things temporal, with which they had no concern; but with regard to things ſpiritual, particularly to the miniſtration of the word, and adminiſtration of ordinances: and this they profeſſed to be, for Jeſus ſake; either for the ſake of preaching Chriſt unto them; or becauſe they were choſen and called by him to this ſervice, and in which they were willing to continue, for the ſake of his honour and intereſt.

Ver. 6. For God who commanded the light to ſhine out of darkneſs, &c.] The cauſal particle for, ſhews theſe words to be alſo a reaſon of the foregoing; either why they ſo clearly beheld the glory of the Lord, ch. iii. 18. or why they renounced the hidden things of diſhoneſty, ch. iv. 2. or why their Goſpel could not be hid, ver. 3. or why they did not preach themſelves, but Chriſt, ver. 5. becauſe God had ſhined in their hearts; and in this light, they ſaw the glory of Chriſt; could not bear any ſecret, hidden, ſcandalous practices; and held forth the word of light and life to others; and ſeeing ſo much of their own weakneſs, ſinfulneſs, and unworthineſs, dared not to preach themſelves, but Chriſt Jeſus the Lord; in which may be obſerved the character of the true God, as oppoſed to ſatan, the God of this world, who is ſaid to blind the minds of men, ver. 4. whereas the true God is repreſented as the author of light, and as producing it by a word of command, and that out of mere darkneſs: reſpect is here had to the creation of all things at the beginning, when darkneſs was upon the face of the deep—and God ſaid, let there be light and there was light, Gen. i. 2, 3. Now this character of God, as creating light in this wonderful manner, is prefaced to his giving ſpiritual light unto his people; becauſe of the agreement there is between light corporal and ſpiritual, in their nature and production; for as there was darkneſs upon the earth before there was light, ſo there is a natural darkneſs in the minds of men, before any ſpiritual light is infuſed into them; and as light was the firſt production out of the dark and unformed chaos, ſo light is the firſt thing that is ſtruck into the ſoul in converſion; moreover, as light was the effect of almighty power, ſo is the ſpiritual illumination, or the opening of the eyes of the underſtandings of men, who are naturally born blind; and as light was a creation of that which was not before, ſo the work of grace on the ſoul, is not an increaſe of, or an addition to, or an improvement of the light of nature, but it is a new light, created in the underſtanding; add to all this, that both corporal and ſpiritual light are good, and both called day; the influence that God has over the hearts of men, and the effect he produces there are, he hath ſhined in our hearts. The hearts of men are like this dark terraqueous globe, having no light in them; God is as the ſun the fountain of light, which ſhines upon them and in them; ſo as to give them a true ſight and ſenſe of ſin, and of their loſt ſtate and condition; ſo as to cauſe them to ſee the fulneſs and ſuitableneſs of Chriſt as a Saviour; ſo as to warm their affections, and draw out their deſires after Chriſt, his ways, truths, ordinances, and people; and ſo as to give them light into the myſteries of the Goſpel; particularly he ſo ſhines into the hearts of ſome, whom he makes miniſters of the Goſpel, as to give more light and knowledge into Goſpel truths, than he does to others: and his end in doing this, is to give; that is, that his miniſtring ſervants may give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God, in the face of Jeſus Chriſt; men muſt be firſt made light in, and by the Lord, or they'll never be fit and proper perſons to hold forth the word of light, or to communicate light to others; God firſt ſhines into their hearts, and then they give light to others: by the glory of God is not meant, the eſſential glory of God, or the perfections of his nature, though theſe are to be ſeen in the face, or perſon of Chriſt; but rather the glorious counſels of God, and ſcheme of ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt; or in other words, the glorious Goſpel of God: and by the knowledge of it is deſigned, not a mere notional ſpeculative knowledge of the Goſpel, but an experimental one; a ſpiritual knowledge of the Goſpel, of Chriſt in it, of God in Chriſt, and of an intereſt in God's ſalvation by Chriſt: now when the miniſters of the word are ſaid to give the light of this to men, or to enlighten them with this knowledge, it can't be thought that they are the efficient cauſes, for ſuch are only Jehovah Father, Son, and Spirit; but only that they are inſtrumental, and are means in the hands of God, of bringing perſons to ſee the fellowſhip of this myſtery: all which is done, in the face of Jeſus Chriſt; this denotes the clearneſs and perſpicuity of their miniſtry, and of that knowledge which is communicated by it; ſee ch. iii. 12. and alſo the authority by which they act; 'tis in the name and perſon of Chriſt, in which ſenſe the phraſe is uſed, ch. ii. 10.

Ver. 7. But we have this treaſure in earthen veſſels, &c.] This is a further commendation of the Goſpel; and by which the Apoſtle removes an objection againſt it, taken from the croſs and perſecutions that attend it, and the outward meanneſs of the miniſters of it. The Goſpel is called a treaſure, for not grace, nor Chriſt, but the Goſpel is here meant; which is ſo ſtiled, becauſe it contains rich truths, and an abundance of them; comparable to gold, ſilver, and precious ſtones, for the price of them, their antiquity, diſtance of place from whence they come, and their duration; becauſe it has in it rich bleſſings, ſpiritual ones, the bleſſings of the new covenant, ſolid, ſubſtantial, and irreverſible ones, and a fulneſs of them; and becauſe it conſiſts of exceeding great and precious promiſes, of more worth than thouſands of gold and ſilver; free, abſolute, and unconditional ones, which are yea, and amen in Chriſt, and relate both to this, and the other world; and alſo becauſe it exhibits and ſhews forth to us, the riches of God and of Chriſt, of grace and of glory; which are unſearchable, ſubſtantial, ſatisfying, and durable: the repoſitory, or cabinet, in which this treaſure is, are earthen veſſels; by which are meant, miniſters of the word, who are ſo in themſelves, in their own eſteem, and in the eſteem of others; probably the Apoſtle might have in view, Lam. iv. 2. The doctors and ſcholars among the Jews, are compared hereunto; "ſays R. Eleazar [p], to what is a diſciple of a wiſe "man like, in the eſteem of a man of the world? "at firſt he is like to a golden cup; when he has "converſed with him, he is like to a ſilver cup; "and when he has received any profit by him, he "is like, לקיתון של חרש, to an earthen cup, "which when broken, can't be repaired again:" "the law, ſay they, is not confirmed but by him, "who makes himſelf, ככלי חרס, as an earthen "veſſel [q]:" "R. Joſhua [r] was a great man in the "king's palace, and he was deformed; wherefore "Cæſar's daughter ſaid, wiſdom is beautiful, "בכלי מכוער, in an ugly veſſel; and he brought "her a ſimile in proof of it from wine, which is "not kept in a ſilver veſſel." The alluſion is either to the earth itſelf, in which treaſure lies, or is hid, and out of which it is dug; or to pots and veſſels made of earth, into which treaſure has been uſed to be put; or to earthen pitchers, in which lights, or lamps were formerly carried; ſee Judg. vii. 16. where Gideon's three hundred men, are ſaid to have empty pitchers, and lamps within the pitchers; they carried lamps with them to give them light, it being night when they went into the camp of Midian; and thoſe they put into pitchers, that the Midianites might not perceive them afar off, as a Jewiſh commentator well obſerves [s]; in like manner the Goſpel put into earthen veſſels, is a glorious light to ſome, whilſt it is hidden to others: yea, even lamps themſelves were no other than earthen veſſels, in which light was put; for ſo ſays Maimonides [t], a lamp, a burning light, is, כלי מחרש, an earthen veſſel, like a reed; and on the top of it is a little ear, which joins to it; and when it is made, a piece of old cloth is put upon the burning oil, and it continues in it; alſo an earthen veſſel is made, in which there is a hollow place for to ſet the light in, and in it is gathered, all that flows from the oil out of the light; and it is ſtrengthened about the head of the candleſtick, that the braſs might not be hurt by the oil; and this veſſel is called, the houſe in which the light ſubſides, or the receptacle of the light; and which receptacle, another of the Miſnic commentators ſays [u], is an earthen veſſel, made to put the light in; and the lamp, he alſo ſays, is like an earthen platter, ſharp pointed below, &c. and this alluſion well agrees with the context, in which the Goſpel is repreſented as a glorious light, ſhining in darkneſs, ver. 4, 6. The Greek word οστρακινοις the Apoſtles uſes, ſignifies alſo ſhells of fiſhes; and in like manner does Philo the Jew [w] compare the human body; "I am, ſays he, "very little concerned for this mortal body which "is about me, and cleaves to me οστρεου δικην, like "the ſhell of a fiſh, though it is hurt by every one." And the reference may be to pearls, which are ſaid to have been found in ſuch ſhells, particularly in oiſters; and is deſigned to expreſs, either the frail mortal bodies of the miniſters of the Goſpel, comparable to brittle ſhells, or baked earth; or rather the outward mean deſpicable condition of the Apoſtles, and preachers of the word; being men of no figure in the world, for birth, learning, or outward grandeur; and being attended with ſinful infirmities alſo, as other men; and more eſpecially as they were labouring under reproaches, afflictions, and perſecutions, for the ſake of the Goſpel; ſee Jer. xxxii. 14. The reaſon why it pleaſed God to put ſuch a rich and valuable treaſure, into the hands of perſons ſo mean and contemptible was, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us; that is, that it might appear that the making of ſuch perſons miniſters of the word, was not of themſelves, was not owing to their natural abilities, or to any diligence and induſtry, and acquirements of their own, or to any inſtructions they had received from others, but to the grace of God, and the effectual working of his power; and that the ſucceſs which attended their miniſtrations in the converſion of ſinners, and building up of ſaints, could only be aſcribed to the exceeding greatneſs of divine power; and that the ſupporting of them in their work, under all the perſecutions raiſed againſt them, and oppoſition made unto them, could be attributed to nothing elſe; of which power, inſtances are given in the following verſes.

[s] Laniado in Judg. vii. 16.

[t] In Miſn. Celim, c. 2. §. 8.

Ver. 8. We are troubled on every ſide, &c.] Or afflicted; εν παντι, either in every place, wherever we are, into whatſoever country, city, or town we enter, we are ſure to meet with trouble, of one ſort or another; for wherever we be, we are in the world, in which we muſt expect tribulation: or always, every day and hour we live, as in ver. 10, 11. we are never free from one trial or another: or by every one; by all ſorts of perſons, good and bad, profeſſors and profane, open perſecutors and falſe brethren; yea, ſome of the dear children of God, weak believers, give us trouble: or with every ſort of trouble, inward and outward; trouble from the world, the fleſh, and the devil: yet not diſtreſſed; ſo as to have no hope, or ſee no way of eſcape; ſo as to have no manner of comfort, or manifeſtations of the love of God; or ſo as to be ſtraitned in our own ſouls; for notwithſtanding all our troubles, we have freedom at the throne of grace, and in our miniſtry; we can go with liberty to God, and preach the Goſpel boldly to you: we are perplexed; and ſometimes know not what to do, which way to take, what courſe to ſteer, or how we ſhall be relieved and ſupplied; we are ſometimes at the utmoſt loſs about things temporal, how we ſhall be provided for with food and raiment; nor are we without our perplexing thoughts, doubts, and fears, about ſpiritual affairs: but not in deſpair; of the Lord's appearing and working ſalvation, both in a temporal and ſpiritual ſenſe.

Ver. 9. Perſecuted, but not forſaken, &c.] Purſued from place to place, and followed with menaces, curſes, and reproaches; laid hold on, proſcribed, impriſoned, and threatened with the ſevereſt tortures, and death itſelf; but our God never leaves us nor forſakes us; though we are followed cloſe by evil men, and left by our friends, we are not forſaken of God: caſt down we ſometimes are, as an earthen veſſel, ver. 7. which may be caſt out of a man's hands, in order to be daſhed to pieces; or as a man in wreſtling, ſee Eph. vi. 12. may be thrown to the ground by his antagoniſt, ſo we are ſometimes foiled by ſin, ſatan, and the world: but not deſtroyed; we are ſtill ſafe in the hands of Chriſt, and are kept by the power of God; and indeed, to what elſe can all this be aſcribed? 'tis ſurprizing that earthen veſſels ſhould bear and ſuffer ſo much, and not fall, or be daſhed to pieces.

Ver. 10, 11. Always bearing about in the body, &c.] The Vulgate Latin, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions, read, in our body; and the Syriac verſion in this, and the next clauſe reads, in our bodies, and ſome copies in this read, bodies; continually carrying about with us, in theſe mortal bodies of ours, wherever we go, the dying of the Lord Jeſus: by which is meant, not the doctrine of the ſufferings and death of Chriſt, and of ſalvation by a crucified Saviour, which they bore and carried about with them in a miniſterial way, wherever they came and preached, but the ſufferings they themſelves underwent; ſo called, becauſe of the likeneſs there is between the ſufferings of Chriſt, and theirs; as he was traduced as a wicked man, a deceiver, and a ſtirrer up of ſedition, ſo were they; as he was perſecuted, ſo were they; as he was liable to death, and at laſt was delivered up to it, ſo were they: and alſo becauſe of the union and ſympathy which were between them; Chriſt and they were one body and one ſpirit; ſo that what was endured by the members, the head had a fellow-feeling of, and ſympathy with; and reckoned what was done to them, as done to himſelf: and beſides, the ſufferings they underwent, and death they were expoſed unto, were for his ſake, as it is explained in the next verſe: for we which live; who are ſtill in the land of the living, though it is almoſt a miracle we are, conſidering the circumſtances we are in: are always delivered; that is, continually expoſed to death for Jeſus' ſake: and the end of all theſe ſufferings, which is expreſſed alike in both verſes is, that the life alſo of Jeſus, might be made manifeſt in our body, or mortal fleſh; the meaning of which is, that it might appear that Jeſus, though he died, is riſen again from the dead, and lives at the Father's right-hand, and ever lives to make interceſſion for us; of which there is a full proof, inaſmuch as we are ſupported by him under all the trials and ſufferings we endure for his ſake; for becauſe he lives, we live alſo, amidſt ſo many dangers and deaths, which attend us.

Ver. 12. So then death worketh in us, &c.] This is the concluſion of the foregoing account, or the inference deduced from it; either the death, or dying of Chriſt, that is, the ſufferings of his body, the church, for his ſake, ενεργειται, is wrought in us; fulfilled and perfected in us; ſee Col. i. 24. or rather a corporal death has ſeized upon us; the ſeeds of death are in us; our fleſh, our bodies are mortal, dying off apace; death has already attacked us, is working on our conſtitutions gradually, and unpinning our tabernacles, which in a ſhort time will be wholly took down and laid in the duſt: but life in you. Some underſtand theſe words as ſpoken ironically, like thoſe in 1 Cor. iv. 8, 9. but the Apoſtle ſeems not to be ſpeaking in ſuch a ſtrain, but in the moſt ſerious manner, and about things ſolemn and awful; and his meaning is, ours is the ſorrow, the trouble, the affliction, and death itſelf, yours is the gain, the joy, the pleaſure, and life; what we get by preaching the Goſpel are reproach, perſecution, and death; but this Goſpel we preach at ſuch expence is the ſavour of life unto life to you, and is the means of maintaining ſpiritual life in your ſouls, and of nouriſhing you up unto eternal life; and which is no ſmall encouragement to us to go on in our work with boldneſs and chearfulneſs: or theſe words regard the different ſtate and condition of the Apoſtle, and other miniſters, and of the Corinthians; the one were in adverſity, and the other in proſperity.

[w] De Joſeph. p. 536.

Ver. 13. We having the ſame ſpirit of faith, &c.] By faith here is meant, not the doctrine, but the grace of faith; a believing in the doctrines of the Goſpel, and in the perſon of Chriſt; an exerciſe of that grace upon the death and reſurrection of Chriſt; and particularly a looking by faith in full expectation of the ſaints reſurrection from the dead, and eternal glory, together with a reliance on the power, faithfulneſs, and promiſes of God to ſupport under the afflictions of this life. Now of this faith the Spirit of God is the author; this is not of ourſelves, of our own power, 'tis the free gift of God, and a valuable gift it is; it is of the operation of God, and the produce of his almighty power; and of this the Spirit of God, in converſion, is the powerful operator: hence he is here called the Spirit of faith. So the third number in the Cabaliſtic tree of the Jews, the intelligence ſanctifying, which anſwers to the third perſon in our doctrine of the Trinity, is called [x], "אמונה אומן, and אב האמונה, "the artificer of faith, and the author or parent of "faith, becauſe from its power faith flows." Which is the ſame in all ſaints; the Spirit is the ſame in one as in another, and ſo is the faith which he is the author of; ſee 2 Pet. i. 1. Faith is the ſame in all the ſaints that have been from the beginning of the world, under the Old and New Teſtament diſpenſations; it was the ſame in all the churches in the Apoſtle's time, in Rome as at Epheſus, in Epheſus as at Rome, and in Theſſalonica as at Rome and Epheſus, and ſo in all the other churches; tho' it may be, the Apoſtle may chiefly deſign the ſameneſs of faith, and of the Spirit, in him and his fellow-miniſters, and in theſe Corinthians, tho' death was working in the one, and life in the other; which appeared in their free and bold miniſtration of the word, notwithſtanding all they met with on account of it, in imitation and encouraged by the example of David, according as it is written, Pſ. cxvi. 10. I believed and therefore have I ſpoken; we alſo believe, and therefore ſpeak: where there is true faith, and the true Spirit of faith, there will be a ſpeaking of, for, and in the name of Chriſt, as there ought to be: for as with the heart man believeth unto righteouſneſs, ſo with the mouth confeſſion is made unto ſalvation. This is true of believers in common, ſooner or later, at one time or another; but more eſpecially of the miniſters of the word, who have a firm and well-grounded belief in the doctrines of the Goſpel, and perſon of Chriſt; and therefore ſpeak freely, and without any doubt and heſitation about theſe things, boldly, and without the fear of men, and ſincerely and faithfully, as in the ſight of God: hence they make Chriſt the main ſubject of their miniſtry, becauſe they believe in him, and nothing can ſtop their mouths from ſpeaking of him; faith, and a Spirit of faith, fit for publick work and ſervice, and give freedom and boldneſs in the miniſtration of the Goſpel, and are a great ſupport under perſecution for the ſake of it.

Ver. 14. Knowing that he which raiſed up the Lord Jeſus, &c.] Beſides having the ſame Spirit of faith, mentioned in the preceding verſe as a ſupport under tribulation, the Apoſtle proceeds in this, and ſome following verſes, to take notice of other things which gave them relief under their preſſures; ſuch as the reſurrection from the dead, all their afflictions being for the good of the churches and glory of God, the inward and comfortable experiences of the love and grace of God in the midſt of them, and the end and iſſue of them, eternal glory. The former of theſe is obſerved here; knowing, being firmly perſuaded, and fully aſſured, that he which raiſed up the Lord Jeſus; by whom God the Father is more eſpecially deſigned, tho' not to the excluſion of the Son and Spirit, who were jointly concerned in raiſing the dead body of our Lord: ſhall raiſe us up alſo by Jeſus; which may regard the reſurrection of all the ſaints by Chriſt, not as a mere inſtrument, but as a coefficient cauſe with the Father and Spirit: this the Apoſtle concludes from the power of God in raiſing up Chriſt from the dead; he that is able to do the one, is certainly of power to effect the other; and alſo from that union there is between Chriſt and his people; he is the head, they are his members; and becauſe the head is raiſed, the members ſhall be likewiſe. Chriſt's reſurrection is not only the pattern, but the pledge of the reſurrection of the ſaints. Now this doctrine, as it was fully known, and firmly believed by the Apoſtles, was of great uſe to bear them up under their outward troubles; for though they were ſo afflicted and perſecuted, death was viſibly working in them, and they might expect in a ſhort time to be laid in the grave; yet this was their conſolation, that they ſhould be raiſed again immortal and glorious by Chriſt; ſome copies read, with Jeſus, and ſo the Vulgate Latin verſion: he ſhall preſent us with you; that is, he will preſent us miniſters, together with you the ſaints, and the reſt of the elect of God; firſt, לותה, to himſelf, as the Syriac verſion adds, and then to his Father, in their full number, compleatly righteous and holy. Theſe words indeed may be underſtood of a deliverance from temporal affliction, from that death they were labouring under, and expoſed unto, and the ſenſe be this; we firmly believe that he that raiſed up Chriſt from the dead, will deliver us from the preſent death of affliction, which will be a ſort of reſurrection from the dead, and will make us to ſtand by you, or in your preſence; or, in other words, being thus delivered, we ſhall have an opportunity of viſiting you, we have ſo long deſired, and you have expected, which will be to your edification and comfort.

Ver. 15. For all things are for your ſakes, &c.] This is a very large and comprehenſive expreſſion, and reaches to all the things of Chriſt, as well as of his miniſters. The incarnation, obedience, death, and reſurrection of Chriſt, are all for the ſake of God's elect; and ſo the miniſtry of his Apoſtles and ſervants, their gifts, graces, comforts, and experiences; and ſo likewiſe all their reproaches, afflictions, and perſecutions; ſee ch. i. 6. Theſe were endured for their ſakes, and tended to their eſtabliſhment in the faith; were for the furtherance of the Goſpel, and of the faith and joy of ſaints; and this gave no ſmall pleaſure and relief to them under their ſufferings, that they were of ſuch uſe to others. Moreover, all their deliverances, when in any imminent danger, were for the ſake of the churches: that the abundant grace; held forth in their miniſtrations, manifeſtly to be ſeen in ſupporting them under their troubles, and delivering them out of them: might through the thankſgiving of many; for ſuch appearances of divine goodneſs, ſee chap. i. 11. redound to the glory of God; which is another thing that yielded them a pleaſing ſatisfaction, in all their diſtreſſes for the ſake of Chriſt, and his Goſpel.

[x] Sepher Jetzirah, Semit. 3. p. 6.

Ver. 16. For which cauſe we faint not, &c.] Since our afflictions are over-ruled for the good of others, and the glory of God, we are not diſcouraged by them; our ſpirits don't ſink under the weight of them; we don't give out from the work of the miniſtry becauſe of them, but go on chearfully therein: and the more ſo, ſince tho' our outward man periſh; our outward circumſtances of life are very mean and deſpicable; we are oftentimes in a very diſtreſſed condition thro' hunger, thirſt, nakedneſs, and want of the common neceſſaries of life; our bodies are almoſt worn out with fatigue, labour, and ſorrow; our earthly tabernacles are tottering, and juſt ready to fall in pieces; yet the inward man is renewed day by day; that is, continually; it anſwers to ויום יום, an Hebraiſm; ſee Eſth. ii. 11. and iii. 4. the internal hidden man of the heart, the new man is in a proſperous condition; our ſouls are in good health; the work of God is comfortably carried on in us; we have ſweet and repeated experiences of the love of God; we are growing in grace, and in the knowledge of Chriſt; and like the palm-tree, the more weight is hung upon it, the more it thrives; and like the children of Iſrael in Egypt, the more they were afflicted the more they grew.

Ver. 17. For our light affliction, &c.] The difference between the preſent and future ſtate of the ſaints is here expreſſed, the diſparity between them ſhewn, and the influence the one has upon the other. The preſent ſtate is a ſtate of affliction. Affliction is the common lot of the children of men, but more eſpecially of the children of God, and is here deſigned by our affliction; for theſe, beſides their ſoul-trouble, meet with ſuch in the world, and from the men of it, others do not. Afflictions are appointed for them by their heavenly Father; proviſion is made for them, and ſupport under them, in the covenant of grace; they are Chriſt's legacy to them, and by which they are conformed to him; they are always for their good, ſpiritual and eternal; and lie in their way to heaven, through which they muſt paſs into the kingdom: now theſe their outward afflictions which are here meant, lie chiefly in the meanneſs of their outward circumſtances; in poverty and diſtreſs, in diſgrace, reproaches, and perſecutions for their profeſſion of Chriſt, and his truths: and in oppoſition to this their mean and deſpicable condition in the eyes of the world, their future ſtate is ſignified by glory, as it often is in the word of God; and is of ſuch a nature, that all the glories of this world, ſuch as kingdoms, crowns, inheritances, poſſeſſions, riches, honour, and ſubſtance of every kind and degree, by all which the heavenly ſtate is expreſſed, are but faint reſemblances of it: it is the ſame glory Chriſt is entered into, is poſſeſſed of for, and will give to all his people; 'twill chiefly lie in communion with Father, Son, and Spirit, with angels, and one another; there will be a viſible glory upon the bodies of the ſaints, which will be faſhioned like to the glorious body of Chriſt; and their ſouls will be bleſs'd with perfect knowledge and holineſs. Their affliction is repreſented as light; which tho' it is not in itſelf, but often very grievous and heavy to be born, eſpecially when any ſoul-trouble is added to it; yet is light, when the ſaint is ſupported by the arm of the Lord, indulged with his preſence, and favoured with the diſcoveries of his love. The afflictions of God's people are light, when compared with their deſerts, with the ſufferings of Chriſt, the torments of the damned in hell, and the joys of heaven, which are here, by way of oppoſition thereunto, ſtiled a weight of glory. The Apoſtle has reſpect to the Hebrew word, כבוד, which ſignifies both weight and glory, and is often uſed for riches, honour, and whatſoever is excellent, ſolid, and ſubſtantial: and here the phraſe deſigns the weighty riches of glory, that maſſy crown of glory which fadeth not away, that bulky and more enduring ſubſtance, which Chriſt will cauſe them that love him to inherit. Again, the afflictions of the children of God are ſaid to be for a moment; they are but for a while, and that a little while; at moſt they are but for the preſent time of life, and that is but as a vapour which appears for a little while, and then vaniſhes away; it is but as a moment, a point of time, in compariſon of eternity: but the glory the ſaints are choſen and called unto, that weight of it which ſhall be put upon them is eternal; it will laſt for ever; it will know no end: hence it's called an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, an everlaſting kingdom, everlaſting habitations, an incorruptible inheritance, and a crown of glory that fadeth not away. Now the preſent affliction of the people of God has a conſiderable influence upon this; it is ſaid here, that it worketh for us, this glory. The Jews[y] introduce God ſpeaking words much like theſe. "Saith the holy bleſſed God, I have ſent them chaſtiſements in this world, לחזק זרועותם לעולם הבא, "to ſtrengthen their arms for, or that their arms "may lay hold upon the world to come." Now afflictions may be ſaid to work eternal glory for the ſaints, not by way of merit, for they are not worthy to be compared with the glory to be revealed; there's no proportion between them; beſides, the heavenly kingdom and glory was prepared from the foundation of the world, and is a free-grace gift of their heavenly Father; but they work as means of enjoying it, as the word and ordinances do; the Spirit of God makes uſe of them, as of the other, to work up the ſaints for that ſelfſame thing, glory: theſe are means of trying, exerciſing, and improving their graces, of weaning their hearts from this world, and drawing out their deſires, hope, and expectation of another; they are the way in which believers walk to glory, and which at laſt iſſue and terminate in it; glory follows upon them, tho' it is not for them.

Ver. 18. While we look not at the things which are ſeen, &c.] Theſe are the things of this world, ſuch as riches, honours, pleaſures, profits, &c.

[y] R. Moſes Kotſenſis Mitzvot Torah præcept. affirm. 17.

which are viſible to, and ſtrike the ſenſes of a natural man, and are temporal, endure but for a time, are tranſitory, fleeting, and quickly gone. To look at theſe things is to deſire them, ſet the affections on them, and to make the enjoyment of them a man's chief ſcope and aim; and when this is the caſe, afflictions can't be ſaid to work for ſuch, or to work them for an eternal weight of glory; but when believers have their eyes and hearts taken off of theſe things, they either look not at them, or with contempt upon them; while, and when they are in ſuch frames of ſoul, afflictions are operating for their future good. Or by theſe things that are ſeen may be meant afflictions themſelves, the croſs, with all that belongs to it; which alſo are diſcernible by the outward ſenſes, and are but for a time. Now a believer is not to ſtand looking and poring upon his afflictions; for while he does ſo, they work impatience, murmurings, repinings, unbelief, &c. but when and while he looks off of theſe to Chriſt, and to what he has done and ſuffered, and to the glories of another world, and to the recompence of reward, he not only finds himſelf ſupported under his preſent afflictions, which he does not ſo overlook as to deſpiſe; but he alſo finds his heart ſeeking after, and his affections ſet upon, and his faith, hope, and expectation raiſed in the views of things above, where Chriſt is: and ſo he is kept looking at the things which are not ſeen; by the corporal eye, nor by the eye of carnal ſenſe and reaſon; only by the eye of faith, which is the ſubſtance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not ſeen: and theſe things, the joys and glories of heaven, are eternal; will laſt for ever, will never end; all which is great encouragement to faith and patience under the preſent afflictive diſpenſations of providence.

CHAP. V.

THE Apoſtle, in this chapter, enlarges upon the ſaints comfortable aſſurance, expectation, and deſire of the heavenly glory; diſcourſes of the diligence and induſtry of himſelf, and other Goſpel miniſters in preaching the word, with the reaſons that induced them to it; and cloſes it with a commendation of the Goſpel-miniſtry from the important ſubject, ſum, and ſubſtance of it. Having mentioned in the latter part of the preceding chapter, the eternal weight of glory, the afflictions of the ſaints are working for, and the inviſible realities of that ſtate they are looking to, here expreſſes the aſſurance that he and others had of their intereſt therein; and which he ſignifies by an edifice, and illuſtrates it by its oppoſition to the body, which he compares to an houſe and tabernacle; the one is man's, the other of God, and not made with hands; the one is earthly, the other in heaven; the one is to be, and will be diſſolved, the other is eternal, ver. 1. and therefore it is no wonder that it ſhould be ſo earneſtly deſired, as it is ſaid to be in ver. 2. where the deſire of it is ſignified by groaning, which ſuppoſes ſomething diſtreſſing, and which makes uneaſy; and by an earneſt longing after deliverance and happineſs, and which is explained by a deſire to be clothed upon with the houſe from heaven; where the heavenly glory is not only, as before, compared to an houſe, but alſo to a garment, which all thoſe that are clothed with the righteouſneſs of Chriſt may juſtly expect to be arrayed with; for theſe will not be found naked, nor remain ſo, ver. 3. which earneſt deſire after immortality and glory is more fully explained, ver. 4. in which not only the body, in its preſent ſtate, is again compared to a tabernacle, and the ſaints repreſented as being diſtreſſed, and ſo groaning whilſt in it; but the cauſe of this groaning is ſuggeſted, which is a burden they labour under, both of ſin and affliction; and yet ſuch is the natural inclination of man to remain in the body, and his unwillingneſs to part from it, that he does not deſire to be ſtripped of that, but to have the robe of immortality put upon it, that ſo the preſent mortality that attends it might be wholly ſwallowed up in it: and that the ſaints had reaſon to believe there was ſuch an happineſs to be enjoyed, and that they had ſuch an intereſt in it is clear; becauſe as God had prepared that for them, he had alſo wrought and prepared them for that; and beſides, had given them his Spirit as the earneſt and pledge of it, ver. 5. wherefore, as they were confidently aſſured of it, and conſidering that they were but ſojourners and ſtrangers whilſt in the body, and in the preſent ſtate of things, and not at home in their Father's houſe, and abſent from Chriſt, ver. 6. as is evident from their walking by faith in the comfortable aſſurance, lively hope, and earneſt expectation of things future and unſeen, and not in the beatific viſion of them, ver. 7. Hence they were very deſirous, and choſe rather to quit their preſent dwelling, the tabernacle of the body, that they might be at home, and enjoy the preſence of the Lord, ver. 8. And this confidence and hope of eternal things wrought in the Apoſtle, and other faithful miniſters of the word, great carefulneſs and diligence to ſerve the Lord acceptably, and diſcharge with faithfulneſs the truſt repoſed in them, ver. 9. the reaſon of which concern alſo, or what likewiſe animated them to a diligent performance of their duty, was their certain appearance before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt; which appearance will be univerſal, and when there will be a diſtribution of rewards and puniſhments to every one according to his works, ver. 10. And beſides, it was not only their own perſonal concern in this awful affair that engaged them to ſuch a conduct, but the regard they had to the good of immortal ſouls, to whom the day of judgment muſt be terrible, unleſs they are brought to believe in Chriſt; and for the truth of this they could appeal both to God, and to the conſciences of men, particularly the Corinthians, ver. 11. And leſt this ſhould be imputed to pride and arrogance, the Apoſtle ſuggeſts the reaſon why he made mention of all this, that they might have wherewith to anſwer the falſe teachers, and vindicate the faithful miniſters of the Goſpel, ver. 12. However, let it be conſtrued which way it will, as the effect of madneſs or ſobriety, this he could with the greateſt confidence affirm, that his view was the glory of God, and the good of ſouls, ver. 13. and to this diligence and faithfulneſs in preaching the Goſpel, he and others were not only moved by their deſire and expectation of happineſs, by the future judgment in which they muſt appear, and by their concern for immortal ſouls, that they might eſcape the vengeance of that day; but they were conſtrained thereunto by the love of Chriſt in dying for them, and in whom they died, ver. 14. the end of which was, that they might live not to themſelves, but to him that died and roſe again, ver. 15. And as a further inſtance of their integrity and faithfulneſs, the Apoſtle obſerves, that they had no regard to men on account of their carnal deſcent, and outward privileges, as the Jews; nor even did they conſider Chriſt himſelf in a carnal view, or eſteem of him as a temporal king, as they once did, ver. 16. their ſole aims and views being the ſpiritual good of men, and the advancement of the ſpiritual intereſt and kingdom of Chriſt; and the concluſion from hence is, that whoever is truly in Chriſt, and in his kingdom is a new creature, and is in a new world, in a new diſpenſation, in which both the old things of the law, and of heatheniſm, and of his former converſation are gone, and all things in doctrine, worſhip, and converſation are become new, ver. 17. And from hence the Apoſtle proceeds to a commendation of the Goſpel-diſpenſation, and the miniſtry of it, from its author God, and from the ſubject-matter of it, reconciliation of men to God by Chriſt, ver. 18. which is more fully explained and enlarged on, both with reſpect to the efficient cauſe of reconciliation, the objects of it, and the means and manner in which it is brought about, and alſo the publication of it in the Goſpel by the miniſters of it, ver. 19. and who are deſcribed as the embaſſadors of Chriſt, acting in the name of God, and as in the ſtead of Chriſt, for the good of men, ver. 20. And cloſes the chapter with an account of the great propitiation Chriſt, by whom reconciliation is made; as that he was in himſelf without ſin, and yet was by imputation made ſin for ſinners, that they, in the ſame way, might be made righteous in the ſight of God thro' him, ver. 21.

Ver. 1. For we know, that if our earthly houſe, &c.] By this houſe is meant the body, ſo called from its being like a well-built houſe, a curious piece of architecture; as an houſe conſiſts of a variety of parts fitly framed and put together in juſt ſymmetry and proportion, and with an entire uſefulneſs in all, ſo is the body of man; which ſhews the power and wiſdom of God the architect: likewiſe, becauſe it is the dwelling-place of the ſoul, which makes it appear, that the ſoul is more excellent than the body, is independent of it, and capable of a ſeparate exiſtence from it: it is ſaid to be an earthly houſe, becauſe it is from the earth; is ſupported by earthly things; has its preſent abode on the earth, and will quickly return to it: and the earthly houſe of this tabernacle, in alluſion to the tabernacles the patiarchs and Iſraelites of old dwelt in; or to the tents and tabernacles of ſoldiers, ſhepherds, travellers, and ſuch like perſons, which are ſoon put up and taken down, and removed from place to place; and denotes the frailty and ſhort continuance of our mortal bodies. So Plato [z] calls the body, γηινον σκηνος, an earthly tabernacle; ſo the Jews were wont to call the body an houſe, and a tabernacle: "every man, "they ſay [a], has two houſes, בית הגוף, the houſe "of the body, and the houſe of the ſoul; the one "is the outward, the other the inward houſe." So Abarbinel [b] paraphraſes thoſe words, Iſ. xviii. 14. "I will conſider in my dwelling-place; I will re-"turn, or again conſider in my dwelling-place, "which is the body, for that is, משכן הנפש, the "tabernacle of the ſoul." Now this tabernacle may, and will be, diſſolved, unpinn'd, and taken down; which does not deſign an annihilation of it, but a diſſolution of its union with the ſoul, and its ſeparation from it: and when the Apoſtle puts an if upon it, it is not to be underſtood as tho' it is uncertain whether it would be diſſolved or no, unleſs it be ſaid with a view to the change that will be on living ſaints at Chriſt's ſecond coming; but it is rather a conceſſion of the matter, and may be rendered, tho' the earthly houſe, &c. or it points out the time when the ſaints future happineſs ſhall begin, when the earthly houſe, &c. and ſignifies that being in the body, in ſome ſenſe, retards the enjoyment of it. Now it is the ſaints comfort whilſt they are in it, and in a view of the diſſolution of it, that they have a building of God, an houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens; which ſome underſtand of the glorified body upon its reſurrection, as oppoſed to its frail, mortal, earthly frame in its preſent ſituation; tho' rather all this deſigns the happineſs of the ſaints, which will be begun, and they ſhall immediately enter into, at the diſſolution of their bodies, and will be conſummated at the reſurrection; which is all of God's building and preparing; not made by the hands of the creature, or obtained by works of righteouſneſs done by men; and it lies in the heavens, and will continue for ever. So the [c] Jews ſpeak of בית קדישא, the holy houſe, in the world to come, and which they ſuppoſe is intended in Iſ. lvi. 5. and Prov. xxiv. 3. In this the ſaints have a preſent intereſt; they have it already built and prepared for them; they have an indubitate right and title to it thro' the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; they have it ſecured to them in Chriſt their feoffee in truſt, their head and repreſentative; and they have the earneſt of it, the Spirit of God in their hearts; of all which they have ſure and certain knowledge: for we know; they are well aſſured of the truth of this from the promiſe of God, who cannot lye, from the declaration of the Goſpel, the teſtimony of the Spirit, and the cloſe and inſeparable connexion there is between the grace they have already received, and the glory that ſhall be hereafter.

Ver. 2. For in this we groan earneſtly, &c.] Meaning either for this happineſs we groan, or rather in this tabernacle we groan. Theſe words are a reaſon of the former, proving that the ſaints have a building of God; and they know they have it, becauſe they groan after it here; for the groanings of the ſaints are under the influence and direction of the Spirit of God, who makes interceſſion for them, as for grace, ſo for glory, according to the will of God: and this groaning is further explained by deſiring to be clothed upon with our houſe which is from heaven; by which is meant not the glorified body in the reſurrection morn; for tho' the bodies of the ſaints will be glorious, incorruptible, powerful, and ſpiritual, they are not ſaid to be celeſtial, nor will they be from heaven, but be raiſed out of the earth: beſides, the Apoſtle is ſpeaking of an habitation the ſoul will go into, and is deſirous of going into as ſoon as it removes out of the earthly houſe of the body, and of a clothing it deſires to be clothed with as ſoon as it is ſtripp'd of the garment of the fleſh: wherefore, by the houſe from heaven muſt be meant the heavenly glory, which departed ſouls immediately enter into, and are arrayed with, even the white and ſhining robes of purity, perfection, and glory they ſhall be clothed with, as ſoon as ever their tabernacles are unpinn'd and diſſolved. The Jews indeed ſpeak of a celeſtial body which the ſoul ſhall be clothed with immediately upon its ſeparation from the earthly body, and much in ſuch figurative terms as the Apoſtle does in this, and the following verſes: "when a man's time is come, ſay they [d], to go "out of this world, he does not depart until the angel of death has ſtripped him of the clothing of this body, (ſee ver. 4.) and when the ſoul is ſtripped of the body, by the angel of death, it goes ומתלבשא בההוא גופא אחרא, and is clothed with that other body, which is in Paradiſe, of which it was ſtripped when it came into this world; for the ſoul has no pleaſure but in the body, which is from thence, and it rejoices becauſe it is ſtripped of the body of this world, ואתלבש בלבושא אחרא שלים, and is clothed with another perfect clothing." And a little after, "the holy bleſſed God deals well with men, for he does not ſtrip men of their clothes until he has provided for them other clothes, more precious and better than theſe, except the wicked of the world, who return not to their Lord by perfect repentance; for naked they came into this world, and naked (ſee ver. 3.) they ſhall return hence." And in another place[c], "the ſoul does not go up to appear before the holy king, until it is worthy to be clothed, בלבושא דלעילא, with the clothing which is above."

Ver. 3. If ſo be that being clothed, &c.] This ſuppoſition is made with reſpect to the ſaints who ſhall be alive at Chriſt's ſecond coming, who will not be ſtripped of their bodies, and ſo will not be found naked, or diſembodied, and ſhall have a glory at once put upon them, both ſoul and body; or theſe words are an inference from the ſaints preſent clothing, to their future clothing, thus; ſeeing we are clothed, have not only put on the new man, and are clothed and adorned with the graces of the Spirit, but are arrayed with the beſt robe, the wedding garment, the robe of Chriſt's righteouſneſs, we ſhall not be found naked; but ſhall be clothed upon with the heavenly glory, as ſoon as we are diſmiſſed from hence. Some read theſe words as a wiſh, O that we were clothed, that we might not be found naked! and ſo is expreſſive of one of the ſighs, and groans, and earneſt deſires of the ſaints in their preſent ſituation after the glories of another world.

Ver. 4. For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, &c.] There are ſome of the ſaints who are not in the tabernacle, the body. They were in it, but now are not; their bodies are in the grave, the houſe appointed for all living; and their ſouls are in the houſe not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, in everlaſting habitations, in the manſions prepared in Chriſt's Father's houſe; and they have done groaning, being delivered from every oppreſſor, ſin, ſatan, and the world; are at reſt from all their labours, and are free from every burden; only the ſaints who are in the tabernacle of the body, in an unſettled ſtate groan, being in the midſt of tribulation, and not yet in the enjoyment of that happineſs they are wiſhing for. The reaſon of their groaning is, becauſe they are burdened with the body itſelf, which is a clog and incumbrance to the ſoul in its ſpiritual exerciſes; and oftentimes by reaſon of its diſorders and diſeaſes a man becomes a burden to himſelf; but what the ſaints are moſtly burdened with in this life, and which makes them groan the moſt, is the body of ſin and death they carry about with them; the filth of it is nauſeous, grievous, and intolerable; the guilt of it oftentimes lies very heavy on the conſcience; the weight of it preſſes hard, and is a great hindrance to them in running their Chriſtian race; nor have they any relief under this burden, but by looking to a ſin-bearing and ſin-atoning ſaviour, the Lamb of God, who takes away the ſin of the world. They are alſo frequently burdened with ſatan's temptations, with blaſphemous thoughts, ſolicitations to ſin, the fears of death, the pangs of it, and what will follow upon it; tho' God is faithful, who will not ſuffer them to be tempted above that they are able to bear; however, theſe temptations are great burdens, and occaſion many a groan: to which may be added the various afflictions of life, which tho' comparatively light, are in themſelves heavy, grievous burdens, and hard to be bore; the nature, number, and continuance of them often make them ſo; and eſpecially they are ſuch, when God is pleaſed to hide his face, and with-hold the diſcoveries of his love and mercy. The Apoſtle goes on to explain what he means by deſiring to be clothed, not for that we would be unclothed; that is, of our bodies; and this he ſays, not thro' any love and liking he had to this animal life, or to the ſenſual methods of living here, which make natural men in love with life, and deſirous of always living here; but from a principle of nature, which recoils at death, does not like a diſſolution, chuſes any other way of removing out of this world than by death; a tranſlation of ſoul and body together to heaven, like that of Enoch and Elijah's, is more eligible even to a good man; or ſuch a change as will be upon the living ſaints at the coming of Chriſt, which the Apoſtle ſeems to have in view, who will not be unclothed of their bodies, as men are at death, but clothed upon; as is here deſired, with incorruption and immortality: that mortality might be ſwallowed up of life; not that the mortal body, or the ſubſtance of the body, which is mortal, might be conſumed and deſtroyed, but that mortality, that quality to which it is ſubject by ſin, might be no more: and he does not ſay, that death may be ſwallowed up of life, which will be done in the reſurrection morn; but mortality, which being ſwallowed up by a tranſlation, or ſuch a change as will be at the laſt day, will prevent death: and the phraſe, ſwallowed up, denotes the ſuddenneſs of the change, in an inſtant, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and that without any pain, or ſuch agonies as uſually attend death; and alſo the utter, final, and total abolition of mortality; ſo that there will never be more any appearance of it: his deſire is, that it may be ſwallowed up of the life, which is properly and emphatically life, as this life is not; and means the glorious, immortal, and everlaſting life, which ſaints enter into as ſoon as they are rid of their mortal bodies, and the mortality of them.

Ver. 5. Now he that hath wrought us for the ſelf-ſame thing, &c.] By the ſelf-ſame thing is meant, either the croſs, the burden of ſorrows and afflictions, under which the ſaints groan whilſt here, which God has appointed them unto, and therefore to be bore patiently by them; or that glory and immortality, which they, as veſſels of mercy, were prepared by him for from everlaſting; for which their bodies and ſouls are formed by him in creation, and for which they are made meet in regeneration, by the curious workmanſhip of his Spirit and grace upon them: and ſeeing he is God, and not man, who hath wrought them for this, either by his ſecret purpoſes and preparations of grace in eternity, or by his open works of creation and regeneration in time; there's no doubt but they ſhall certainly enjoy it, ſince his counſels are immutable, and he is a rock, and his work is perfect; whatever he begins he finiſhes, nor is he ever fruſtrated of his end: one of Stephens's copies adds, and hath anointed us, which ſeems to have been tranſcribed from chap. i. 21. Who alſo hath given us the earneſt of the Spirit; and therefore may be aſſured of poſſeſſing the inheritance, of which he is the earneſt; ſee ch. i. 22.

Ver. 6. Therefore we are always confident, &c.] Becauſe God has formed us for immortality and glory, and given us his Spirit as the earneſt of it, we take heart, are of good courage, don't ſink under our burdens, or deſpair of happineſs, but are fully aſſured of enjoying what we are deſirous of: knowing that whilſt we are at home in the body; or whilſt we are inmates or ſojourners in the body; for the body is not properly the ſaints home; whilſt they are in it, they are but pilgrims and ſtrangers; the time of their abode in it is the time of their ſojourning: during which time they are abſent from the Lord; not with reſpect to his general preſence, which is every where, and attends all creatures, an abſence from which is impoſſible; nor with reſpect to his ſpiritual preſence, which though not always ſenſibly enjoyed, yet frequently; nor are the children of God ever deprived of it totally and finally; but with reſpect to his glorious preſence, and the full enjoyment of that. Now the knowledge and conſideration of this, that the preſent ſtate and ſituation of the ſaints, whilſt in the body, is a ſtate of pilgrimage, and ſo of abſence from the Lord Chriſt, and from their Father's houſe, ſerves to increaſe their confidence and aſſurance, that they ſhan't long continue ſo, but in a little time ſhall be at home, and for ever with the Lord.

Ver. 7. For we walk by faith, and not by ſight.] Faith is a grace which anſwers many uſeful purpoſes; it is the eye of the ſoul, by which it looks to Chriſt for righteouſneſs, peace, pardon, life, and ſalvation; the hand by which it receives him, and the foot by which it goes to him, and walks in him as it has received him; which denotes not a ſingle act of faith, but a continued courſe of believing; and is expreſſive, not of a weak, but of a ſtrong, ſteddy faith of glory and happineſs, and of intereſt in it: and it is oppoſed to ſight; by which is meant, not ſenſible communion, but the celeſtial viſion: there's ſomething of ſight in faith; that is a ſeeing of the Son; and it is an evidence of things not ſeen, of the inviſible glories of the other world; faith looks at, and has a glimpſe of things not ſeen, which are eternal; but it is but ſeeing as thro' a glaſs darkly; 'tis not that full ſight, face to face, which will be had hereafter, when faith is turned into viſion.

Ver. 8. We are confident, I ſay, and willing rather, &c.] We are chearful in our preſent ſtate, being aſſured of future happineſs; tho' we chuſe rather to be abſent from the body; that is, to die, to depart out of this world. The interval between death, and the reſurrection, is a ſtate of abſence from the body, during which time the ſoul is diſembodied and exiſts in a ſeparate ſtate; not in a ſtate of inactivity and ſleep, for that would not be deſirable, but of happineſs and glory, enjoying the preſence of God, and praiſing of him, believing and waiting for the reſurrection of the body, when both will be united together again; and after that there will be no more abſence, neither from the body, nor from the Lord: and to be preſent with the Lord. This was promiſed to Chriſt in the everlaſting covenant, that all his ſpiritual ſeed and offspring ſhould be with him. This he expected; 'twas the joy of this which was ſet before him, that carried him thro' his ſufferings and death with ſo much chearfulneſs; this is the ſum of his prayers and interceſſion, and what all his preparations in heaven are on the account of. 'Tis this which ſupports and comforts the ſaints under all their ſorrows here, and which makes them meet death with pleaſure, which otherwiſe is formidable and diſagreeable to nature; and even deſirous of parting with life, to be with Chriſt, which is far better.

Ver. 9. Wherefore we labour, that whether preſent or abſent, &c.] This may be underſtood either of the miniſters of the Goſpel in particular, who labour in the word and doctrine, are ambitious, as the word here uſed ſignifies, and ſtrive to preach the Goſpel, not to pleaſe men, but their Lord and maſter; or of ſaints in general, who are intent upon this, and whoſe higheſt ambition is, that whether living or dying they may be accepted of him; both perſons and ſervices: ſuch who are born again, who are believers in Chriſt, and truly love him, are earneſtly deſirous of doing thoſe things which are pleaſing to him; and do in the ſtrength of Chriſt endeavour to perform them. Faith is a diligent, induſtrious, and operative grace, and makes perſons like itſelf. As none ought to be, ſo none are more careful to perform good works, or more ambitious to excel others in them, and thereby pleaſe their Lord, than believers. And theſe are the only perſons that can pleaſe him, for without faith it is impoſſible to pleaſe him; for theſe act from a principle of love to him, and with a view to his glory; and may they be but accepted of him, living and dying, both in this and the other world, they have the higheſt favour they can wiſh for and deſire.

Ver. 10. For we muſt all appear, &c.] This is a reaſon why the ſaints are ſo diligent and laborious, ſo earneſt and intent upon it, to be accepted of the Lord, becauſe they muſt ſtand before the judgment-ſeat of Chriſt; who is appointed judge of the whole earth, who is every way qualified for it, being God omnipotent and omniſcient; and when he comes a ſecond time will ſit upon his great white throne, a ſymbol of purity and integrity, and will enter on this work, and finiſh it with the ſtricteſt juſtice and equity: and before him we muſt all appear; all the ſaints, as well as others, miniſters and people, perſons of all ranks and conditions, of every nation, age, and ſex; there will be no avoiding this judgment, all muſt appear, or be made manifeſt; they will be ſet in open view, before angels and men; their perſons, characters, and actions, even the moſt ſecret will be: that every one may receive the things done in his body; which he has performed by the members of the body as inſtruments thereof, or whatſoever he has done whilſt in the body; and ſo this not only reaches to words and actions, but includes all the ſecret thoughts of the mind, and counſels of the heart, which will be made manifeſt: and when 'tis ſaid, that every one ſhall receive theſe; the meaning is, that he ſhall receive the reward of them, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad; the reward of good works will be of grace, and not of merit: good works will be conſidered at the laſt judgment, not as cauſes of eternal life and happineſs, to which the ſaints will be adjudged; but will be produced in open court as fruits of grace, and as evidences of the truth of faith, which will juſtify the judge in proceeding according to what he himſelf, as a ſaviour, has ſaid, he that believeth ſhall be ſaved, he that believeth not ſhall be damned. The reward of bad works will be in ſtrict and juſt proportion, portion, according to the nature and demerit of them. The Jews ſay [f], that "all the works which a man does in this world, בגופא, in the body, and Spirit, he muſt give an account of in body and ſpirit before he goes out of the world." And again [g], all the works of men are written in a book, חן טוב הן ביש, whether good or evil, and for them all they muſt give account.

Ver. 11. Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord, &c.] Or the fear of the Lord; by which is meant either the grace of the fear of the Lord, implanted in the hearts of the Apoſtles, and in which they acted in their miniſtry, faithfully diſpenſing to men the myſteries of grace; from which they could by no means be moved, becauſe the fear of God was before their eyes, and upon their hearts: or rather the terror of the Lord in the laſt judgment, which will be very great, conſidering the awfulneſs of the ſummons, ariſe ye dead, and come to judgment; the appearance of the judge, which will be ſudden, ſurprizing, and glorious; the placing of the thrones, the opening of the books, the poſition of the wicked, the dreadful ſentence pronounced on them, and the immediate execution of it; all which the miniſters of the word know from the ſcriptures of truth; they know the judge, that there will be a general judgment, and that the day is fixed for it, though they know not the exact time: and therefore perſuade men; not that their ſtate is good becauſe of a little outſide morality, nor to make their peace with God, or get an intereſt in Chriſt, or to convert themſelves, neither of which are in the power of men to do; but they endeavour to perſuade them by the beſt arguments they are maſters of, taken from the word of God, and their own experience, that they are in a dangerous ſtate and condition, walking in a way that leads to deſtruction; that they are liable to the curſes of the law, the wrath of God, and everlaſting ruine; that preſent duties of religion will not make amends for paſt ſins, nor can their tears atone for their crimes, or any works of righteouſneſs done by them juſtify them before God; and that ſalvation is only by Chriſt, who is both able and willing to ſave the chief of ſinners: and they endeavour to perſuade and encourage poor ſenſible ſinners to venture on Chriſt, and believe in him to the ſaving of their ſouls. So the Arabic verſion reads it, we perſuade men to believe; though when they have done all they can, theſe perſuaſions of theirs are ineffectual, without the powerful and efficacious grace of the Spirit of God; however, in ſo doing they diſcharge a good conſcience, and act the faithful part to God and men: but we are made manifeſt unto God; who ſearches the heart, and tries the reins, who knows all actions, and the ſecret ſprings of them; to him the ſincerity of our hearts, and the integrity of our conduct, are fully manifeſt; we can appeal to him that 'tis his glory, and the good of ſouls, we have in view in all our miniſtrations: and I truſt alſo are made manifeſt in your conſciences; that you alſo can bear witneſs to our faithfulneſs and honeſty, to the unwearied pains we have taken, and the hearty concern we have ſhown for the welfare of the ſouls of men. One of Stephens's copies reads, and we truſt; which agrees with the Apoſtle's ſpeaking in the firſt perſon plural in this, and the preceding verſes.

Ver. 12. For we commend not ourſelves again to you, &c.] We have no need to do ſo, being well known to you; nor do we intend it when we thus ſpeak of ourſelves, and of our miniſtrations: but give you occaſion to glory on our behalf; ſuggeſt ſome things to you which you may make uſe of in our favour, for the vindicating of our characters and conduct: that you may have ſomewhat to anſwer them which glory in appearance, and not in heart; by whom are meant the falſe Apoſtles who gloried in an outward ſhew, in their learning, eloquence, and popular applauſe they had acquired, and not in the ſincerity of their hearts, and the teſtimony of a good conſcience, things which the true Apoſtles of Chriſt were moſt ambitious of.

Ver. 13. For whether we be beſides ourſelves, &c.] As ſome took them to be, and as Feſtus thought the Apoſtle Paul was, becauſe of the doctrines they preached, and the ſelf-commendation they were obliged to enter into thro' the calumnies of their adverſaries; in which they did not ſo much ſeek their own reputation, as the honour and glory of God, which was ſtruck at thro' them: it is to God; it is for his glory, and not our own, that we act this part, for which we are condemned as mad men. Or whether we be ſober; think and ſpeak meanly of ourſelves, and behave with all modeſty and lowlineſs of mind: it is for your cauſe; for your inſtruction and imitation. The glory of God, and the good of his churches, were what concerned them in every part of life. Some refer this to the Apoſtle's being, or not being, in an extaſy or rapture. Others to his ſpeaking, either of the more ſublime doctrines of the Goſpel, on account of which he was reckoned mad, though in the delivering of them he had nothing elſe but the glory of God in view; or of the lower and eaſier truths of it, which were more accommodated to meaner capacities; in doing which he ſought their edification and advantage.

Ver. 14. For the love of Chriſt conſtraineth us, &c.] Or containeth us; holds and keeps us in our ſtation and duty, as ſoldiers are held and kept together under a banner, or enſign diſplayed; to which the church refers, when ſhe ſays, his banner over me was love, Cant. ii. 4. Nothing more effectually keeps miniſters, or other believers, in the work and ſervice of their Lord, or more ſtrongly obliges and conſtrains them to a chearful diſcharge of their duty to him, and one another, than his love diſplayed in his covenant-engagements, in his aſſumption of human nature, and particularly in his dying for them, which is the inſtance given in the text: becauſe we thus judge; having well weighed, and maturely conſidered the affair, that if one died for all, then were all dead; or ſeeing one died for all; for it is rather an aſſertion than a ſuppoſition, upon which the Apoſtle reaſons. The perſon deſigned, who died for all, is Jeſus Chriſt, tho' not mentioned, and is to be ſupplied from the former clauſe. The doctrine of Chriſt's dying for men was well known, ſo that there was no need to mention his name: he is called one, in diſtinction to the all he died for, and as excluſive of all others, he being ſufficient of himſelf to anſwer the ends of his death; and therefore is to be looked unto, and believed on, alone for ſalvation, and to have all the glory of it. The manner of his dying is for, or in the room and ſtead of all; ſo that he died not merely as a martyr, or by way of example, or only for their good, but as their ſubſtitute, in their room and ſtead, having all the ſins of his people upon him, for which he made ſatisfaction; and this the nature of his death ſhews, which was a ſacrifice, a ranſom, a propitiation and atonement. The perſons for whom Chriſt died are all; not every individual of mankind, but all his people, all his ſheep, all the members of his church, or all the ſons he, as the great captain of ſalvation, brings to glory. Wherefore this text does not make for the doctrine of general redemption; for it ſhould be obſerved, that it does not ſay that Chriſt died for all men, but for all; and ſo, agreeable to the ſcriptures, may be underſtood of all the perſons mentioned. Moreover, in the latter part of the text it is ſaid, that thoſe for whom Chriſt died, for them he roſe again; he died for no more, nor for others, than thoſe for whom he roſe again: now thoſe for whom he roſe again, he roſe for their juſtification; wherefore, if Chriſt roſe for the juſtification of all men, all would be juſtified, or the end of Chriſt's reſurrection would not be anſwered; but all men are not, nor will they be juſtified, ſome will be condemned; hence it follows, that Chriſt did not riſe from the dead for all men, and conſequently did not die for all men: beſides, the all for whom Chriſt died, died with him, and through his death are dead both to the law and ſin; and he died for them, that they might live, not to themſelves, but to him; neither of which are true of all the individuals of mankind: to which may be added, that the context explains the all of ſuch who are in Chriſt, are new creatures, are reconciled to God, whoſe treſpaſſes are not imputed to them, for whom Chriſt was made ſin, and who are made the righteouſneſs of God in him; which cannot be ſaid of all men. The concluſion from hence is, then were all dead; meaning, either that thoſe for whom Chriſt died, were dead in Adam, dead in law, dead in treſpaſſes and ſins, which made it neceſſary for him to die for them; otherwiſe, there would have been no occaſion for his death; yet it does not follow from hence, that Chriſt died for all that are in ſuch a condition; only that thoſe for whom Chriſt died were dead in this ſenſe, admitting this to be the ſenſe of the paſſage: tho' death in ſin ſeems not to be intended, ſince that all men are dead in ſin, would have been a truth, if Chriſt had died for none; and much leſs is this an effect, or what follows upon the death of Chriſt; nor does it capacitate, but renders men incapable of living to Chriſt: wherefore a myſtical death in, and with Chriſt, ſeems rather to be meant; and ſo the Ethiopic verſion reads it, in whom every one is dead. Chriſt died as the head and repreſentative of his people, and they all died in him, were crucified with him, and thro' his death, became dead to the law, as to its curſe and condemnation; and to ſin, as to its damning power, being acquitted, diſcharged, and juſtified from it; the conſequence of which is a deliverance from the dominion of it, whereby they become capable of living to the glory of Chriſt. The ſenſe of the paſſage is not, that Chriſt died for all that were dead, but that all were dead for whom he died; which is true of them, whether in the former, or in the latter ſenſe: the article, οἱ, is anaphorical or relative, as Beza and Piſcator obſerve; and the meaning is, that if Chriſt died for all, then all thoſe were dead for whom he died.

[f] Zohar in Gen. fol. 57. 3.

[g] Midraſh Hanneelam in ib. fol. 75. 4.

Ver. 15. And that he died for all, that they which live, &c.] The end of Chriſt's dying for men were that they might live; live, in a law-ſenſe, live a life of juſtification; and that they which live in ſuch a ſenſe, ſhould not henceforth live unto themſelves; to their own luſts, and after their own wills, to either ſinful ſelf, or righteous ſelf: but unto him which died for them, and roſe again; that is, for them, for their juſtification; for all thoſe for whom Chriſt died, for them he roſe again; and who were juſtified, acquitted, and diſcharged when he was; which cannot be ſaid of all mankind; and which is an obligation on ſuch perſons to live to Chriſt, to aſcribe the whole of their ſalvation to him, and to make his glory the end of all their actions. Some copies read, which died for them all.

Ver. 16. Wherefore henceforth know we no man after the fleſh, &c.] Since the death and reſurrection of Chriſt, which has broken down the middle wall of partition, and has took away all diſtinction of men, we know, we eſteem, we value no man on account of his carnal deſcent, and fleſhly privileges, as being of the Jewiſh nation, a deſcendant of Abraham, and circumciſed as he was; or on account of their outward ſtate and condition, as being rich and honourable among men, or on account of their natural parts and acquirements, their learning, wiſdom, and eloquence; nor do we own any man to be a Chriſtian, that lives after the fleſh, to himſelf, and not to Chriſt; nor do we make account of the ſaints themſelves as in this mortal ſtate, but as they will be in the reſurrection, in conſequence of Chriſt's having died for them, and roſe again. Yea, though we have known Chriſt after the fleſh; ſome of them had ſeen him in the fleſh; others valued him on account of his being of the Jewiſh nation, and of his relation to them according to the fleſh; and all of them had formerly entertained carnal apprehenſions of him, and his kingdom, as tho' it would be a temporal one: yet now henceforth know we him no more; no more in this mortal ſtate, being riſen from the dead; nor do we value ourſelves upon having ſeen him in the fleſh; for tho' ſuch a ſight and knowledge of him was deſirable, yet a ſpiritual knowledge is much more preferable; and many there were who knew him in the fleſh, who neither enjoy his ſpiritual preſence here, nor will they be favoured with his glorious preſence hereafter. Moreover, we don't judge of him as we did before we had a ſpiritual knowledge of him, and as our countrymen did, by his outward circumſtances, by his parentage and education, his poverty and afflictions, his company and converſation, that he could not be the Meſſiah, the Son of God, and therefore was worthy of death; we have quite other thoughts and apprehenſions of him now, believing him to be the Chriſt of God, a ſpiritual ſaviour and redeemer, whoſe kingdom is not of this world; we have relinquiſhed all our national prejudices, and former notions, concerning the Meſſiah, his kingdom, and people. Some copies add, after the fleſh; and the Arabic verſion, yet now know we him no more in that.

Ver. 17. Therefore if any man be in Chriſt, &c.] There's a ſecret being in Chriſt from everlaſting; ſo all that are loved by him, eſpouſed unto him, choſen and preſerved in him, to whom he was a covenant-head, ſurety, and repreſentative, are in him, united to him, and one with him; not in ſuch ſenſe as the Father is in him, and the human nature is in him, but as huſband and wife, and head and members are one: and there's an open being in Chriſt at converſion, when a man believes in Chriſt, and gives up himſelf to him; faith does not put a man into Chriſt, but makes him appear to be in him: and ſuch an one is a new creature; or, as ſome read it, let him be a new creature; who underſtand being in Chriſt to be by profeſſion, and the ſenſe this, whoever is in the kingdom or church of Chriſt, who profeſſes himſelf to be a chriſtian, ought to be a new creature: the Arabic verſion reads it, he that is in the faith of Chriſt is a new creature. All ſuch who are ſecretly in Chriſt from everlaſting, tho' as yet ſome of them may not be new creatures, yet they ſhall be ſooner or later; and thoſe who are openly in him, or are converted perſons are actually ſo; they are a new creation, as the words may be rendered: בריה חדשה, a new creation, is a phraſe often uſed by the Jewiſh[h] doctors, and is applied by the Apoſtle to converted perſons; and deſigns not an outward reformation of life and manners, but an inward principle of grace, which is a creature, a creation-work, and ſo not man's, but God's; and in which man is purely paſſive, as he was in his firſt creation: and this is a new creature, or a new man, in oppoſition to, and diſtinction from the old man, the corruption of nature; and becauſe it is ſomething a-new implanted in the ſoul, which never was there before; it is not a working upon, and an improvement of the old principles of nature, but an implantation of new principles of grace and holineſs; here's a new heart, and a new ſpirit, and in them new light and life, new affections and deſires, new delights and joys; here are new eyes to ſee with, new ears to hear with, new feet to walk, and new hands to work and act with: old things are paſſed away; the old courſe of living, the old way of ſerving God, whether among Jews or Gentiles; the old legal righteouſneſs, old companions and acquaintance are dropp'd; and all external things, as riches, honours, learning, knowledge, former ſentiments of religion are relinquiſhed: behold, all things are become new; there's a new courſe of life, both of faith and holineſs; a new way of ſerving God thro' Chriſt by the Spirit, and from principles of grace; a new, another, and better righteouſneſs is received and embraced; new companions are ſought after, and delighted in; new riches, honours, glory, a new Jeruſalem, yea, new heavens, and a new earth are expected by new creatures: or the ſenſe of the whole may be this, if any man is entered into the kingdom of God, into the Goſpel diſpenſation, into a Goſpel church-ſtate, which ſeems to be the ſenſe of the phraſe, in Chriſt, in Gal. iii. 28. and v. 6. and vi. 15. he is become a new creature, or is got into a new creation, as it were into a new world, whether he be a Jew or a Gentile; for with reſpect to the former ſtate of either, old things are paſſed away: if a Jew, the whole Moſaic œconomy is aboliſhed; the former covenant is waxen old, and vaniſhed away; the old ordinances of circumciſion, and the paſſover are no more; the daily ſacrifice is ceaſed, and all the other ſacrifices are at an end, Chriſt, the great ſacrifice, being offered up; the prieſthood of Aaron is antiquated, there is a change of it, and of the whole law; the obſervance of holy days, new moons and ſabbaths, is over; the whole ceremonial law is at end; all the ſhadows of it are fled and gone, the things they were ſhadows of being come by Chriſt, the ſum and ſubſtance of them; and there's no more a ſerving God in the oldneſs of the letter, but in the newneſs of the Spirit: and if a Gentile, all the former idols he worſhipped he turns from, and his language is, what have I to do any more with idols? or what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? all former ſacrifices, ſuperſtitious rites and ceremonies with which he worſhipped them are relinquiſhed by him; with all other heatheniſh cuſtoms, rules, and methods of conduct he had been uſed to: behold, all things are become new; to the one, and to the other; the Goſpel diſpenſation is a new ſtate of things; a new form of church-ſtate is erected, not national, as among the Jews, but congregational, conſiſting of perſons gathered out of the world, and anew embodied together; new ordinances are appointed, which were never in uſe before, as baptiſm and the Lord's ſupper; a new and living way is opened by the blood of Chriſt into the holieſt of all, not by the means of ſlain beaſts, as among the Jews, nor by petty deities, as with the Gentiles; a new commandment of love is enjoined all the followers of the Lamb; and another name is given them, a new name, which the mouth of the Lord their God, has named, not of Jews nor Gentiles, but of Chriſtians; and new ſongs are put into their mouths, even praiſe to God: in ſhort, the Goſpel church-ſtate ſeems to be, as it were, a new creation, and perhaps is meant by the new heavens and new earth, Iſ. lxv. 15, 17. as well as thoſe who are the proper members of it, are new creatures in the ſenſe before given.

Ver. 18. And all things are of God, &c.] A man's being brought into a Goſpel church-ſtate is of God; the cauſing all old things to paſs away, whether in the Jewiſh or Gentile world, is of God; the ſhaking of the heavens and the earth, and the removing of thoſe things that are ſhaken, the abrogation of the ceremonial law, the putting an end to all the Moſaic rites and ſacrifices, the ejection of ſatan out of the heathen temples, and the abolition of Gentiliſm, with every thing elſe that comes under the names of old, and new, are of God: it is he that cauſes old things to paſs away, and makes all things new; ſee Rev. xxi. 1, 5. Moreover, as all things in the old creation are from him, all creatures owe their beings to him, are ſupported in them by him, and all are made for his pleaſure, and his glory; ſo all things in the new creation are of him; the work of renovation itſelf is his; all the grace that is implanted in regeneration comes from him; nothing is of the creature, or to be aſcribed to it. All things in redemption are of him; he drew the plan of it, call'd his Son to be the redeemer, appointed and ſent him as ſuch; and particularly that branch of it, reconciliation, is of him: who hath reconciled us to himſelf by Jeſus Chriſt. The work of reconciliation, or making atonement for ſin, is aſcribed to the Father; not that he is the author of it, for it is properly Chriſt's work; but becauſe he took the firſt ſtep towards it: he formed the ſcheme of it; he ſet forth his Son in his purpoſes and decrees to be the propitiatory ſacrifice; he aſſigned him this work in council and covenant, in promiſe, and in prophecy, and ſent him to effect it; therefore he is ſaid to do it by him; that is, by his blood and ſacrifice, by his ſufferings and death, to which, and to which alone, the ſcriptures aſcribe our peace and reconciliation: and this is made to himſelf; as being the party offended, whoſe law was broken, againſt whom ſin was committed, and whoſe juſtice required and demanded ſatisfaction: and hath given to us the miniſtry of reconciliation; which is the Goſpel of peace, the word which preaches, publiſhes and declares, peace made by the blood of Chriſt; which is a gift to miniſters, and a bleſſing to the people. The free grace of God greatly appears in this matter; God the Father ſets this work of reconciliation on foot, Chriſt has brought it about, and the miniſters of the Goſpel publiſh it.

Ver. 19. To wit, that God was in Chriſt reconciling the world unto himſelf, &c.] This expreſſes and explains the ſubject-matter of the miniſtration of the Goſpel, eſpecially that part of it which concerns our reconciliation with God; and declares the ſcheme, the author, the ſubjects, the way, and means, and conſequence of it. The phraſe, in Chriſt, may be either joined with the word God, as in our verſion, God was in Chriſt reconciling; that is, he was in Chriſt drawing the ſcheme, fixing the method of reconciliation; his thoughts were employed about it, which were thoughts of peace; he called a council of peace, and entered into a covenant of peace with Chriſt, who was appointed and agreed to, to be the peace-maker. Or with the word reconciling, thus, God was reconciling in Chriſt; that is, by Chriſt; and ſo it denotes, as before, actual reconciliation by Chriſt. God, in purſuance of his purpoſes, council, and covenant, ſent his Son to make peace; and laid our ſins, and the chaſtizement of our peace upon him; this is the puniſhment of ſin, whereby ſatisfaction was made for it, and ſo peace with God: or with the word world, thus, God was reconciling the world in Chriſt; by whom are meant, not all the individuals of mankind, for theſe are not all in Chriſt, nor all reconciled to God, multitudes dying in enmity to him, nor all intereſted in the bleſſing of non-imputation of ſin; whereas each of theſe is ſaid of the world here: but the elect of God, who are choſen in Chriſt, whoſe peace Chriſt is, whoſe ſins are not imputed to them, and againſt whom no charge of any avail can be laid; and particularly the people of God among the Gentiles are here deſigned, who are frequently called the world in ſcripture; being the world which God loved, for whoſe ſins Chriſt is the propitiation, and of the reconciling of which mention is particularly made, John iii. 16. 1 John ii. 2. Rom. xi. 12, 15. And this ſenſe well agrees with the context, which ſignifies, that no man is regarded for his natural deſcent; it's no matter whether he is a Jew or a Gentile, provided he's but a new creature; for Goſpel-reconciliation, and the miniſtry of it, concern one as well as another. Moreover, this reconciliation muſt be conſidered, either as intentional, or actual, or as a publication of it in the miniſtry of the word; and taken either way it cannot be thought to extend to every individual perſon in the world: if it is to be underſtood intentionally, that God intended the reconciliation of the world to himſelf by Chriſt, and drew the ſcheme of it in him, his intentions cannot be fruſtrated; his counſel ſhall ſtand, and he'll do all his pleaſure; a ſcheme ſo wiſely laid by him in his Son, cannot come to nothing, or only in part be executed; and yet this muſt be the caſe, if it was his deſign to reconcile every individual of mankind to himſelf, ſince a large number of them are not reconciled to him: and if the words are to be underſtood of an actual reconciliation of the world unto God by Chriſt, which ſenſe agrees with the preceding verſe, then it is out of all queſtion, that the word world cannot be taken in ſo large a ſenſe as to take in every man and woman in the world; ſince it is certain that there are many who are not reconciled to God, who die in their ſins, whoſe peace is not made with him, nor are they reconciled to the way of ſalvation by Chriſt: and ſhould it be admitted that the miniſtry of reconciliation is here deſigned, which is not an offer of reconciliation to the world, but a proclamation or declaration of peace and reconciliation made by the death of Chriſt; this is not ſent to all men; multitudes were dead before the word of reconciliation was committed to the Apoſtles; and ſince, there have been great numbers who have never ſo much as heard of it; and even in the times of the Apoſtles it did not reach to every one then living: beſides, the text does not ſpeak of what God did by the miniſtry of his Apoſtles, but of what he himſelf had been doing in his Son, and which was antecedent, and gave riſe unto, and was the foundation of their miniſtry. There was a ſcheme of reconciliation drawn in the counſels of God before the world began, and an actual reconciliation by the death of Chriſt, which is publiſhed in the Goſpel, which theſe words contain the ſum and ſubſtance of: and this reconciliation, as before, is ſaid to be unto himſelf; to his offended juſtice, and for the glory of his perfections, and the reconciling of them together in the affair of ſalvation: not imputing their treſpaſſes. This was what he reſolved upon from all eternity, that inaſmuch as Chriſt was become the ſurety and ſubſtitute of his people, he would not impute their ſins to them, or look for ſatisfaction for them from them, but would reckon and place them to the account of their ſurety, and expect ſatisfaction from him; and accordingly he did, and accordingly he had it. And this will, not to impute ſin to his people, or not to puniſh for it, which exiſted in God from everlaſting, is no other than a juſtification of them; for to whom the Lord does not impute ſin, he imputes righteouſneſs, and ſuch are properly juſtified. And hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation; or put it in us, as a rich and valuable treaſure; for ſuch the doctrine of peace and reconciliation, by the blood of Chriſt is; a ſacred depoſition, committed to the truſt of faithful men, to be diſpenſed and diſpoſed of for the uſe and purpoſe for which it is given them.

Ver. 20. Now then we are ambaſſadors for Chriſt, &c.] Since God has made reconciliation by Chriſt, and the miniſtry of it is committed to us, we are ambaſſadors for him; we come with full powers from him, not to propoſe terms of peace, to treat with men about it, to offer it to them, but to publiſh and proclaim it as made by him: we perſonate him, and God who made it by him, as tho' God did beſeech you by us; to regard this embaſſy and meſſage of peace, which we bring from him; to conſider from whence it takes its riſe, what methods have been uſed to effect it, and how it is accompliſhed; which ſhould oblige to ſay and ſing with the angels, glory to God in the higheſt, on earth peace, and good will towards men; and to behave in a peaceable manner to all men, and one another: we pray you in Chriſt's ſtead; perſonating him as if he was preſent before you: be ye reconciled to God; you, who are new creatures, for whom Chriſt has died, and peace is made; you, the members of the church at Corinth, who upon a profeſſion of faith have been taken into ſuch a relation; be ye reconciled to all the diſpenſations of divine providence towards you; let your wills bow, and be reſigned to his, ſince he is the God of peace to you; and as you are reconciled by Chriſt as a prieſt, be reconciled to him as your king, and your God; to all his ordinances and appointments; to all the orders and laws of his houſe; conform in all things to his will and pleaſure, which we, as his ambaſſadors, in his name and ſtead, have made known unto you. You ought to be all obedience to him, and never diſpute any thing he ſays or orders.

Ver. 21. For he hath made him to be ſin for us, &c.] Chriſt was made of a woman, took fleſh of a ſinful woman; tho' the fleſh he took of her was not ſinful, being ſanctified by the Spirit of God, the former of Chriſt's human nature; however, he appeared in the likeneſs of ſinful fleſh, being attended with infirmities, the effects of ſin, tho' ſinleſs; and he was traduced by men as a ſinner, and treated as ſuch. Moreover, he was made a ſacrifice for ſin, in order to make expiation and atonement for it; ſo the Hebrew word, חטאה, ſignifies both ſin and a ſin-offering; ſee Pſal. xl. 6. and ſo αμαρτια, Rom. viii. 3. Heb. x. 6. But beſides all this, he was made ſin itſelf by imputation; the ſins of all his people were transferr'd unto him, laid upon him, and placed to his account; he ſuſtained their perſons, and bore their ſins; and having them upon him, and being chargeable with, and anſwerable for them, he was treated by the juſtice of God as if he had been not only a ſinner, but a maſs of ſin; for to be made ſin, is a ſtronger expreſſion than to be made a ſinner: but now that this may appear to be only by imputation, and that none may conclude from hence that he was really and actually a ſinner, or in himſelf ſo, 'tis ſaid he was made ſin; he did not become ſin, or a ſinner, thro' any ſinful act of his own, but thro' his Father's act of imputation, to which he agreed; for it was he that made him ſin: it is not ſaid that men made him ſin; not but that they traduced him as a ſinner, pretended they knew he was one, and arraigned him at Pilate's bar as ſuch; nor is he ſaid to make himſelf ſo, tho' he readily engaged to be the ſurety of his people, and voluntarily took upon him their ſins, and gave himſelf an offering for them; but he, his Father is ſaid to make him ſin; 'twas he that laid, or made to meet on him, the iniquity of us all; it was he that made his ſoul an offering for ſin, and delivered him up into the hands of juſtice, and to death, and that for us, in our room and ſtead, to bear the puniſhment of ſin, and make ſatisfaction and atonement for it; of which he was capable, and for which he was greatly qualified: for he knew no ſin; which can't be underſtood of pure abſolute ignorance of ſin; for this can't agree with him, neither as God, nor as mediator; he full well knew the nature of ſin, as it is a tranſgreſſion of God's law; he knows the original of ſin, the corrupt heart of man, and the deſperate wickedneſs of that; he knows the demerit, and the ſad conſequences of it; he knows, and he takes notice of too, the ſins of his own people; and he knows the ſins of all wicked men, and will bring them all into judgment, convince of them, and condemn for them: but he knew no ſin ſo as to approve of it, and like it; he hates, abhors, and deteſts it; he never was conſcious of any ſin to himſelf; he never knew any thing of this kind by, and in himſelf; nor did he ever commit any, nor was any ever found in him, by men or devils, tho' diligently ſought for. This is mentioned, partly that we may better underſtand in what ſenſe he was made ſin, or a ſinner, which could be only by the imputation of the ſins of others, ſince he had no ſin of his own; and partly to ſhew that he was a very fit perſon to bear and take away the ſins of men, to become a ſacrifice for them, ſeeing he was the Lamb of God, without ſpot and blemiſh, typified in this, as in other reſpects, by the ſacrifices of the legal diſpenſation; alſo to make it appear that he died, and was cut off in a judicial way, not for himſelf, his own ſins, but for the tranſgreſſions of his people; and to expreſs the ſtrictneſs of divine juſtice in not ſparing the Son of God himſelf, tho' holy and harmleſs, when he had the ſins of others upon him, and had made himſelf reſponſible for them. The end of his being made ſin, though he himſelf had none, was, that we might be made the righteouſneſs of God in him; not the eſſential righteouſneſs of God, which can neither be imparted nor imputed; nor any righteouſneſs of God wrought in us; for 'tis a righteouſneſs in him, in Chriſt, and not in ourſelves, and therefore muſt mean the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; ſo called, becauſe it is wrought by Chriſt, who is God over all, the true God, and eternal life; and becauſe it is approved of by God the Father, accepted of by him, for, and on the behalf of his elect, as a juſtifying one; it is what he beſtows on them, and imputes unto them for their juſtification; it is a righteouſneſs, and it is the only one which juſtifies in the ſight of God. Now to be made the righteouſneſs of God, is to be made righteous in the ſight of God, by the imputation of the righteouſneſs of Chriſt. Juſt as Chriſt is made ſin, or a ſinner, by the imputation of the ſins of others to him; ſo they are made righteouſneſs, or righteous perſons, thro' the imputation of his righteouſneſs to them; and in no other way can the one be made ſin, or the other righteouſneſs. And this is ſaid to be in him, in Chriſt; which ſhews, that though Chriſt's righteouſneſs is unto all, and upon all them that believe, it is imputed to them, and put upon them; it is not any thing wrought in them; it is not inherent in them. Surely in the Lord have I righteouſneſs and ſtrength, ſays the church, Iſ. xlv. 24. and alſo, that the way in which we come by this righteouſneſs, is by being in Chriſt; none have it reckoned to them, but who are in him: we are firſt of God in Chriſt, and then he is made unto us righteouſneſs. Secret being in Chriſt, or union to him from everlaſting, is the ground and foundation of our juſtification, by his righteouſneſs, as open being in Chriſt at converſion is the evidence of it.

CHAP. VI.

THE Apoſtle having given a commendation of the Goſpel in the latter part of the preceding chapter, does in this addreſs the miniſters of it that were at Corinth, under the character of fellow-labourers, and by way of intreaty, that they would be careful to make it appear that they had not received neither the Goſpel of the grace of God, nor gifts to miniſter it, in vain, ver. 1. and in proof of the Goſpel being a miniſtry of reconciliation, and a doctrine of free grace and ſalvation, which carry in them ſo many arguments why it ſhould not be received in vain, the Apoſtle in ver. 2. cites a paſſage out of Iſ. xlix. 8. by which it appears, that the Goſpel-diſpenſation is a time of acceptance, and of ſalvation; and which he accommodates to the then preſent time in which he lived; and is true of the whole intermediate time between the ſufferings and death of Chriſt, which was the time in which he was helped and ſuccoured, and his ſecond coming, when all the elect will have been gathered in: after which he proceeds to give directions how to conduct without offence, that ſo no blame and reproach might fall upon the miniſtration of the Goſpel, ver. 3. and propoſes himſelf, and other faithful miniſters, as examples to them, who had approved themſelves as the miniſters of God by their patient bearing all kind of afflictions for the ſake of Chriſt, and his Goſpel, of which a particular enumeration is given in ver. 4, 5. and by the exerciſe of various other graces, virtues, and gifts beſtowed upon them, and which were illuſtrious in them, of which there is a particular detail in ver. 6, 7. though by reaſon of the different lights in which they were viewed by men, as well as the different appearances they made, and the different things that might be ſaid of them, either thro' miſrepreſentation or ignorance, or as under different conſiderations, many very ſtrange and enigmatical things are predicated of them, ver. 8, 9, 10. which can only be unriddled by their being poſſeſſors of the Goſpel of Chriſt, and being partakers of the grace of God. And next the Apoſtle addreſſes the members of the church at Corinth; and to make way for the exhortations he had to deliver to them, and that they might be taken in good part by them, he expreſſes his great regard to them; how free he was to communicate any thing that might be profitable to them, and how much his heart was enlarged with love to them, ver. 11. that there was no ſtraitneſs of ſpirit in him towards them, though there was ſo much in them towards him, ver. 12. Wherefore he entreats them, as his children, that as he had ſhewn paternal love to them, they would alſo expreſs filial affection and obedience to him, ver. 13. and then he enters upon his exhortation to have no communion with ungodly perſons; and which he confirms by five arguments taken from the diſagreement of righteouſneſs and unrighteouſneſs, of light and darkneſs, of Chriſt and Belial, of a believer and an unbeliever, and of the temple of God and of idols, ver. 14, 15, 16. by which he ſuggeſts, that as the proper characters of wicked men are unrighteouſneſs, darkneſs, Belial, unbelievers, and idols, or idolaters; ſo the names of ſaints were righteouſneſs, light, Chriſt, believers, and the temple of God; and in proof of the latter, he produces ſome paſſages out of Lev. xxvi. 11, 12. and Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27. and in the words of the prophet Iſaiah, ch. lii. 11. he calls upon the Corinthians to quit the company of ſinful and unclean men, to ſeparate from them, and have nothing to do with them in things criminal and ſinful; and for their encouragement to regard ſuch an exhortation, the promiſes of God are mentioned; as that he will receive ſuch perſons into his protection, and will behave as a Father towards them, and treat them as his ſons and daughters, ver. 17, 18.

Ver. 1. We then as workers together with him, &c.] The miniſters of the Goſpel are workers or labourers; their miniſtry is a work, and a very laborious one, which none have ſtrength equal to, and are ſufficient for, of themſelves: it is a work that requires faithfulneſs and diligence, is honourable, and thoſe who perform it aright deſerve reſpect. Theſe do not work alone; according to our verſion, they are workers together with him; meaning either God or Chriſt, not as co-ordinate with him, but as ſub-ordinate to him: he is the chief ſhepherd, they under ones; he is the chief maſter-builder, they under workers; but inaſmuch as he is with them, and they with him, he is over them, and ſtands by them, great honour is done them; they have encouragement to work; and hence it is that their work is ſucceſsful. Though the phraſe, with him, is not in the original text, where only one word, συνεργȣντες, is uſed, and may be render'd fellow workers, or fellow labourers, meaning with one another: and ſince therefore reconciliation was made by Chriſt, and the miniſtry of it was committed to them, and they were appointed embaſſadors for him, and were in his ſtead, therefore, ſay they, we beſeech you alſo; you miniſters alſo; as we have intreated the members of the church, to be reconciled to the order of the Goſpel, and the laws of Chriſt in his houſe, ſo as fellow labourers with you, and jointly concerned in the ſame embaſſy of peace, we beſeech you the miniſters of the word in this church, that ye receive not the grace of God in vain: by the grace of God, is not meant the grace of God in regeneration, and effectual calling, which can never be received in vain; for the grace of God never fails of producing a thorough work of converſion; nor is it ever loſt, but is ſtrictly connected with eternal glory: but by it is meant either the doctrine of grace, the Goſpel of Chriſt, ſo called, becauſe it is a declaration of the love and grace of God to ſinners, aſcribes ſalvation in part, and in whole, to the free grace of God, and is a means of implanting and increaſing grace in the hearts of men. Now this may be received in vain by miniſters and people, when it is but notionally received, or received in word only; when it is abuſed and perverted to vile purpoſes, and when men drop, deny it, and fall off from it: or elſe by the grace of God may be deſigned, gifts of grace, qualifying for miniſterial ſervice; and the ſenſe of the exhortation be, that they be careful that the gifts beſtowed on them might not be neglected by them, but be uſed and improved to the advantage of the church, and the glory of Chriſt; by giving up themſelves to ſtudy, meditation, and prayer, by labouring conſtantly in the word and doctrine, and by having a ſtrict regard to their lives and converſations, that the miniſtry be not blamed; which exhortation he purſues in, and by his own example and others, in ſome following verſes, the next being included in a parentheſis.

Ver. 2. For he ſaith, I have heard thee in a time accepted, &c.] Theſe words are a citation from Iſ. xlix. 8. and are ſpoken by the Father to Chriſt, declaring he had heard him, as he always did. He heard him when he put up that prayer to him, recorded John xvii. for the glorification of himſelf, by ſtrengthening him as man in his work, by raiſing him from the dead, ſetting him at his own right hand, and giving him the glory he had with him before the world was; for the good of his people, the preſervation of thoſe that were called, the converſion of them that were not called, and the glorification of all the Father had given him: he heard him in the garden, and anſwered him; the will of God was done according to his deſire, and his will was conformed to the will of his Father, and he was delivered from the fear of death; his ends in his prayer there were anſwered, which were to ſhew the greatneſs of his ſufferings, the impoſſibility of man's ſalvation in any other way, and that there could be no alteration made in the methods of obtaining it. He heard him on the croſs with reſpect to the deliverance of him from man, with regard to his being forſaken by God, and for the forgiveneſs of his enemies. Now this period of time in which he was heard on account of theſe ſeveral things, is called a time accepted; or, as in the Hebrew text, עת רצון, a time of good-will, or acceptance; a ſeaſon in which God expreſſed good-will to the ſons of men, by ſending his own Son to work out ſalvation for them; this was good-will to men, and not to angels, to ſuch as were ungodly, enemies, ſinners, and the worſt of ſinners: it was a time very grateful to him; 'twas the accepted year of the Lord; the ſufferings, ſacrifice, ſatisfaction, and righteouſneſs of his Son were well-pleaſing to him; becauſe his purpoſes, promiſes, and covenant-tranſactions had their accompliſhment, his perfections were glorified, and his people ſaved. And it was a time of acceptance, or an acceptable time to men, ſince it was the day of their ſalvation, and therefore muſt be exceeding agreeable to all ſuch who ſee their need of it, know the worth of it, and are ſenſible that there is no other way of ſalvation than by him. And in the day of ſalvation have I ſuccoured thee. Theſe words are ſtill ſpoken to Chriſt, who whilſt he was in human nature, working out the ſalvation of his people, by his obedience, ſufferings, and death, was ſuccoured, or helped by his Father. This help was promiſed to him as man, and he expected it, and exerciſed faith on God for it, and which was actually and punctually given him; and which is no inſtance of weakneſs in Chriſt, who is the mighty God, and was mighty to ſave; but an indication of the Father's regard to the human nature of Chriſt, and of his concern for the ſalvation of men; and alſo ſhews what power and ſtrength were neceſſary to accompliſh it. Behold now is the accepted time, behold now is the day of ſalvation. Theſe are the words of the Apoſtle, applying the former to the preſent Goſpel-diſpenſation; which he introduces with prefixing a behold to each ſentence, in order to raiſe both attention to, and admiration at what is delivered: now is the accepted time; not that the Goſpel-diſpenſation is a milder diſpenſation of things, in which God will accept of an imperfect ſincere obedience to his law, in the room of a perfect one; or in which Chriſt is now offered to ſinners, and it is left to them whether they will accept of him or no: but it's ſo called, becauſe God and Chriſt now teſtify their good-will to the ſons of men, and are ready to accept of, and embrace poor ſenſible ſinners coming to them; and becauſe the Goſpel publiſhes ſalvation by Chriſt, which, as it is worthy of their acceptation, cannot but be acceptable to them: now is the day of ſalvation; now is ſalvation preached, as being done, already obtained by Chriſt for ſinners, the chief of ſinners; it is now brought home to their ſouls by the miniſtration of the Goſpel under the influence of the Spirit of God; now ſinners are convinced of their need of it, and that it can't be had elſewhere; now they are made to ſubmit to Chriſt, to be ſaved by him, and him alone, are encouraged to believe in him, and are by him actually poſſeſſed of it. Now is, and not yeſterday was, the day of ſalvation; and now, and that for ever, that is, as long as the Goſpel-diſpenſation continues; for it will be always now till all the elect of God are gathered in. This day of grace and ſalvation will never be over till that time comes: 'tis ſtill now is the day of ſalvation; tho' men may have long withſtood the miniſtration of the Goſpel, and notwithſtanding their manifold ſins and tranſgreſſions. There's no withſtanding the now of grace when it comes with the power of the Holy Ghoſt.

Ver. 3. Giving no offence in any thing, &c.] Theſe words are in connexion with ver. 1. and to be conſidered either as a continuation of the exhortation to others, that they would take care to give no offence to any; or rather as an account the Apoſtle gives of himſelf, and other miniſters, by way of example; and is as if he had ſaid, I Paul, Timotheus, Sylvanus, and other miniſters of the word, take all poſſible care to lay no ſtumbling-block in the way of the hearers of the Goſpel; to give no offence to them that are without, or to them that are within, to Jew or Gentile, or to the church of God, neither by word nor writing, by doctrine or converſation, or in any way whatever: that the miniſtry be not blamed; the miniſtry of the word of reconciliation, which they had received of the Lord Jeſus. The Apoſtle knew there were perſons enow who were waiting all opportunities, and taking all advantages to vilify and reproach the miniſtry of the Goſpel, and ſo hinder its progreſs and ſpread; and that if that was once brought into contempt by the diſagreeable conduct of the preachers of it, there would be but little hope of ſucceſs from it. Some copies read, our miniſtry; and ſo the Vulgate Latin and Syriac verſions; the Ethiopic verſion reads, your miniſtry.

Ver. 4. But in all things approving ourſelves, &c.] It is not ſufficient for a miniſter of the Goſpel to avoid every thing that might bring any blot or ſcandal on his miniſtry; but he ſhould in all things, and by all ways and means, proper, lawful, and laudable, approve, prove, and ſhew himſelf to be a true and faithful diſpenſer of the word. All in ſuch an office ought to make it appear, that they are ſuch by behaving and conducting as miniſters of God; as becomes ſuch, whom he has choſen, called and fitted for that ſervice; and particularly in, or by much patience; by a large, conſtant, and continued exerciſe of that grace; and by bearing patiently many things for the ſake of Chriſt, and his Goſpel, without murmuring at the hand of God, or being angry with men, and without fainting and ſinking in their own ſpirits: in afflictions; that is, in patiently bearing them. This word may be conſidered as a general word, including all ſorts of afflictions whatever, of which the following are particular ſpecies: in neceſſities; want of food, drink, and raiment, being hungry, thirſty, and naked, as the Apoſtles ſometimes were: in diſtreſſes; both of body and mind; being in ſuch ſtraits and difficulties they know not where to look, what courſe to ſteer, or which way to turn themſelves.

Ver. 5. In ſtripes, &c.] As the Apoſtle Paul particularly was, who was thrice beaten with rods, and five times ſcourged by the Jews with the ſcourge of forty ſtripes ſave one. In impriſonments; under which are included bonds, in which they often were for the Goſpel of Chriſt: in tumults; and uproars of the people, when their lives were frequently in imminent danger: or in toſſings to and fro; being drove from place to place thro' the fury of their enemies: in labours; in a laborious miniſtry of the word, and adminiſtration of ordinances; or by labouring with their own hands to ſupply their neceſſities: in watchings; being obliged to work night and day at their hand-labour, and in preaching, praying, and ſinging pſalms; which exerciſes they were often employed in at midnight: in faſtings; by which are meant not voluntary, but involuntary ones, thro' want of food to eat.

Ver. 6. By pureneſs, &c.] The Apoſtle having obſerved how he, and other miniſters of God, ſhewed themſelves to be ſuch by patiently bearing every thing that was afflictive and diſtreſſing to the outward man, proceeds to ſhow how they approved themſelves in other reſpects; and which more chiefly regard the inward man, the exerciſe of grace, and a ſpiritual behaviour: by pureneſs; of doctrine and converſation, chaſtity of body and mind, ſincerity of heart, and integrity of life: by knowledge; of the ſcriptures of truth, the myſteries of grace; or by a prudent conduct, a walking in wiſdom with caution and circumſpection: by long ſuffering; not eaſily provoked to wrath, but bearing with patience every indignity and affront: by kindneſs; gentleneſs, ſweetneſs of temper and manners, affability and courteouſneſs: by the Holy Ghoſt; influencing and aſſiſting in the exerciſe of every grace, and the diſcharge of every duty, or by the gifts of the Holy Ghoſt, ordinary and extraordinary: by love unfeigned; without diſſimulation, being not in word only, but in deed and in truth towards the brethren, and to all men.

Ver. 7. By the word of truth, &c.] By preaching the Goſpel, truly, ſincerely, without any adulteration of it, which comes from the God of truth, has for its ſubject-matter Chriſt, who is the truth, and into which miniſters are guided by the Spirit of truth, and every doctrine of which is truth: by the power of God; accompanying the word to the converſion and ſalvation of multitudes of ſouls; or by the ſigns, wonders, and miracles which were wrought for the confirmation of it: by the armour of righteouſneſs, on the right hand, and on the left: meaning, either the whole armour of God, with which a Chriſtian is all over clothed from head to foot, and in the ſtrength of Chriſt may engage any adverſary without fear; or elſe particularly the ſword of the Spirit in the right hand, and the ſhield of faith in the left, whereby both the offenſive and defenſive part may be acted; or, as others think, uprightneſs of conſcience, and holineſs of life and converſation; with which being bleſſed, though, on the one hand he meets with proſperity, and on the other hand with adverſity, he's not lifted up with the one, nor caſt down with the other; he's moved by neither, but paſſes on unconcerned.

Ver. 8. By honour and diſhonour, &c.] Some perſons think and ſpeak honourably of us, and behave in a reverent manner towards us; they wiſh us well, bid us God ſpeed, receive us into their houſes, and treat us with reſpect: others think meanly of us, ſpeak of us with the utmoſt contempt, and uſe us as if we were the filth of the world, and the offscouring of all things; ſo we paſs thro' the world; this is the treatment we meet with on the right hand and on the left; nor are we much affected with it: by evil report and good report; as it fares with our perſons, ſo with our doctrine: ſome ſpeak well of it, receive and embrace it; others blaſpheme it, and have it in the utmoſt abhorence; we are charged with the vileſt of crimes, and our doctrines loaded with the moſt abſurd and wicked conſequences, and both branded in the moſt infamous manner by one ſett of men; and by others both our perſons and principles are cleared and vindicated from all ſuch aſperſions, and are highly commended and applauded. As deceivers; for ſo they were accounted, as Chriſt was before them, by the unbelieving Jews, and by the falſe Apoſtles, as if they were the authors, or abettors, and ſpreaders of errors, and the inſtruments of leading people aſide. And yet true; true and faithful miniſters of the word; true to their Lord and Maſter; true to the truſt committed to them; true to the Goſpel of Chriſt, and to the ſouls of men.

Ver. 9. As unknown, and yet well known, &c.] Not unknown to Father, Son, and Spirit, or to one another, but to the world; and that not with reſpect to their outward eſtate, but their ſpiritual and eternal ſtate; as that they were the choſen of God, the children of God, and born again; they knew not what a life they lived, or what they lived upon; and as they were unacquainted with their inward troubles, they were ſtrangers to their ſpiritual joys here, and to what they ſhall partake of hereafter. Moreover, ſomething more may be intended in this word unknown; as that they were not owned, eſteemed, and approved of by them, but ſlighted, deſpiſed, hated, and perſecuted: and yet well known; to God the Father, who loved them with an everlaſting love, choſe them in Chriſt, gave them to him, made a covenant with him on their account, and ſent his Son to redeem them, which knowledge of them is ſpecial, eternal, affectionate, approbative, and attended with care of them; well known to Jeſus Chriſt, who knows all that are his, ſpecially, diſtinctly, perfectly, and that from everlaſting, bears a ſtrong affection for them, takes great care of them, indulges them with intimate communion with him, and openly owns and acknowledges them as his own; well known to the Spirit of God, who enlightened and quickened them, regenerated and ſanctified them, wrought faith, and every other grace in them, witneſſed their adoption to them, led them into all truth, filled and furniſhed them with his gifts, and dwelt in them, and abode with them, as the ſeal and earneſt of their future glory; and were well known to the ſaints, and one another: they loved each other, delighted in each other's company; they knew each other's experiences, joys, and ſorrows, and in ſome meaſure their hearts, and even their ſpiritual and eternal eſtate. As dying, and behold we live. They were as dying men, having the ſeeds of mortality in them, being ſubject to diſeaſes, which bring on death; and eſpecially as they carried about with them the dying of the Lord Jeſus, were continually expoſed to death, and in danger of it, lived in the views of it, had the ſentence of it in themſelves, and were appointed to it. And behold, to admiration we live; a natural life, which we have from God, depends upon him, and is preſerved by him amidſt a thouſand dangers and enemies to which it is expoſed; and we live a ſpiritual life, a life of grace from Chriſt, a life of faith on him, and communion with him. As chaſtened and not killed; chaſtened by men, and chaſtened by God; not in a way of vindictive wrath, but in a fatherly manner; but not killed, or put to a corporal death by our perſecutors, who have ſought to take away our lives, but have not yet been ſuffered to do it: or by the Lord, by the means of afflictions, the meſſengers of death; theſe ſometimes bring very near it, and God chaſtens by them, but does not as yet give over to death, becauſe our time is not yet come, and our work not yet done.

Ver. 10. As ſorrowful, yet always rejoicing, &c.] As to their outward appearance they are ſorrowful, and oftentimes really ſo on account of ſin, their own and others, by reaſon of afflictions, temporal and ſpiritual; and as to the ſtate and condition of the church of Chriſt, and the intereſt of religion: and yet always rejoicing; not in themſelves, or in any creature, but in the Lord, in the perſon, blood, and righteouſneſs of Chriſt, and ſalvation by him. As poor, yet making many rich. It is generally ſpeaking the lot of Chriſt's miniſters to be poor in this world; and there are ſome reaſons for it, why it is, and ſhould be ſo; as that they might be maintained by the people, which is the ordinance of God; that it might appear that Chriſt's kingdom is not of this world; that the faith of men might not ſtand in the riches of the world, but in the power of God; that miniſters might not be above their work, nor neglect it, nor drop it; and that they might not be enſnared and encumber'd with the things of life. And yet making many rich; are inſtruments in making many ſouls rich in things ſpiritual; by ſhewing them their ſpiritual poverty, ſtripping them of what they truſted in, and valued themſelves upon; directing them where true riches are, and furniſhing them with ſpiritual knowledge, with the knowledge of things more worth than thouſands of gold and ſilver. As having nothing, and yet poſſeſſing all things; for the Apoſtles left all for Chriſt, were ſent out bare by him; what they had they gave away, and were very deſtitute of worldly enjoyments: and yet poſſeſſing all things; they had food and raiment, with which they were content, what was ſufficient for them, and which they had in mercy, and with a bleſſing; and then they enjoyed all ſpiritual good things; they had not only a right unto them, but were poſſeſſed of them; they had all things pertaining to life and godlineſs; they had Chriſt, and all things with him, and therefore could ſay as Jacob did, that they had enough, yea, that they had all things.

Ver. 11. O ye Corinthians, &c.] The Apoſtle having exhorted the miniſters of the church at Corinth to take care of their miniſtry, that they fulfil it, and that it might appear that the Goſpel and gifts, fitting them to preach it, were not received in vain by them; all which he ſtrengthens and encourages by his own example, and that of others, addreſſes the members of the church in a very pathetic manner, ſaying, our mouth is open to you; to ſpeak our minds freely to you; we ſhall hide and conceal nothing from you, we ſhall deal with you with all plainneſs and faithfulneſs. This ſeems to refer unto, and pave the way for what he afterwards ſays about their unequal fellowſhip with unbelievers: our heart is enlarged; with love to you, and eager deſires after your good; and 'tis from the abundance of our hearts, and hearty affection for you, that our mouth is open ſo freely to communicate to you.

Ver. 12. Ye are not ſtraitned in us, &c.] The meaning of which is, either you are not brought into ſtraits and difficulties by us; we don't afflict and diſtreſs you, or fill you with anguiſh and trouble; but ye are ſtraitned in your own bowels; you are diſtreſſed by ſome among yourſelves, who ought not to be with you, with whom you ſhould have no fellowſhip and communion: or thus, you have room enough in our hearts, our hearts are ſo enlarged with love to you, that they are large enough to hold you all; an expreſſion, ſetting forth the exceeding great love, and ſtrong affection the Apoſtle bore to the Corinthians; when, on the other hand, they had but very little love to him comparatively; he had a heart to hold them all without being ſtraitened for room; and among all them they could ſcarce find room enough in their hearts and affections for him.

Ver. 13. Now for a recompence in the ſame, &c.] That your love to me may anſwer mine to you; that as you have my heart, I may have yours, and the ſame room in your heart, as you have in mine. The Vulgate Latin verſion reads, having the ſame recompence; and the Arabic verſion renders it, grant to me the ſame recompence; and the Syriac verſion, recompenſe to me my uſuries that are with you; that is, repay me with affection, let love be returned for love. I ſpeak as unto my children; which relation ſubſiſting between us requires mutual affection; for as a father ſhould love his children, ſo children ſhould love their father: be ye alſo enlarged; in your love to me, as I am to you; and then, as if he ſhould ſay, you will bear with, and take in good part the following exhortation and advice.

Ver. 14. Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers, &c.] This ſeems to be an alluſion to the law in Deut. xxii. 10. and to be a myſtical explanation of it; and is to be underſtood not as forbidding civil ſociety and converſe with unbelievers; for this is impracticable, then muſt believers needs go out of the world; this the many natural and civil relations ſubſiſting among men make abſolutely neceſſary; and in many caſes is both lawful and laudable, eſpecially when there is any opportunity or likelihood of doing them any ſervice in a ſpiritual way: nor is it to be underſtood as dehorting from entering into marriage-contracts with ſuch perſons; for ſuch marriages the Apoſtle, in his former Epiſtle, had allowed to be lawful, and what ought to be abode by; tho' believers would do well carefully to avoid ſuch an unequal yoke, ſince oftentimes they are hereby expoſed to many ſnares, temptations, diſtreſſes, and ſorrows, which generally more or leſs follow hereon: but there is nothing in the text or context that lead to ſuch an interpretation; rather, if any particular thing is referr'd to, it is to joining with unbelievers in acts of idolatry; ſince one of the Apoſtle's arguments to diſſuade from being unequally yoked with unbelievers is, what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? and from the foregoing Epiſtle it looks as if ſome in this church had joined with them in ſuch practices; ſee 1 Cor. x. 14, 20, 21, 22. But I rather think that theſe words are a diſſuaſive in general, from having any fellowſhip with unbelievers in any thing ſinful and criminal, whether in worſhip or in converſation: for what fellowſhip hath righteouſneſs with unrighteouſneſs? This, with what is ſaid in the following verſe, and in the beginning of the next to that, contain reaſons or arguments engaging believers to attend to the exhortation given not to keep company with unbelievers. By righteouſneſs is meant righteous perſons, who are made the righteouſneſs of God in Chriſt, to whom Chriſt is made righteouſneſs, or to whom the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is imputed for juſtification; and who alſo have principles of grace and holineſs in their hearts, or have the kingdom of God in them, which conſiſts of righteouſneſs, peace, and joy in the Holy Ghoſt; and who being made free from the dominion of ſin, are become ſervants of righteouſneſs: and by unrighteouſneſs is deſigned unrighteous perſons, who are deſtitute of a juſtifying righteouſneſs, are filled with all unrighteouſneſs, and are, as it were, a maſs and lump of iniquity; now, what fellowſhip can there be between perſons of ſuch diſtant characters? And what communion hath light with darkneſs? regenerate men are made light in the Lord; they are enlightened into their ſtate and condition by nature, to ſee the exceeding ſinfulneſs of ſin, to behold the glory, beauty, fulneſs, and ſuitableneſs of Chriſt, ſo as to be ſenſible of their need of him, and to be able to look unto him for life and ſalvation; they are enlightened more or leſs into the doctrines of the Goſpel, and the duties of religion; and their path is a ſhining light, ſhining more and more unto the perfect day. Unregenerate perſons are darkneſs itſelf; they are dark and ignorant of God in Chriſt, of the way of ſalvation by Chriſt, of the work of the Spirit of God upon the heart, and of the myſteries of grace; they know not themſelves, nor the ſad eſtate they are in; they are born, and brought up in darkneſs worſe than Egyptian darkneſs; they go on in it, and if grace prevent not, will be caſt into utter and eternal darkneſs. Now, what communion can there be between perſons ſo different one from another? for what is more ſo than light and darkneſs? theſe the God of nature has divided from each other; and they are in nature irreconcileable to one another, and ſo they are in grace.

Ver. 15. And what concord hath Chriſt with Belial? &c.] The word Belial is an Hebrew word, and is only uſed in this place in the New Teſtament, but often in the Old; this word is differently read and pronounced, ſome copies read it Beliar, and accordingly in the Ethiopic verſion it is Belhor, and by Jerom read [i] Belvir; but he obſerves, that it is more rightly called Belial: in ſome copies it is Belias, and ſo Tertullian [k] read it; and Jerom [l] ſays, that moſt corruptly read it Belias, for Belial: ſome derive it from בלי Beli, and עלה Alah, and ſignifies without aſcent; one in a very low condition, of low life, that never riſes up, and comes to any thing; to which Kimchi's etymology of the word ſeems to agree, who ſays [m], that Belial is a wicked man, בל יעלה ובל יצליח, who does not ſucceed, and does not proſper: others ſay it ſignifies [n] one that is, בלי עול, Beli Ol, without a yoke, without the yoke of the law; ſo Jarchi explains children of Belial, in Deut. xiii. 13. without yoke, who break off the yoke of God; and ſo ſay [o] the Talmudiſts, "children of Belial, are children that break off, "עול שמים, the yoke of heaven (i. e. the law) from "their necks;" lawleſs perſons, who are under no ſubjection to God or man: others [p] derive it from, יעל Jaal and בלי Beli, and ſo it ſignifies one that is unprofitable, does no good, and is good for nothing; and it is applied in ſcripture to any wicked perſon, or thing; it is commonly rendered by the Chaldee paraphraſt, a wicked man; and by Aquila and Suidas it is intepreted, an apoſtate, and ſo it is rendered here in the Arabic verſion; ſometimes the corruption of nature is called Belial by the Jews [q], than which nothing can be more contrary to Chriſt; it is alſo a name of the devil; by Heſychius, Beliar is interpreted a dragon, by which name the devil is ſometimes called; and here the Syriac verſion is, what concord hath Chriſt with ſatan? moſt interpreters by Belial underſtand the devil, who has caſt off the yoke of obedience to God, and is unprofitable, yea, noxious and hurtful to men; between whom and Chriſt there's no concord, but a perpetual enmity; and as there's no concord between Chriſt perſonal, and Belial the devil, ſo what can there be between Chriſt myſtical the church, which goes by the name of Chriſt, 1 Cor. xii. 12. and wicked men, the ſons of Belial; who have caſt away the law of the Lord, are not ſubject to the law of God, nor can they be, and are become unprofitable to themſelves and others: or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? ſuch have no part, and ſhall have no part or portion in one and the ſame thing; the believer's part and portion, are God, Chriſt, and an eternal inheritance; the unbeliever's part and portion, will be in the lake which burns with fire and brimſtone; and therefore what part, ſociety, or communion, can they have with one another?

Ver. 16. And what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? &c.] That is, what aſſociation, confederation, or covenant-agreement can the ſaints, who are the temple of God, have with idols, or their worſhippers? no more than the ark of the Lord had with Dagon, or Dagon with the ark; which when brought into his temple, and ſet by him, the idol fell down, and part of him was broke to pieces: for ye are the temple of the living God; ſome copies read we are, and ſo the Ethiopic verſion. The Corinthians, not only as particular believers, were the temples of God, both with reſpect to their ſouls and bodies; but they as a church of Chriſt incorporated together, were the temple of God; wherefore the Apoſtle does not ſay, ye are the temples, but the temple of the living God, in alluſion to the temple built by Solomon; and that in reſpect to him the builder of it, who was a type of Chriſt, the ſon of David, the prince of peace, the beloved of the Lord, who was to build the temple, the Goſpel church, and to bear the glory; and as Solomon's temple was built on an eminence, on mount Moriah, ſo the church is built upon a rock, higher than men, than angels, than the heavens, and out of the reach of men and devils, ſo as to hurt and deſtroy it. The matter of the temple at Jeruſalem, were timber of cedar, and coſtly ſtones, hewed, ſquared, and fitted for the building, before they were brought thither; ſo the proper materials of a Goſpel church, are ſuch as are born of incorruptible ſeed, and therefore comparable to cedars; and are lively ſtones, hewed, fitted, and ſquared by the Spirit and grace of God, and put and jointed in among the ſaints: Solomon's temple was a very ſtately magnificent building; it was overlaid within with pure gold, expreſſing the internal glory of Chriſt's church, which is all glorious within, having the Lord himſelf to be the glory in the midſt of her: the church of Chriſt may be compared to the temple alſo, for the firmneſs of its foundations and pillars; Chriſt is the foundation of his church, and that itſelf is the pillar and ground of truth: that temple was holy, being ſet apart for the worſhip and ſervice of God, as the church of Chriſt is ſanctified by the Spirit of God, and is built up a ſpiritual houſe, to offer the ſpiritual ſacrifices of prayer and praiſe to God: it is called the temple of God, becauſe it is of his building, and where he dwells; of the living God, becauſe he has life in himſelf, and gives both ſpiritual and eternal life to his people; and in oppoſition to the idols of the Gentiles, who have no life in them; are repreſentations of dead men, can't give life, nor any of the comforts of life to their votaries; and who by worſhipping them, expoſe themſelves to eternal death. The evidence of the ſaints, or church of Chriſt being the temple of the living God, is as follows, as God hath ſaid, Lev. xxvi. 11, 12, Ezek. xxxvii. 26, 27. I will dwell in them; not by his omnipreſence, ſo he dwells every where; nor by his omnipotence, ſo he dwells in, and with all his creatures, ſupporting them by the word of his power; but by his Spirit and grace, or by his ſpiritual and gracious preſence, which he favours his people with, in the uſe of ordinances, and where according to his promiſes they may expect it: and walk in them. This denotes the communion God is pleaſed to afford his church and people, and that gracious preſence of his with them, whilſt they are ſojourners here, and paſſing on to the heavenly glory; as God is ſaid to walk in a tent and tabernacle with the Iſraelites, whilſt they were travelling through the wilderneſs to Canaan; ſo he walks in his temple, and with his church and people, whilſt they are travelling home to the heavenly Canaan; he walks in them, as in his court and palace, or as in his garden, where he takes much pleaſure and delight, and great notice and care of them. R. Solomon Jarchi explains the phraſe in Lev. xxvi. 12. I will walk among you, thus; I will walk with you in the garden of Eden, or paradiſe, as one of you, and ye ſhall not be afraid of me: but the paſſage regards the preſence of God with his people here, and not hereafter: and I will be their God; not as the God of nature and providence only, but as the God of all grace; as their covenant God and Father in Chriſt; which is the greateſt happineſs that can be enjoyed: and they ſhall be my people; his ſpecial people, loved by him with a peculiar love, on whom he beſtows peculiar bleſſings; and who are made a willing people, willing to be his people by powerful grace, and are formed for himſelf, his ſervice, and glory: hence it follows,

Ver. 17. Wherefore come out from among them, &c.] Since they were the temple of the living God, built up an habitation for the moſt High; ſince he reſided among them, took his walks in the midſt of them, was their God, and they were his people. Theſe words are taken out of Iſa. lii. 11. where the ſeveral phraſes here uſed, may be obſerved. They ſeem to be directed to the Iſraelites, and particularly to the prieſts and Levites, who bore the veſſels of the Lord; and are fitly applied to believers under the Goſpel diſpenſation, who are by Chriſt made prieſts unto God. They are uſually interpreted by the Jewiſh writers, as a call to the Jews to come out of captivity, to quit Babylon and Perſia, and the ſeveral cities and countries where they were; and are applied in Rev. xviii. 4. to myſtical Babylon, the church of Rome, as a call to God's people, to leave the ſuperſtitions and idolatries of that church, leſt they be partakers of her plagues; and here, by the Apoſtle, as an exhortation to believers in general, to forſake the company and converſation of the men of the world: who may be ſaid to come out from among them at firſt converſion, when they are called to forſake their own people, and their father's houſe, to leave their native country, and ſeek an heavenly one; and when in conſequence of effectual calling grace, their converſations are different from what they were before, and from other Gentiles; when they diſlike their former companions, abhor their ſinful converſation, abſtain from it, keep out of it, as being infectious, hurtful, and detrimental to them; when they have no fellowſhip with the workers of iniquity, but reprove them both by words and deeds, which is their incumbent duty: the phraſe in Iſaiah is, go ye out from the midſt of her; which Kimchi interprets, out of the midſt of every city in which thou art; that is, in which idolaters lived; and well agrees with εκ μεσȣ αυτων here, out of the midſt of them: and be ye ſeparate, ſaith the Lord; this phraſe is not to be met with expreſly in our verſion of the above text in Iſaiah, but is ſignified by ſeveral expreſſions in it; the words rendered depart ye, depart ye, are by the Targum, or Chaldee paraphraſe on the place, expreſſed by, אתפרשו אתפרשו, be ye ſeparate, be ye ſeparate, which are the very words of the Apoſtle here; and the phraſe touch no unclean thing, is explained by R. Aben Ezra, שיבדלו מאומות העולם, that they might be ſeparate from the nations of the world; and another word הברו, be ye clean, ſignifies ſuch a purgation, as is made by ſeparation, by removing the clean from the unclean, by ſeparating the wheat from the chaff. The people of God are a ſeparate people in election, redemption, and effectual vocation, and ought to be ſo in their conduct and converſation; they ought to ſeparate themſelves from all ſuperſtition and will-worſhip in religious matters, and from the evil cuſtoms and manners of the world, though they are ſure to become a prey, and to expoſe themſelves to the contempt and rage of it: and touch not the unclean thing. The alluſion is to ſeveral laws under the former diſpenſation, which forbid touching many things which were accounted unclean, whereby pollution was contracted, and the perſons were obliged to a ceremonial cleanſing; ſee Levit. v. 2, 3. Numb. xix. 11, 16. It has no regard to touching, taſting, and eating any ſort of food, which was forbid as unclean by the ceremonial law; for the difference between meats clean and unclean, was now removed; but if any thing is particularly deſigned by the unclean thing, it ſeems to be idolatry; and to be a prohibition of joining with worſhippers of idols in their idolatrous practices, whereby a moral pollution is contracted; ſince in the beginning of the former verſe 'tis ſaid, what agreement hath the temple of God with idols? though it is rather intended in general, to forbid all communion and fellowſhip with unclean perſons and things, not to touch them, to come nigh them, or have any thing to do with them: and I will receive you; this and what follows in the next verſe, are ſaid to encourage believers to keep at a diſtance from wicked and immoral perſons, whoſe company and converſation are diſhonourable, enſnaring, and defiling. Theſe perſons had been already received into the love of God, his beſt and ſtrongeſt affections, from which there can be no ſeparation; and into the covenant of his grace, which as it cannot be removed, ſo neither could they be removed out of that; they were received into the church of Chriſt, and had a place and a name in it, better than that of ſons and daughters; and as they had been received by Chriſt, when they came to him as poor periſhing ſinners without him, ſo they were ſtill received graciouſly, notwithſtanding their many backſlidings; neither of theſe therefore is the ſenſe of this paſſage: but, that whereas by quitting ſociety with carnal men, they would expoſe themſelves to their reſentments; the Lord here promiſes, that he would take them under the wings of his protection; he would take care of them and preſerve them, keep them as the apple of his eye, and be a wall of fire round about them, whilſt in this world; and when he had guided them by his counſel here, would receive them to glory: this clauſe ſeems to be taken from the latter part of Iſa. lii. 12. which may be rendered, the God of Iſrael will gather you, i. e. to himſelf, and protect them.

Ver. 18. And will be a Father unto you, &c.] The ſame is promiſed to Solomon, 2 Sam. vii. 14. and ſaid of Iſrael, Jer. xxxi. 9. which is thought to be referred unto. This is not to be underſtood of the firſt commencement of this relation, as tho' God now began to be their Father; nor indeed of the firſt manifeſtation of it, which had been already made to their ſouls by the Spirit of adoption, witneſſing to their ſpirits that God was their Father, and they were his children; but of his acting, and continuing to act the part of a Father to them; which he does, by pitying his children, ſympathizing with them, and ſupporting them under all their trials and afflictions; by taking care of them, that they have food and raiment convenient for them; by laying up for them, as he has done in his covenant, in his Son, and in heaven; by communicating unto them, by paſſing by their offences and miſcarriages to him, and by correcting them for their good, and at laſt giving them the heavenly inheritance, and putting them into the poſſeſſion of it: and ye ſhall be my ſons and daughters. This alſo does not relate to the firſt act of adoption, when theſe perſons firſt became the ſons and daughters of God; for ſo they were by adopting grace, in the mind, counſel, and covenant of God, from eternity;

nity; as ſuch they were conſidered when given to Chriſt, when he aſſumed their nature, and died to gather them together in one; and as antecedent to faith and the work of the Spirit upon their ſouls: nor even of the firſt diſcovery of this grace unto them; but the meaning is, that whereas they were the ſons and daughters of God, they ſhould be treated as ſuch; whenever he ſpoke to them, or dealt with them in providence, he would ſpeak to them and deal with them as children; or it may refer to the more full and open manifeſtation of their ſonſhip, before angels and men, at the appearance of Chriſt: to all which is added, ſaith the Lord almighty; for confirmation ſake, and to encourage the faith of the ſaints; ſince he who ſaid all this, is the Lord God almighty, and ſo able to perform it; and of which and his willingneſs, no queſtion is to be made, ſince he has ſaid it.

CHAP. VII.

THIS chapter begins with an inference deduced, from what is ſaid in the latter part of the foregoing chapter, engaging to holineſs of heart and life, in oppoſition to filthineſs of fleſh and ſpirit, ver. 1. and the Apoſtle in order to prevail upon the Corinthians kindly to receive his exhortations, obſerves his own conduct, and that of his fellow-miniſters towards them; as that they had done them no injury by the advice they had given them, nor had they corrupted them by unſound doctrine, or had coveted their worldly ſubſtance, ver. 2. not that by ſo ſaying he would inſinuate, as if they had been guilty of injury, corruption, and covetouſneſs; it was far from his thoughts to ſuggeſt any thing of that kind concerning them, for whom he had ſo great an affection, as never to ſeparate from them, but living and dying to continue the ſame regards unto them, ver. 3. and which he expreſſes, and had ſhown every where, by the freedom of ſpeech he had uſed concerning them, and his boaſting of them, and the joy and comfort he had in the midſt of his troubles, by the good news he had received of them, ver. 4. which he had in the following manner; for though when in Macedonia he had no reſt, partly through outward troubles, and partly through inward fears, ver. 5. yet meeting with Titus who had been with them, and had brought an account of their ſtate, it was a means God made uſe of for the comfort of him, ver. 6. and it was not merely the ſight of Titus that yielded him this conſolation, but the comfortable reception he had met with at Corinth; and alſo the good effect the Apoſtle's letter written to them had upon them, as related by Titus; what a deſire they had to ſee him, what grief that they ſhould ſin, and by it diſtreſs him, and what a fervent affection they had for him, ver. 7. for which reaſon he did not repent of the letter he ſent them, though it did produce ſorrow in them, ſince that was of the right kind, and was but for a time, ver. 8. yea, he was ſo far from it, that he was glad, not merely on account of their ſorrow, but becauſe their ſorrow was a godly one, and iſſued in repentance; and ſo they were no loſers, but gainers by the epiſtle, it producing ſuch good effects, ver. 9. which leads him to diſtinguiſh between a true right godly ſorrow, and a worldly one, and that by their conſequents; repentance and ſalvation following upon the one, and death upon the other, ver. 10. the fruits and evidences of which godly and true repentance, he makes mention of in ſeven particulars, by which it appeared that their ſorrow and repentance were ſincere and genuine, ver. 11. when the Apoſtle proceeds to obſerve to them, the end he had in view in writing to them, upon the account of the inceſtuous perſon, in which he had uſed great plainneſs and faithfulneſs; and this was not merely on account of him that offended, nor only on account of the perſon injured by him, but chiefly to teſtify his care of, and concern for their welfare, as a church of Chriſt, ver. 12. and inaſmuch as though they had been grieved, yet were now comforted, it added to the conſolation of the Apoſtle and his companions, and the more delighted they were, when they underſtood what a reception Titus had among them, what reverence he was had in, what reſpect was ſhewn him, and care was taken of him, ver. 13. and the rather, ſeeing the Apoſtle had boaſted of the liberality, generoſity, and affectionate regard of the Corinthians to the miniſters of the Goſpel, Titus found it to be all true what he had ſaid; ſo that he had no reaſon to be aſhamed, as he muſt have been, had they behaved otherwiſe, ver. 14. and ſtill it gave him further pleaſure, that by their behaviour to Titus, they had gained his heart, and increaſed his affection towards them; which he could not but expreſs, whenever he called to mind, or made mention of the great reſpect, veneration, and obedience, they yielded to him, ver. 15. and indeed it was not only in this inſtance, but in all others, the Apoſtle had confidence concerning them, which heightened his joy and pleaſure in them, ver. 16.

Ver. 1. Having therefore theſe promiſes, &c.] That God will walk in his temple, and dwell in his churches, be their God, and they his people, that he will receive them, and be their Father, and they his ſons and daughters; which promiſes they had not in hope, as Old Teſtament ſaints had the promiſes of the Meſſiah and his kingdom, and as New Teſtament ſaints have of the reſurrection, the new heavens and new earth, and of appearing with Chriſt in glory; but in hand, in actual poſſeſſion; for God was really become their God and Father, and they were his people and children; they had had communion with him, and were received, protected, and preſerved by him; which promiſes and bleſſings of grace, and which are abſolute and unconditional, the Apoſtle makes uſe of to engage them to purity and holineſs; and is a clear proof, that the doctrine of an abſolute and unconditional covenant of grace, has no tendency to licentiouſneſs, but the contrary: and that his following exhortation might be attended to, and chearfully received, he uſes a very affectionate appellation, dearly beloved; ſo they were of God, being his people, his ſons and daughters, adopted, juſtified, called, and choſen by him; and ſo they were by the Apoſtle and his fellow miniſters, who, as he ſays in a following verſe, were in their hearts to die and live with them; ſome copies read brethren, and ſo the Ethiopic verſion. The exhortation, he urges them to, and that it might be the better received, joins himſelf with them in it, is, let us cleanſe ourſelves from all filthineſs of the fleſh and ſpirit; by the filthineſs of the fleſh is meant, external pollution, defilement by outward actions, actions committed in the body, whereby the man is defiled; ſuch as all impure words, filthineſs, and fooliſh talking, all rotten and corrupt communication, which defile a man's own body; as the tongue, a little member, when ſo uſed does, and corrupts the good manners of others; all filthy actions, as idolatry, adultery, fornication, inceſt, ſodomy, murder, drunkenneſs, revellings, &c. and every thing that makes up a filthy converſation, which is to be hated, abhorred, and abſtained from by the ſaints: by filthineſs of the ſpirit is meant, internal pollution, defilement by the internal acts of the mind, ſuch as evil thoughts, luſts, pride, malice, envy, covetouſneſs, and the like: ſuch a diſtinction of, טומאת הגוף, the filthineſs of the body, and טומאת הנפש, the filthineſs of the ſoul, is to be met with among the Jews; who ſay [r], that when a man has taken care to avoid the former, it is fit he ſhould take care of the latter; they alſo call the evil imagination, or corruption of nature, the filth of the body [s]. Now when the Apoſtle ſays, let us cleanſe ourſelves, this does not ſuppoſe that men have a power to cleanſe themſelves from the pollution of their nature, or the defilement of their actions; for this is God's work alone, as appears from his promiſes to cleanſe his people from their ſins; from the end of Chriſt's ſhedding his blood, and the efficacy of it; from the ſanctifying influences of the Spirit; and from the prayers of the ſaints to God, to create in them clean hearts, to waſh them thoroughly from their iniquity, and cleanſe them from their ſin: beſides, the Apoſtle is not here ſpeaking either of the juſtification of theſe perſons, in which ſenſe they were already cleanſed, and that thoroughly, from all their ſins and iniquities; nor of the inward work of ſanctification, in reſpect of which they were ſprinkled with clean water, and were waſhed in the laver of regeneration; but what the Apoſtle reſpects, is the exerciſe of both internal and external religion, which lies in purity of heart and converſation, the one not being acceptable to God without the other; he is ſpeaking of, and exhorting to the ſame thing, as in the latter part of the preceding chapter; and ſuggeſts, that it becomes thoſe who have received ſuch gracious promiſes, to be ſeparate from ſin and ſinners, to abſtain from all appearance of ſin, and to have no fellowſhip with ſinners; to lay apart all filthineſs, and ſuperfluity of naughtineſs, and under a ſenſe of either external or internal pollution, to have recourſe to the fountain opened; to deal by faith with the blood of Chriſt, which cleanſes from all ſin, of heart, lip, and life; and which is the only effectual method a believer can make uſe of, to cleanſe himſelf from ſin; namely, by waſhing his garments, and making them white in the blood of the Lamb: perfecting holineſs in the fear of God; by holineſs is not meant, the work of ſanctification upon the heart, for that is wholly the work of the Spirit of God, and not of man; he begins it, carries it on, and perfects it of himſelf; but holineſs of life and converſation is here deſigned, which in converſion the people of God are called unto, and which highly becomes them: and this they are to be perfecting; not that a believer is able to live a life of holineſs, without ſin being in him, or committed by him; this is impoſſible and impracticable in the preſent life; but the ſenſe of the word επιτελȣντες is, that he is to be carrying on a courſe of righteouſneſs and holineſs to the end; to the end of his life, he is to perſevere as in faith, ſo in holineſs; as he is to go on believing in Chriſt, ſo he is to go on to live ſoberly, righteouſly, and godly, to the end of his days; which requires divine power to preſerve him from ſin, and keep him from falling; and the grace of God, the ſtrength of Chriſt, and the aſſiſtance of the Spirit, to enable him to perform acts of holineſs, and the ſeveral duties of religion, and to continue in well doing: all which is to be done, in the fear of God; not in a ſervile ſlaviſh fear, a fear of hell and damnation, but in a filial fear, a reverential affection for God, an humble truſt in him, and dependance on him, for grace and ſtrength; it is that fear which has God for its author, is a bleſſing of the new covenant, is implanted in regeneration, and is increaſed by diſcoveries of pardoning grace; and it has God for its object, not his wrath and vindictive juſtice, but his goodneſs, grace, and mercy. This ſhews from what principle, and upon what views believers act in a courſe of righteouſneſs and holineſs; not from the fear of hell, nor from the fear of men, or with a view to gain their applauſe, but as in the ſight of God, from a reverential affection to him, a childlike fear of him, and with a view to his glory.

Ver. 2. Receive us, &c.] Into your affections, let us have a place in your hearts, as you have in ours: Goſpel miniſters ought to be received with love and reſpect, both into the hearts and houſes of the ſaints; for he that receiveth you, ſays Chriſt, receiveth me, Matt. x. 40. Their doctrines are to be received in the love of them, and with faith and meekneſs; and this may be another part of the Apoſtle's meaning here; receive the word and miniſtry of reconciliation, which we as the ambaſſadors of Chriſt bring, and the ſeveral exhortations we give in his name, particularly the laſt mentioned: next follow reaſons, or arguments, engaging them to comply with this requeſt, we have wronged no man; we have done no man any injury in his perſon, eſtate, or name. There is one among you that has done wrong, and another among you that has ſuffered wrong, ver. 12. and we have given very faithful advice to the church, how to behave in this affair; but in ſo doing, we have neither wronged him nor you; and as not in this, ſo neither in any other caſe: if I or my fellow Apoſtles have wronged you in any thing, it is in not being burdenſome to you for our maintenance, forgive me this wrong, ch. xii. 13. for in no other reſpect have we done you any: ſome underſtand this of any lordly power, or tyrannical domination they had exerciſed over them, denied by the Apoſtle; we have not behaved in an inſolent manner towards you, we have not lorded it over God's heritage, or claimed any dominion over your faith, or required any unreaſonable obedience and ſubmiſſion from you: we have corrupted no man; neither by our doctrines and principles, which are perfectly agreeable to the word of God, make for the good of ſouls, and tend to the glory of Chriſt; nor by our example, but have been careful to lead ſuch lives and converſations, as are becoming the Goſpel of Chriſt, adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, and are patterns to them that believe; nor have we corrupted by flatteries, or with bribes, any of the leading men among you, in order to gain their good-will, and thereby reſpect and credit among others: we have defrauded no man, or coveted no man; no man's ſilver, gold, or apparel; we have not ſought yours, but you; not to amaſs wealth to ourſelves, but that we might be uſeful to your ſouls, for your ſpiritual good, and ſerviceable to the glory of Chriſt; we have not through covetouſneſs made merchandize of you, with feigned words, as the falſe Apoſtles have done, therefore receive us.

[s] Zohar in Lev. fol. 43. 2.

Ver. 3. I ſpeak not this to condemn you, &c.] Referring either to the exhortations before given, to have no ſinful converſation with unbelievers, and to cleanſe themſelves from all impurity, external, and internal; and to go on in a courſe of holineſs, in the fear of God, to the end of life; or to the account juſt given of himſelf and fellow miniſters; and his ſenſe is this, the exhortations I have given, muſt not be ſo underſtood, as though I charged and accuſed you with keeping company with unbelievers, or as though you were not concerned for purity of life and converſation; or when I remove the above-mentioned things from myſelf and others, I mean not to lay them upon you, as if I thought that you had wronged, corrupted, or defrauded any; when I clear myſelf and others, I do not deſign to accuſe or condemn you; my view is only to the falſe Apoſtles, who have done theſe things, when we have not, and therefore we have the beſt claim to your affections: for I have ſaid before, you are in our hearts; you are inſcribed on our hearts, engraven there, ye are our epiſtle written in our hearts, ch. iii. 2. ye are not ſtraitened in us, ch. vi. 12. you have a place and room enough in our affections, which are ſtrong towards you, inſomuch that it is our deſire and reſolution, to die and live with you; or together: neither death nor life ſhall ſeparate our love, or deſtroy our friendſhip; there's nothing we more deſire, than to live with you; and ſhould there be any occaſion for it, could freely die with you, and for you.

Ver. 4. Great is my boldneſs of ſpeech towards you, &c.] Or liberty of ſpeaking, which I uſe with you; I very freely and without any diſguiſe, open my mind to you; I faithfully tell you your faults; I am free in my exhortations and counſels to you, as in the caſe of the inceſtuous perſon, and in other inſtances, which is a ſign of true friendſhip; for had I any ſuſpicion of you, or not cordial affection for you, I ſhould have been more reſerved, more upon my guard, and have ſpoke and wrote with more caution: beſides, great is my glorying, or boaſting of you; of your faith in Chriſt, your love to the people of God, reſpect to the miniſters of the Goſpel, obedience to us, and very great liberality to the poor ſaints, of which the Apoſtle frequently boaſts in this epiſtle: now as ſpeaking freely to them when preſent with them, or in writing to them, ſo glorying in them, and ſpeaking well of them when abſent, clearly ſhewed what an opinion he had of them, and what true hearty reſpect he had for them: I am filled with comfort, ſays he; not only with divine and ſpiritual conſolations from God, but with the news Titus brought of the ſtate of this church, of the good effect the Apoſtle's reproof and advice had both upon them, and the offender among them, and of their tender and affectionate regard to him: this filled him brimful of comfort, yea, adds he, I am exceeding joyful; I abound, I over abound in joy; ſuch is the joy that poſſeſſes my ſoul, at the tidings brought me, that it ſuperabounds all the ſorrow and anguiſh of ſpirit, out of which I wrote unto you, occaſioned by the unhappy affair among you: yea, it makes me inexpreſſibly joyful in all our tribulation; which is not ſmall we meet with, wherever we go, in preaching the Goſpel of Chriſt.

Ver. 5. For when we were come into Macedonia, &c.] Whither Paul went in queſt of Titus, not finding him at Troas, ch. ii. 12, 13. and where he met with him, and had the agreeable account from him, of the ſtate of this church; but here, as elſewhere, they had their troubles: our fleſh had no reſt; that is, their outward man, their bodies; they were continually fatigued with preaching, diſputing, fighting; what with falſe teachers, and violent perſecutors, they had no reſt in their bodies; though in their ſouls, they had divine ſupport and ſpiritual conſolation; and it was no ſmall addition to their joy, to hear of the flouriſhing condition of this church: but were troubled on every ſide; from every quarter, by all ſorts of enemies; ſee ch. iv. 8. Without were fightings, within were fears; there ſeems to be an alluſion to Deut. xxxii. 25. They had continual combats with falſe teachers, and furious perſecutors, without the church, or in the world, or in their bodies; and within the church, or in themſelves, in their own minds, had many fears, leſt any ſhould be diſcouraged by the violence of perſecutions, or be drawn aſide by the doctrines of the falſe Apoſtles: and as it was with the Apoſtles in theſe reſpects, ſo it is with private believers: without are fightings; their outward converſation in this life, is a warfare; partly with falſe teachers, with whom they fight the good fight of faith, contend for the doctrine of faith, uſing the ſpiritual weapons of the ſcriptures of truth; and partly with the men of the world, to whoſe rage and contempt they are expoſed, and among whom they endure a great fight of afflictions, with patience, and in the exerciſe of faith, whereby they gain the victory over the world; and partly with ſatan, their avowed adverſary, and implacable enemy, againſt whom they wreſtle in the ſtrength of Chriſt, making uſe of the whole armour of God provided for them, by the help of which, through divine grace, they come off more than conquerors; and partly with the luſts and corruptions, or open prevailing iniquities which are in the world, to which they oppoſe themſelves, and by the power of God keeping them, are preſerved from: not that their only fightings are thus without; for there is as it were, a company of two armies within them, ſin and grace, fleſh and ſpirit, oppoſing each other: and hence, as well as from other cauſes, are fears within; about their intereſt in everlaſting love, electing grace, and the covenant of grace; about the preſence of God with them, and the truth of grace in them; about their intereſt in Chriſt, their ſonſhip, their final perſeverance, and enjoyment of the heavenly glory: and though theſe fears are not their excellencies, but their infirmities, yet this will be more or leſs their caſe, till that ſtate takes place, when there will be no more fightings, no more fears.

Ver. 6. Nevertheleſs, God that comforteth thoſe that are caſt down, &c.] Or humble ones; ſuch as are humbled under the afflicting hand of God, and have low and mean apprehenſions of themſelves; theſe God looks unto, dwells with, revives their hearts, chears their drooping ſpirits, and fills them with comforts; he has been uſed to do ſo with ſuch perſons; he has promiſed comfort to them; they may expect it, and the Apoſtle experienced it; and which he refers to God as the author of it, as he had done in the beginning of this epiſtle, calling him the God of all comfort; he was the efficient cauſe, the means by which it was effected, was the coming of Titus: comforted us by the coming of Titus; to whom the Apoſtle bore a very great affection, he being his ſon in a ſpiritual ſenſe, a companion with him in his travels, and of great uſefulneſs and ſervice in the miniſtration of the Goſpel; ſo that the very ſight of him gave him pleaſure; and the more, inaſmuch as he had for ſome time longed to ſee him, that he might have ſome account from him of the affairs of this church.

Ver. 7. And not by his coming only, &c.] It was not barely by his coming, that he and his fellow-miniſters were ſo much comforted: but by the conſolation wherewith he was comforted in you. The church at Corinth received Titus with all reſpect and reverence; treated him in the moſt kind and tender manner; ſatisfied him in the affair of the inceſtuous perſon; greatly refreſhed his ſpirits with an account of their faith in Chriſt, experience of the grace of God, and their regard and cloſe attachment to the honour of religion, and the intereſt of the Redeemer; many comfortable opportunities had he with them, in preaching among them, and converſing with them; and the account of this added to the Apoſtle's conſolation; for the joys and comforts of one believer, yield a conſiderable pleaſure, and are matter of joy and comfort to another: when he told us your earneſt deſire; that is, of ſeeing the Apoſtle, of ſatisfying him in the thing he had complained of, and of reformation in their conduct, and the diſcipline of Chriſt's houſe for the future: your mourning; for the evil that had been committed among them; the diſhonour it had brought upon the doctrine and ways of Chriſt; their remiſsneſs, careleſsneſs, and neglect in diſcharging their duty; and the grief and ſorrow occaſioned hereby to the Apoſtle: your fervent mind toward me; in vindicating him, his character, doctrine, and conduct, againſt the falſe Apoſtles, and others: ſo that I rejoiced the more; his joy on this narrative of things, abundantly exceeded his troubles and afflictions, which ſurrounded him on every ſide, and overcame and extinguiſhed that ſorrow, which had poſſeſſed him on their account; and greatly added to the joy he felt, by the coming of Titus, and the conſolation that he had met with at Corinth.

Ver. 8. For though I made you ſorry with a letter, &c.] His former epiſtle, relating to the inceſtuous perſon: I do not repent, though I did repent; not of writing the letter, which was wrote by divine inſpiration; but of the ſorrow occaſioned by it, though now he did not repent of that: for I perceive that the ſame epiſtle made you ſorry, though it were but for a ſeaſon; inaſmuch as the ſorrow was true, hearty, and genuine, though it was but for a time, the Apoſtle was entirely ſatisfied, and the more pleaſed, becauſe of its brevity, ſince it was ſincere.

Ver. 9. Now I rejoice, not that ye were made ſorry, &c.] Their grief and ſorrow as a natural paſſion, was no matter or cauſe of joy to him; nor was this what he ſought after, being what he could take no real pleaſure in; for ſo far as that was a pain to them, it was a pain to him: but that ye ſorrowed to repentance; their ſorrow iſſued in true evangelical repentance, and this was the ground of his rejoicing; for as there is joy in heaven among the angels, at the repentance of a ſinner, ſo there is joy in the church below, among the ſaints and miniſters of the Goſpel, when either ſinners are brought in, or backſliders returned by repentance: for ye were made ſorry after a godly ſort; what gave him ſo much joy and ſatisfaction was, that their ſorrow was of the right ſort; it was a godly ſorrow, they ſorrowed after; or according to God, according to the will of God, and for ſin, as it was committed againſt him; it was a ſorrow that God wrought in them: that ye might receive damage by us in nothing; what added to his pleaſure was, that his writing to them, and the effect it produced, had not been in the leaſt detrimental to them; things had worked ſo kindly, and this ſorrow had wrought in ſuch a manner, that they were not hurt in their ſouls, but profited; nor in their church-ſtate, they had not loſt one member by it; nay, the offender himſelf, which was the occaſion of all this trouble, was recovered and reſtored by theſe means.

Ver. 10. For godly ſorrow worketh repentance unto ſalvation, &c.] Theſe words contain a reaſon, proving that they had received no damage, but profit by the ſorrow that had poſſeſſed them, from the nature of it, a godly ſorrow; a ſorrow which had God for its author; it did not ariſe from the power of free-will, nor from the dictates of a natural conſcience, nor from a work of the law on their hearts, or from a fear of hell and damnation, but it ſprung from the free grace of God; it was a gift of his grace, the work of his Spirit, and the produce of his almighty power; being ſuch, which no means, as judgments, mercies, or the moſt powerful miniſtry of themſelves could effect; it was owing to divine inſtructions; it was heightened and increaſed with a diſcovery of the love of God, and views of pardoning grace and mercy, being attended with faith in the Lord Jeſus Chriſt: it had God alſo for its object, as well as its author; it was a ſorrow, דמטל אלהא, which is for God, as the Syriac verſion reads the words, and alſo the Ethiopic; on the account of God, his honour, intereſt, and glory; it was a ſorrow for ſin, becauſe it was committed againſt a God of infinite holineſs, juſtice, and truth, goodneſs, grace, and mercy; and it was a ſorrow, κατα Θεον, according to God, according to the mind and will of God; it was, as it is rendered by the Arabic verſion, grateful to God; what he took notice of, obſerved, and approved of; and was alſo ſuch a ſorrow, as bore ſome reſemblance to what in God goes by the name of grieving and repenting, as that he had made man, becauſe of ſin; there being in it a diſplicency with ſin, an hatred of it, and a repentance that ever it was committed: moreover, this ſorrow is further deſcribed, from its ſalutary operation, it worketh repentance; it is the beginning of it, a part of it, an eſſential part of it, without which there is no true repentance; this produces it, iſſues in it, even in an ingenuous confeſſion of ſin, a forſaking of it, and in bringing forth fruits meet for repentance, in the life and converſation: and this repentance is unto ſalvation; not the cauſe or author of it, for that is Chriſt alone; nor the condition of it, but is itſelf a bleſſing of ſalvation, a part of it, the initial part of it, by which and faith, we enter upon the poſſeſſion of ſalvation; it is an evidence of intereſt in it, and iſſues in the full enjoyment of it: and this, or repentance, is ſuch as is not to be repented of; or that is ſtable and immoveable, as the Vulgate Latin verſion renders it; which never returns, or goes back, as the Syriac verſion, but remains the ſame unrepented of; for to either of them may it be applied: ſalvation is not to be repented of; it is not repented of by God, who repents not, neither of the thing itſelf, nor of the way and manner in which it is effected, nor of the perſons ſaved by it, and his choice of them to it; nor is it repented of by them, who believe in Chriſt to the ſaving of their ſouls: nor is true repentance, which is connected with it, to be repented of; God does not repent of giving it, for his gifts and calling are without repentance; nor does the repenting ſinner repent of it; nor has he any occaſion, ſince it is unto life, even unto eternal life, as the Ethiopic verſion here renders it; and as it is called repentance unto life, in Acts xi. 18. This ſorrow is likewiſe wiſe illuſtrated by its contrary, but the ſorrow of the world worketh death; a worldly ſorrow is ſuch, as is common to men of the world, as Cain, Pharaoh, Judas, and others; it ſprings from worldly ſelfiſh principles, and proceeds on worldly views; it is often nothing more than a concern for the loſs of worldly things, as riches, honours, &c. or for a diſappointment in the gratification of worldly luſts and pleaſures: and this worketh death; temporal and eternal death; it ſometimes brings diſeaſes and diſorders on the body, which iſſue in death; and ſometimes puts men upon deſtroying themſelves, as it did Ahitophel and Judas; it works in the minds of men a fearful apprehenſion of eternal death, and if grace prevent not, iſſues in it.

Ver. 11. For behold, this ſelf-ſame thing, that ye ſorrowed after a godly ſort, &c.] The Apoſtle proceeds to deſcribe godly ſorrow by its effects, which are ſo many evidences of the ſincerity and genuineneſs of it; ſome of the things mentioned are peculiar to the caſe of the Corinthians, and others common to evangelical repentance in any: what carefulneſs it wrought in you; to remove the inceſtuous perſon from communion with them, which they were very negligent of before; to ſin no more after this ſort; to keep up for the future, a more ſtrict and regular diſcipline in the church; to perform good works in general, and not to offend God: yea, what clearing of yourſelves; not by denying the fact, or leſſening, or defending it; but by acknowledging their neglect, praying it might be overlooked, declaring that they were not partakers of the ſin; nor did they approve of it, but diſliked and abhorred it, and were highly pleaſed with the method the Apoſtle adviſed to: yea, what indignation; not againſt the perſon of the offender, but againſt his ſin; and not his only, but their own too, in not appearing againſt him, and taking notice of him ſooner; and particularly that they ſhould act in ſuch a manner, as to deſerve the juſt rebuke of the Apoſtle: yea, what fear; not of hell and damnation, as in wicked men and devils, who repent not; but of God, and of grieving his miniſters; and leſt the corruption ſhould ſpread in the church, as the Apoſtle had ſuggeſted, a little leaven leavens the whole lump: yea, what vehement deſire; of ſeeing the Apoſtle; of giving him full ſatisfaction; of behaving in quite another manner for the time to come; and to be kept from evil, and to honour God by a becoming converſation: yea, what zeal; for God and his glory; for reſtoring the diſcipline of the church; for the doctrines of the Goſpel; for the ordinances of Chriſt's houſe; for the ſupporting the character of the Apoſtle, and other miniſters of the word, againſt the falſe Apoſtles: yea, what revenge; not of perſons in a private way, vengeance belongs to God; but of all diſobedience, particularly that of the unhappy criminal among them, which was ſhewn in the puniſhment inflicted on him by many: in all things ye have approved yourſelves to be clear in this matter; of the inceſtuous perſon: it appeared plainly that they did not conſent to, and approve of his ſin; and tho' at firſt they were unconcerned about it, did not mourn over it as they ought, nor make ſuch haſte to deal with the offender as they ſhould, yet having diſcovered true repentance for their ſloth, negligence, and indulgence, they are acquitted, and ſtand in the Apoſtle's view of them, as if they had not offended.

Ver. 12. Wherefore, tho' I wrote unto you, &c.] Meaning in his former epiſtle, with ſo much ſharpneſs and ſeverity, and as may have been thought too much: I did it not for his cauſe that had done the wrong; not for the ſake of the inceſtuous perſon only and chiefly, not merely for his correction and reſtoration; tho' theſe things were intended, and earneſtly deſired by the Apoſtle: nor for his cauſe that ſuffered wrong; that is, the father of the inceſtuous perſon, who had been injured by this wicked action; it was not only or merely out of favour and reſpect to him, and that ſome compenſation ſhould be made to him in a church way; by deteſting the crime, caſting out the offender, and declaring themſelves on the ſide of the injured perſon, and againſt him that had done the injury: but that our care for you in the ſight of God, might appear unto you; ſome copies, and the Complutenſian edition, and the Syriac, Arabic, and Ethiopic verſions read, that your care for us, &c. and then the ſenſe is, that you might have an opportunity of ſhewing your affection for us, your regard to us, how readily you obey us in all things; but the other reading is to be preferred, the meaning of which is, that the Apoſtle in writing did not ſo much conſult and regard the private good of any particular perſon, either the injurer or the injured, tho' theſe were not out of his view; but he wrote in the manner he did chiefly, that it might be manifeſt what a concern he had for the good and welfare of the whole church; leſt that ſhould be corrupted, and receive any damage from ſuch a notorious delinquent, being tolerated or connived at among them; and that it was ſuch a care and concern, as was real, hearty and ſincere, was well known to God, and for the truth of which, he could appeal to him.

Ver. 13. Therefore we were comforted in your comfort, &c.] In the comfortable ſituation the church was in; not in their grief and ſorrow, as a natural paſſion, but in the effects of it as a godly ſorrow; by which it appeared that their repentance was genuine, and that they were clear in the matter that had given ſo much trouble; and that things had ſo well ſucceeded for the welfare and more comfortable eſtate of the church for the future. The comfortable eſtate, flouriſhing condition, and well being of churches yield great pleaſure and conſolation to the miniſters of the Goſpel: the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions read, our comfort: yea, and exceedingly the more joyed we, for the joy of Titus; not only the repentance of the Corinthians, and the bleſſed effects of that, occaſioned joy in the Apoſtle; but what added to it, and increaſed it the more abundantly, was the joy of Titus, which he had been a partaker of during his ſtay with them: becauſe his ſpirit was refreſhed by you all; not by one only, or a few, but by all the members of the church; he was received by them with great reſpect, provided for in a liberal manner, treated with all humanity and courteouſneſs; and above all his mind was eaſed and filled with an unexpected pleaſure, to find them in ſuch an agreeable frame of mind; ſo ſenſible of their neglect of duty, ſo ready to reform, ſo united in themſelves, ſo affected to the Apoſtle, and ſo determined to abide by the order, ordinances, and truths of the Goſpel againſt all falſe teachers.

Ver. 14. For if I have boaſted any thing to him of you, &c.] As of their faith in Chriſt, of their liberality to the ſaints, their affection for him, and obedience to him as children to a father: I am not aſhamed; ſince theſe all appeared to be true; as he muſt have been had they been otherwiſe: but as we ſpake all things to you in truth; that is, our preaching among you was true; all the doctrines we delivered to you were truth; our word was not yea and nay, but uniform, and all of a piece: even ſo our boaſting which I made before Titus, is found a truth; ſome underſtand this of the boaſting which the Apoſtle made concerning Titus, in his epiſtle to them, highly commending him, and which they found to be in all things exactly true; but the words rather deſign his boaſting of the Corinthians unto Titus, which was found to be true by him.

Ver. 15. And his inward affection is more abundant toward you, &c.] Or his bowels; denoting the tenderneſs of his heart, the ſtrength of his affections, which inwardly and to a very great degree moved towards them; eſpecially whilſt he remembereth the obedience of you all; to him, and to me by him; to the advice and orders given, which were ſo readily, chearfully, and univerſally complied with; and how with fear and trembling you received him; that is, with great humility and reſpect, with much deference to him: conſidering his character as a miniſter of the Goſpel, and as one ſent by the Apoſtle to them, they embraced him with great marks of honour and eſteem; for this is not to be underſtood of any inward ſlaviſh fear or dread of mind, or trembling of body at the ſight of him, and becauſe he came to know their eſtate, and with reproofs from the Apoſtle to them.

Ver. 16. I rejoice therefore that I have confidence in you in all things.] That I can ſpeak freely and boldly to you, reprove, admoniſh and adviſe you, ſince you take it all in good part, as I deſign it; that I can confidently ſpeak in your favour, boaſt of your love and obedience, which is found upon trial and by experience to be truth; and that I can promiſe myſelf every good thing from you, that is proper to aſk of you, and lies in your power to perform; which he ſays partly to commend them for their paſt conduct, and partly to pave the way for what he had to ſay to them, concerning making a collection for the poor ſaints.

CHAP. VIII.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle ſtirs up the Corinthians, to make a collection for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, by a variety of arguments, and gives a commendation of Titus and ſome other brethren, who were appointed meſſengers to them on that account. He firſt ſets before them the example of the Macedonian churches, who had made a liberal collection for the above perſons; which the Apoſtle calls the grace of God, and ſays it was beſtowed on them; and it was not the generoſity of one church only, but of many, and ſo worthy of imitation, ver. 1. which generoſity of theirs he illuſtrates by the circumſtances and condition they were in, they were not only in great affliction, but in deep poverty; and yet contributed with abundance of joy, and in great liberality, ver. 2. yea, this they did not only to the utmoſt of their power, and according to the beſt of their abilities; but their will was beyond their power, they had hearts to do more than they were able; and what they did, they did of themſelves without being aſked and urged to it, ver. 3. nay, they even intreated the Apoſtle and his fellow miniſters to take the money they had collected, and either ſend or carry it to the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, and miniſter it to them themſelves, ver. 4. and which was beyond the expectation of the Apoſtle, who knew their caſe; and yet it was but acting like themſelves, who at firſt gave themſelves to the Lord and to the Apoſtles by the will of God, ver. 5. and this forwardneſs and readineſs of the Macedonian churches, or the churches themſelves put the Apoſtle upon deſiring Titus to go to Corinth, and finiſh the collection he had begun; and which carries in it more arguments than one to excite them to this ſervice; as that this was not only at the requeſt of the Apoſtle, but of the Macedonian churches, that Titus ſhould be deſired to go on this buſineſs; and beſides the thing had been begun, and it would be ſcandalous not to finiſh it, ver. 6. and next the Apoſtle argues from their abounding in the exerciſe of other graces, which he enumerates, that they would alſo in this, ver. 7. for to excel in one grace and not in another, was not to their praiſe and honour; however, he did not urge them to this in an imperious way, and to ſhew and exerciſe his authority; but was moved unto it thro' the generous example of others, and that there might be a proof of their ſincere love and affection to the Lord, and to his people, ver. 8. but as what he wiſely judged would have the greateſt weight with them; he propoſes to them the example of Chriſt, and inſtances in his great love to them; who tho' he was rich became poor for them, that they might be enriched thro' his poverty, ver. 9. and therefore ſhould freely contribute to his poor ſaints. Moreover, inaſmuch as the Apoſtle did not take upon him to command, only give advice, he ſhould be regarded; and that the rather becauſe what he adviſed to was expedient for them, would be for their good, and be profitable to them; as well as prevent reproach and ſcandal, which would follow ſhould they not finiſh what they had begun ſo long ago, ver. 10. wherefore he exhorts them chearfully to perform what they had ſhewn a readineſs to; and points out unto them the rule and meaſure of it, that it ſhould be out of their own, what they were poſſeſſed of, and according to their ability; which be it more or leſs would be acceptable to God, ver. 11, 12. for his meaning was not that ſome ſhould be eaſed and others burdened; but that all ſhould communicate according to what they had, ver. 13. to which he ſtimulates them from the hope of the recompence of reward, whenever it ſhould be otherwiſe with them than it was, and things ſhould change both with them who communicated, and with them to whom they communicated; or this was the end propoſed by the Apoſtle, that in the iſſue there might be an equality between them, ver. 14. which he confirms and illuſtrates by the diſtribution of the manna to the Iſraelites, who had an equal meaſure, ver. 15. as appears from what is ſaid, Exod. xvi. 18. next the Apoſtle enters upon a commendation of the meſſengers, that were appointed and ordered to be ſent to them upon this errand, and begins with Titus; and gives thanks to God that had put it into his heart, to be ſo ſolicitous about this matter, ver. 16. and praiſes him for his forwardneſs in undertaking it of his own accord, and in performing it without being urged to it, ver. 17. and next he commends another perſon whoſe name is not mentioned, who was ſent along with him; a perſon of note and fame in all the churches, ver. 18. and who had the honour to be choſen by the churches for this ſervice, ver. 19. and the reaſon why more perſons than one were ſent, was to prevent any ſuſpicion of converting the collections to wrong purpoſes; and to preſerve and ſecure a good character, a character of honeſty before God and men, ver. 20, 21. To theſe two a third was added, whoſe name alſo is not mentioned, and who had been proved to be a diligent man, and appeared more ſo in this matter upon the Apoſtle's confidence in the Corinthians, that they would readily attend to the ſervice theſe were ſent to promote, ver. 22. and thus having ſeparately given the characters of theſe men, they are all of them commended again; Titus, as the Apoſtle's partner and fellow-helper; and the other brethren as the meſſengers of the churches, and the glory of Chriſt, ver. 23. and the chapter is concluded with an exhortation to the members of the church at Corinth, to give theſe meſſengers a proof of their love to the poor ſaints before all the churches, and make it appear that he had not boaſted of them in vain, ver. 24.

Ver. 1. Moreover brethren, we do you to wit of the grace of God, &c.] The Apoſtle having ſaid every thing that was proper to conciliate the minds and affections of the Corinthians to him, and the matter in difference being adjuſted to the ſatisfaction of all parties concerned; he propoſes what he had wiſely poſtponed till all was over, the making a collection for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem; which he enforces by the example of the Macedonian churches, the churches at Philippi, Theſſalonica, &c. He addreſſes them in a kind and tender manner, under the endearing appellation of brethren, being ſo in a ſpiritual relation; and takes the liberty to inform them of the goodneſs of God to ſome of their ſiſter churches; we do you to wit, or we make known unto you. The phraſe to wit is an old Engliſh one, and almoſt obſolete, and ſignifies to acquaint with, inform of, make known, or give knowledge of any thing. The thing informed of here, is the grace of God beſtowed on the churches of Macedonia; by which is meant, not any of the bleſſings of grace common to all the ſaints, ſuch as regeneration, juſtification, adoption, forgiveneſs of ſin, and the like; but beneficence, liberality, or a liberal diſpoſition to do good to others, called the grace of God; becauſe it ſprung from thence, as all good works do when performed aright; they were aſſiſted in it by the grace of God; and it was the love and favour of God in Chriſt, which was the engaging motive, the leading view, which drew them on to it. This was beſtowed upon them, not merited, it was grace and free grace; God may give perſons ever ſo much of this world's goods, yet if he does not give them a ſpirit of generoſity, a liberal diſpoſition, they will make no uſe of it for the good of others: and this was beſtowed on the churches of Macedonia; not on a few leading men among them, but upon all the members of theſe churches in general; and not upon one church, but upon many; a ſpirit of liberality was in general diffuſed among them, and this is propoſed for imitation. Examples have great influence, and the examples of many the greater; too many follow a multitude to do evil; here the example of many, even of many churches is propoſed in order to be followed to do good, to exerciſe acts of beneficence and goodneſs, in a free generous way to ſaints in diſtreſs; which as it is here called, the grace of God, ſo in ſome following verſes, the gift, the ſame grace, and this grace, ver. 4, 6, 7. agreeable to the Hebrew word חסד, which ſignifies grace and free bounty; and is uſed for doing good, or for beneficence which the Jews call, גמילות חסידים, a performance of kind and bountiful actions; which are done freely, and for which a perſon expects no return from the perſon to whom he does them: and this they diſtinguiſh from צדקה, alms, after this manner [t]; "an "alms they ſay, is exerciſed towards the living, "beneficence towards the living and the dead; "alms is uſed to the poor, beneficence both to the "rich and poor; alms is performed by a man's "ſubſtance, beneficence both by body and ſub"ſtance."

Ver. 2. How that in a great trial of affliction, &c.] The Apoſtle proceeds to ſhew the condition theſe churches were in when, and the manner in which, they contributed to the relief of others. They were in affliction; they received the Goſpel at firſt in much affliction, as did the church at Theſſalonica, which was one of them; and afterwards ſuffered much from their countrymen for the profeſſion of it, by reproaches, perſecutions, impriſonments, confiſcation of goods, &c. They were under trying afflictions, which tried their faith and patience, and in many of them. Now for perſons in proſperity, when all things go well with them, to be liberal is no ſuch great matter; but for perſons in adverſity, under trying diſpenſations of providence, amidſt many afflictive ones to communicate generouſly to the relief of others, is ſomething very remarkable, and worthy of notice and imitation, which was the caſe of theſe churches: for notwithſtanding this, the abundance of their joy, and their deep poverty, abounded unto the riches of their liberality; ſo that it appears likewiſe that they were not only in great afflictions, but in deep poverty; had but an handful of meal in the barrel, and a little oil in the cruſe, their purſes almoſt empty, and their coffers almoſt exhauſted; they had gotten to the bottom of their ſubſtance, had but very little left; and yet freely gave, with joy, even with an abundance of it. The alluſion ſeems to be to the words of David, in 1 Chron. xxii. 14. now behold, בעניי, which the Septuagint render by κατα πτωχειαν μȣ, according to my poverty, I have prepared for the houſe of the Lord, an hundred thouſand talents of gold, &c. for by the abundance of their joy, is not ſo much meant the joy they felt in the midſt of their afflictions, ſo that they could glory in them, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God, as the chearfulneſs of their ſpirits in contributing to the neceſſities of others; glad at heart they were that they had hearts to do good, and an opportunity of doing it; which they gladly laid hold on, obſerving the divine rule, he that ſheweth mercy, let him do it with chearfulneſs: and this they did, conſidering the ſmall pittance they were poſſeſſed of, very largely; for tho' their poverty was deep, and their purſes low, their hearts were large and full, and their hands ready to communicate; ſo that their poverty abounded to the riches of their liberality: tho' their poverty was great, their liberality was rich and large; tho' it might be but little they gave in quantity, it was much in quality, much in liberality; like the poor widow, who of her want and penury, caſt in more than all the rich beſides, not in quantity, but in liberality; they only giving ſome, and a diſproportionate part, ſhe her all.

Ver. 3. For to their power (I bear record,) &c.] They gave according to their ability, to the utmoſt of it, which is the moſt that can be deſired, or be given; for no man can give more than he has, nor is he required to do more than he is able: yea, and beyond their power they were willing of themſelves; not that they did or could do beyond their power; but they were willing beyond their power; their hearts were larger than their purſes; they would gladly have done more than they had ability to do; and to this the Apoſtle bears teſtimony to give it credit, which otherwiſe might have been called in queſtion: and it is to be obſerved, that theſe churches communicated in this chearful manner and large way, conſidering their circumſtances to the utmoſt of their ability, of themſelves; unaſked, not having been put upon, preſſed and urged to ſuch a ſervice; for perſons to give when they are aſked, eſpecially when they do it readily, at once, without demurring upon it, and with chearfulneſs, is much; but to give unaſked, diſcovers a very generous and beneficent diſpoſition: this is reckoned by the Jews as one of the excellencies in giving of alms[a], "when a man gives into the hands of another קודם שישאל, before he aſks; and the next degree to this is, when he gives to him after he aſks; and the next to this, who gives leſs than is proper, but with a chearful countenance."

Ver. 4. Praying us with much intreaty, &c.] They not only gave freely, being unaſked by the Apoſtles; but they ſought to them, and earneſtly entreated them, that they would receive the gift; the beneficence, what they had ſo freely and generouſly collected: and the fellowſhip of the miniſtring to the ſaints; what they had communicated for the ſervice of the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, in which they teſtified their having and holding fellowſhip with the churches of Chriſt; and that they would receive it at their hands, and take it upon them, and carry it to Jeruſalem, and diſtribute to the poor ſaints there, as ſhould ſeem to them moſt proper and convenient; which they accordingly agreed to; ſee Rom. xv. 25, 26.

Ver. 5. And this they did not as we hoped, &c.] All this was unexpected by the Apoſtles, who knew their great affliction and deep poverty, and therefore could not have hoped for ſuch a collection from them; or that they would have deſired the Apoſtle to have miniſtered it for them: but firſt gave their ownſelves to the Lord, and unto us by the will of God; the ſenſe of which is not barely or only, that they committed themſelves to the care of providence in all their afflictions and poverty, truſting in God that he would provide for them for time to come, and therefore even in their ſtrait circumſtances gave liberally; and were ſo much under the direction of the Apoſtles, God ſo diſpoſing their minds, that they were willing to do or give any thing that they ſhould ſay was proper; yea, were very willing that ſome of their number ſhould leave their habitations and families to accompany them, in forwarding this good work elſewhere: but the Apoſtle ſeems to have reſpect to what theſe perſons did at firſt converſion, when they gave themſelves to Chriſt, to be ſaved by him, and him alone; and to ſerve him to the uttermoſt, in every thing he ſhould ſignify to be his will; and when they joined themſelves to the churches of Chriſt, and put themſelves under the care, government, and direction of the Apoſtles, who were over the churches in the Lord: and therefore tho' what the members of theſe churches collected, was very wonderful and beyond expectation; yet when it is conſidered that theſe perſons had long ago given their whole ſelves, their all to Chriſt, had committed all into his hands, and devoted themſelves entirely to his ſervice; and had declared their ſubjection to his miniſters as ſervants under him, and to his word and ordinances as miniſtered by them; it need not be ſo much wondered at, that they ſhould be ſo liberal, in giving away their worldly ſubſtance for the relief of Chriſt's poor members, when they had given their precious ſouls, their immortal all, and had committed the ſalvation of them entirely to him. Giving themſelves to Chriſt in this ſenſe, ſuppoſes that they had a true ſight and apprehenſion of their ſtate and condition by nature, how ſinful they were, and loſt and undone in themſelves; that they were deſtitute of a righteouſneſs, and unable to obtain one by the works of the law; that they were in hopeleſs and helpleſs circumſtances, as conſidered in themſelves; that they were diſeaſed from head to foot and could not cure themſelves; that they were dead in law, and liable to the curſe and condemnation of it; for till men ſee themſelves in ſuch a caſe, they will never give themſelves to Chriſt, or betake themſelves to him to be ſaved by him. Moreover, this ſuppoſes ſome knowledge of him as God's ordinance for ſalvation, as the ſaviour of the Father's appointing and ſending; of him, as having effected it by his obedience and death; of his being the only ſaviour, a ſuitable one, both able and willing to ſave to the uttermoſt, even the chief of ſinners that come to God by him. It is expreſſive of faith in Chriſt; of ſeeing the ſon and the fulneſs of grace and ſalvation in him, and of going to him for it; of ſtaying, reſting, leaning and relying upon him, venturing on him, committing all into his hands, and truſting him with all and for all. It denotes ſubjection to him, as their huſband, to whom they give themſelves as his ſpouſe and bride, and conſent to be the Lord's in a conjugal relation; and ſubmiſſion to him in all his offices, as a prophet to be taught and inſtructed by him, as a prieſt to be waſhed in his blood, and juſtified by his righteouſneſs, to which they heartily ſubmit, and as their Lord and King to the ſceptre of his kingdom, the laws of his houſe, and ordinances of his Goſpel; for they are made a willing people, not only to be ſaved by him, but to ſerve him in body and ſoul, and with all they have; as it is but right they ſhould, ſince he has given himſelf, his all for them. Giving themſelves up to the Apoſtles, ſignifies not a ſurrender of themſelves to them as lords over God's heritage, to be governed and ruled over in a tyrannical and arbitrary way; but a ſubmitting of themſelves to them, as Chriſt's ſervants ſet over them in the Lord, whilſt they miniſter the word and adminiſter the ordinances, according to the will of Chriſt; owning them as their fathers, or inſtructors, and guides, and as watchmen and overſeers placed in and over the churches, for their ſpiritual welfare: all which is, by the will of God; as that poor ſenſible ſinners ſhould give up themſelves to Chriſt, to be ſaved by him, and ſerve him; and that they ſhould join themſelves to the churches, and be ſubject to the care, teachings, and government of his ſervants in his houſe.

Ver. 6. Inſomuch that we deſired Titus, &c.] Obſerving the very great readineſs, chearfulneſs, and liberality of the poor Macedonians in this matter, the Apoſtles could do no other than deſire Titus to forward, haſten, and accompliſh a like liberal contribution among the Corinthians; or the ſenſe is, that the Macedonians not only prayed with much intreaty, as in ver. 4. that the Apoſtle would be pleaſed to take their collection, and ſend or carry it to Jeruſalem; but alſo that they would intreat Titus, that as he had begun, ſo he would alſo finiſh in you the ſame grace alſo; that is, that as he had already moved this affair to the Corinthians while he was with them, and had made ſome progreſs in it, tho' what thro' one thing or another, it had been retarded, and lay in ſome meaſure neglected; that he might be deſired to go again, on purpoſe to compleat ſo good a work, ſo acceptable to God, and ſo uſeful to the poor ſaints; which carries in it a new and ſtrong argument, to ſtir up the Corinthians to this ſervice; ſince they had not only the example of the Macedonian churches, but it was even at their requeſt, that Titus was deſired to go upon this errand; and to this ſenſe read the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Arabic verſions.

[a] Maimon. Hilch. Mattanot Anayim, c. 10. §. 11, 12, 13.

Ver. 7. Therefore as ye abound in every thing, &c.] In all gifts and every grace, in the uſe and exerciſe of them, inſomuch that they were enriched in every thing, and wanted nothing; ſee 1 Cor. i. 5, 6, 7. what is here expreſſed in general, is explained by particulars following: in faith; both in the doctrine of faith, which they had received and profeſſed, held faſt to, and abode by; yea, they abounded in the knowledge of it, zeal for it, and thankfulneſs to God on account of it; and in the grace of faith, not an hiſtorical one, nor the faith of miracles, but that which is peculiar to God's elect, is the gift of his grace and the work of his Spirit, which has Chriſt for its object, and works by love; in this they abounded, inaſmuch as they had a large meaſure of it, grew in it, were full of it, and were much in the exerciſe thereof: in utterance, or ſpeech; meaning either the gift of ſpeaking with tongues, which many in this church had; or the gift of underſtanding and explaining the word of God with much freedom; or a liberty of mind and ſpeech to declare their faith in Chriſt, and make an ingenuous confeſſion of it to others: in knowledge; of God and of Chriſt, and of the truths of the Goſpel: and in all diligence; their miniſters were diligent in preaching the Goſpel, the people in hearing the word, and attending on ordinances, and both ſtudiouſly careful to keep up the diſcipline of the church; and very induſtrious to diſcharge the ſeveral duties of religion, and to aſſiſt one another, both in things temporal and ſpiritual: and in your love to us; the Apoſtles and miniſters of the word, whom they loved, eſteemed, and honoured for their works ſake: and ſince they were ſo eminent for theſe graces, and the exerciſe of them, the Apoſtle exhorts them to liberality to the poor ſaints; ſee that ye abound in this grace alſo; for as faith, utterance, knowledge, diligence and love to Chriſt's miniſters are graces; ſo alſo is kindneſs ſhewn to Chriſt's poor members, it is a gift of God's grace, can't be rightly exerciſed without the aſſiſtance of his grace, has for its objects men who have received the grace of God, and will be rewarded with a reward of grace; perſons eminent for the ſeveral graces of the Spirit of God, and the exerciſe of them, it may be not only deſired, but expected from them, that they ſhould abound in the exerciſe of beneficence to the poor. This is another argument exciting to that good work.

Ver. 8. I ſpeak not by commandment, &c.] Either of God, who has not fixed the certain times when, or certain ſums which perſons are to give, and other circumſtances, which are left to diſcretion; but in general has ſignified it as his will, that thoſe in neceſſity are to be relieved by ſuch who are in ability to do it: or as an Apoſtle, he did not ſpeak in an imperious manner, extorting from them a collection, or laying his apoſtolical injunctions upon them to make one; he did not go about to force or oblige them to it, for men in ſuch caſes muſt act willingly, and what they do, muſt do of their own accord with chearfulneſs, and not thro' conſtraint or grudgingly: but by occaſion of the forwardneſs of others; or thro' carefulneſs for others; what moved the Apoſtle to propoſe this matter to the Corinthians, and exhort them to it, were either the forwardneſs of the Macedonians, chearfully contributing in the midſt of their poverty, and their urgent ſolicitations that the ſame good work might go on elſewhere, or elſe the very great care and concern that he himſelf had for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem: it was not therefore to ſhew his apoſtolical authority, that he ſent Titus to them to finiſh this ſervice; but he was ſtirred up hereunto, partly by the bounty and ſolicitations of others, and partly by bowels of compaſſion within himſelf, and concern in his own mind for the poor ſaints; and alſo, as he adds, to prove the ſincerity of your love; to God, to Chriſt, to his miniſters, and to the ſaints, particularly the poor; that their love might appear to be true, genuine, hearty, and real to others, to all men as well as to them the Apoſtles.

Ver. 9. For ye know the grace of our Lord Jeſus, &c.] This is a new argument, and a very forcible one to engage to liberality, taken from the wonderful grace and love of Chriſt, diſplayed in his ſtate of humiliation towards his people; which is well known to all them that have truly believed in Chriſt; of this they are not and cannot be ignorant, his love, good will, and favour are ſo manifeſt; there are ſuch glaring proofs of it in his incarnation, ſufferings and death, that leave no room for any to doubt of it: that tho' he was rich; in the perfections of his divine nature, having the fulneſs of the Godhead in him, all that the father has, and ſo equal to him; ſuch as eternity, immutability, infinity and immenſity, omnipreſence, omniſcience, omnipotence, &c. in the works of his hands, which reach to every thing that is made, the heavens, the earth, the ſea, and all that in them are, things viſible and inviſible; in his univerſal empire and dominion over all creatures; and in thoſe large revenues of glory, which are due to him from them all; which riches of his are underived from another, incommunicable to another, and can't be loſt: yet for your ſakes he became poor; by aſſuming human nature, with all its weakneſſes and imperfections excepting ſin; he appeared in it not as a lord, but in the form of a ſervant; he endured in it a great deal of reproach and ſhame, and at laſt death itſelf; not that by becoming man he ceaſed to be God, or loſt his divine perfections, tho' theſe were much hid and covered from the view of man; and in his human nature he became the reverſe of what he is in his divine nature, namely finite and circumſcriptible, weak and infirm, ignorant of ſome things, and mortal; in which nature alſo he was expoſed to much meanneſs and outward poverty; he was born of poor parents, had no liberal education, was brought up to a trade, nad not where to lay his head, was miniſtered to by others of their ſubſtance, and had nothing to bequeath his mother at his death, but commits her to the care of one of his diſciples; all which fulfilled the prophecies of him, that he ſhould be דל and עני, poor and low, Pſal. xli. 1. Zech. ix. 9. The perſons for whom he became ſo, were not the angels, but elect men; who were ſinners and ungodly perſons, and were thereby become bankrupts and beggars: the end for which he became poor for them was, that they thro' his poverty might be rich; not in temporals, but in ſpirituals; and by his obedience, ſufferings, and death in his low eſtate, he has paid all their debts, wrought out a robe of righteouſneſs, rich and adorned with jewels, with which he clothes them, and thro' his blood and ſacrifice has made them kings and prieſts unto God. They are enriched by him with the graces of his Spirit; with the truths of the Goſpel, comparable to gold, ſilver and precious ſtones; with himſelf and all that he has; with the riches of grace here, and of glory hereafter. Theſe are communicable from him, tho' unſearchable, and are ſolid and ſubſtantial, ſatisfying, laſting, and for ever. Now if this grace of Chriſt will not engage to liberality with chearfulneſs, nothing will.

Ver. 10. And herein I give my advice, &c.] As Daniel did to Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. iv. 27. The Apoſtle did not chuſe to make uſe of his apoſtolical authority, or give orders, as he ſometimes did in ſuch caſes; he did not think fit to ſpeak by way of commandment, obliging them to what they ought to do willingly; looking upon this the moſt prudential ſtep, and wiſeſt method he could take in order to ſucceed, only to give his judgment in this matter, as what would be beſt for them, and moſt conducive to their real good: for this is expedient for you; moſt verſions read it, profitable; doing acts of beneficence is profitable to perſons, as to things temporal, God uſually bleſſing ſuch with a greater affluence of the things of life, and which indeed is often promiſed; and is alſo profitable with reſpect to things ſpiritual, for if God does not make it up to them in temporal enjoyments, yet with his preſence, the diſcoveries of his love, the joys of his ſalvation, and an increaſe of every grace; ſo Gaius that hoſpitable man to the Apoſtle, and all chriſtian ſtrangers, was in much ſpiritual health, and a proſperous condition in his ſoul, when but in an ill ſtate with reſpect to his body: yea, ſuch a conduct is profitable in relation to things eternal; for as it ſprings from the grace of God, and men are aſſiſted therein by it, and is exerciſed towards perſons that have received it, it will be rewarded with a reward of grace; tho' it may be, the Apoſtle here does not ſo much argue from the utility, as the decency of it in the Corinthians; who, ſays he, have began before, a year ago, not only to do, but alſo to be forward, or willing: it is hard to ſay whether the Apoſtle deſigns to commend or reprove them; and indeed, it ſeems as if there was a mixture of praiſe and diſpraiſe in this paſſage; it was in their favour that they had begun before, even a year ago, and were willing and forward of themſelves to this good work; yea, were the firſt that ſet it on foot, and ſo were an example to the Macedonian churches, and others; but then this was againſt them, that the other churches which began later than they, had finiſhed before them; whether this their charity was obſtructed, as ſome have thought, thro' ſome affliction and perſecution that befel them, which if it appeared would much excuſe them; or rather it was neglected thro' lukewarmneſs and indolence; wherefore the Apoſtle gives his ſentiments, that to ſave their own credit, it was expedient for them to finiſh what they had begun; for otherwiſe, as their boaſting of them would be in vain, ſo they would expoſe themſelves to contempt and incur diſgrace; and it was not only proper that they ſhould do this, but do it willingly, and with much chearfulneſs, for that is meant by being forward or willing; that they not only do it, but do it with a good will, which they at firſt diſcovered.

Ver. 11. Now therefore perform the doing of it, &c.] This is a concluſion from the former advice, to finiſh what was readily willed; for as it is not enough to do a thing, unleſs it is done chearfully and willingly, ſo it is not ſufficient to expreſs a good will to ſuch ſervice as is here called to, without doing it; both ſhould go together: that as there was a readineſs to will, ſo there may be a performance alſo; in ſome caſes there is neither power, nor will to do good; in others there is will, when there is not a power; but in this caſe of beneficence to the poor ſaints, as there was a willingneſs declared, there was an ability in the Corinthians to perform; they had it in the power of their hands, more or leſs, to act: and the Apoſtle in the laſt clauſe of this verſe points out the rule and meaſure of their liberality, out of that which you have; according to your abilities, and as God has proſpered you; and with which he ſhuts up the mouths of all objectors, rich and poor: ſhould the rich ſay, would you have us give away all we have? the anſwer is, no; but out of that which you have, ſomething of it, according as you are able; ſhould the poorer ſort ſay, we are in mean circumſtances, we have families to provide for, and can ſpare little, and what we can do is ſo trifling, that it is not worth giving or accepting; the reply is, give out of that which you have, be it leſs or more; it follows,

Ver. 12. For if there be firſt a willing mind, &c.] If what is done ſprings from a truly noble, generous ſpirit, a ſpirit of bountifulneſs and liberality; and is given chearfully and freely, and according to a man's ability; the quantity matters not, whether it be more or leſs: it is accepted; both of God and man: according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not. The widow's mite was as acceptable, and more ſo, than all the rich men caſt into the treaſury; a cup of cold water given to a prophet, in the name of a prophet, is taken notice of by God, and ſhall have its reward. The preſent ſent by the Philippians to the Apoſtle Paul, and which perhaps was not very large, was an odour of a ſweet ſmell, a ſacrifice acceptable, well pleaſing to God, Phil. iv. 18.

Ver. 13. For I mean not that other men be eaſed and you burthened.] Referring either to the givers; and that either to the richer and meaner ſort in this church; the Apoſtle's ſenſe being, not to put the whole burden of the collection upon ſome only, whilſt others were excuſed doing little or nothing; but that every one ſhould give according to his ability; or to other churches in poorer circumſtances; and the Apoſtle's meaning was, not that theſe churches by reaſon of their meanneſs ſhould be entirely free from this ſervice, as it was plain they were not, by the inſtance of the Macedonians; and that the whole be devolved upon the Corinthian church, and others that were rich; but that all ſhould contribute according to their circumſtances: or this may refer to the perſons given to, and for whom this beneficence was aſked; for the words may be rendered, for not that there may be eaſe, or relaxation to others, and to you affliction or ſtraitneſs; that is, his meaning was, not that there ſhould be ſuch a contribution raiſed for theſe poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, that they ſhould live in eaſe and great abundance; whilſt their benefactors, thro' an over abundant generoſity to them, were ſtraitned and their families reduced to great difficulties; this was what was far from his intentions.

Ver. 14. But by an equality, &c.] All that he meant was, that there might be an equality both in givers and receivers, proportioned to their ſeveral circumſtances and ſtations of life: that now at this time; which was a very neceſſitous time at Jeruſalem, there being a famine there, and their common ſtock exhauſted: your abundance may be a ſupply for their want, that their abundance alſo may be a ſupply for your want; which reſpects either the different abilities of givers at different times; and that whereas now, the church at Corinth was rich and wealthy, and had great abundance of the things of this world, they in this general collection were able to make up the deficiencies of other churches; and ſo ſhould it ever be their caſe, as it might be, that they ſhould be reduced, and theſe other churches increaſed, and enjoy a large abundance, they might hereafter in their turn ſupply what would be wanting in them: or elſe the perſons given to; and the ſenſe is, that ſhould they ever change circumſtances, as it was not impoſſible, that they that were now rich ſhould become poor, and they that were poor become rich; then as their abundance had been a ſupply to the wants of others, the abundance of others in their turn would be a ſupply to their wants; ſo that the argument is taken from the hope of retribution, in caſe of ſuch viciſſitudes; ſee Luke vi. 38. his view was, that there may be equality; either that in time to come, an equal return may be made, ſhould it be neceſſary; or that at preſent, ſome ſort of equality might be obſerved between the rich and poor; that the rich ſhould ſo diſtribute as not to leave themſelves without a proper ſupport, according to their ſtation of life; and yet ſo freely communicate, that the poor may not be without food and raiment, ſuitable to their lower ſphere of life.

Ver. 15. As it is written, &c.] In Exod. xvi. 18. he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack; reſpect is had to the hiſtory of the manna, a ſort of food God prepared for the Iſraelites in the wilderneſs; and which were gathered by them every morning, by ſome more, by others leſs; and yet when it came to be meaſured, every man had his omer and no more, one had nothing over, and the other not at all deficient; each man had his proper and equal quantity; and which by the Jews [w], is looked upon as a miracle that was wrought: many uſeful inſtructions may be learned from this hiſtory, as that as there was a general proviſion made by God for the Iſraelites, good and bad, and the mixed multitude that came from Egypt with them; ſo there is an univerſal providence of God which reaches to all creatures, even to the vegetable, to the birds of the air, and beaſts of the field, to all the individuals of human nature, and to the bad among them as well as the good; tho' to the latter it is more ſpecial, who of all men have the leaſt reaſon to be diſtruſtful and uneaſy: and as that proviſion was daily, ſo is that providential ſupply which all creatures have from God; he is to be truſted to, and depended on daily; application is to be made to him every day, for daily bread; nor ſhould there be any anxious concern for the morrow. Moreover, as the Iſraelites, tho' the manna was prepared for them, were to riſe in the morning and gather it before the ſun waxed hot; ſo notwithſtanding the providence of God, and the daily care he takes of men, yet diligence, induſtry, and the uſe of means are highly commendable. And as ſome gathered more and others leſs, yet upon meaſuring it with the omer, there was an entire equality, one had not more nor leſs than another; ſo upon the winding up of things in providence, ſuch as have gathered much riches in the morning of life, in the evening of death will have nothing over, nor any thing to ſhew more than others; and they that have gathered little will appear to have had no lack; both will have had food and raiment, and no more, only with this difference, ſome will have enjoyed a richer diet and clothing, and others a meaner, and both ſuitable to their circumſtances in life; which may inſtruct us to depend upon divine providence, daily to be content with ſuch things as we have, and to make a proper uſe of what is gathered, whether more or leſs, and not only for ourſelves, but for the good of others. This diſcovers the egregious folly of ſuch, who are anxiouſly concerned for the gathering and amaſſing much worldly riches together; which when they have done, they lay it up for themſelves, and do not make uſe of it for common good, neither for the good of civil ſociety, nor the intereſt of religion. Let it be obſerved, that thoſe Iſraelites who from a ſelfiſh covetous diſpoſition, and diſtruſt of divine providence, left of their manna till the morning, it bred worms and ſtank; which was by the juſt judgment of God inflicted as a puniſhment; for otherwiſe it was capable of being kept longer. So when covetous mortals lay up for themſelves for time to come, and do not communicate to the neceſſities of others, ſuch a practice breeds and produces worms, moth, and rottenneſs in their eſtates, which gradually decreaſe, or are ſuddenly taken from them, or they from them: ſuch an evil diſpoſition is the root and cauſe of many immoralities in life; it greatly prejudices profeſſors of religion in things ſpiritual; and it tends to their everlaſting ruin, to breed that worm of an evil conſcience that will never die, and to render their perſons ſtinking and abominable, both in the ſight of God and men.

Ver. 16. But thanks be to God, &c.] The Apoſtle proceeds to give an account of the perſons and their characters, who were employed in making this collection at Corinth for the poor ſaints, and begins with Titus; and the rather becauſe he had been already concerned in ſetting afoot that good work among them; and gives thanks to God, which, ſays he, put the ſame earneſt care into the heart of Titus for you; by earneſt care is meant, that very great carefulneſs, ſolicitude, and diligence Titus had ſhewn in ſtirring them up to a liberal contribution; and which was the ſame that he had expreſſed in the arguments juſt now uſed by him, to engage them in the ſame ſervice; and this care, as it was a very earneſt and hearty one, ſo he ſuggeſts that it was more for them, than for the ſake of the poor; the performance of acts of beneficence and liberality, tending more to the advantage and account of the giver than of the receiver: and he further intimates, that theſe good motions in the heart of Titus were not merely natural, or the effects of human power and free-will, but were of God, as every good thing is; they were wrought in him by the Spirit of God, and ſprung from the grace of God, and therefore the Apoſtle returns thanks to God for the ſame; and the mention of this could not fail of carrying weight with it, and of having ſome influence on the minds of the Corinthians.

Ver. 17. For indeed, he accepted the exhortation, &c.] The Macedonians beſought the Apoſtle with much intreaty to give unto him, ver. 4, 6. or which being moved by their example, they gave unto him, namely, that he would go and finiſh what he had already begun; and accordingly he did not refuſe, but readily accepted the exhortation: yea, not only ſo, but being more forward; than was known or could have been expected; which ſhews that this was put into his heart by God, before it was moved unto him; ſo that if he had never been aſked, or exhorted hereunto, he would have gone of himſelf: of his own accord he went unto you; ſo great is his care of you; ſo great his love unto you; ſo willing was he to come again and pay another viſit, and eſpecially on this account, where he had before been treated with ſo much reſpect and kindneſs. Titus having been at Corinth already, and being well known there, the Apoſtle forbears ſaying any thing more in his commendation.

[w] Jarchi & Aben Ezra in Exod. xvi. 18. Tzeror Hammor, fol. 76. 3.

Ver. 18. And we have ſent with him the brother, &c.] The Syriac and Ethiopic verſions read, our brother; and one of Stephens's copies, your brother: who this brother was, is not certain; ſome think it was Luke the evangeliſt, the companion of the Apoſtle in his travels: whoſe praiſe is in the Goſpel, throughout all the churches; being known and highly commended by all the churches, for the Goſpel he wrote; but it is not certain, that Luke as yet had wrote his Goſpel; and much leſs that it was ſo much known at preſent among the churches; and beſides, this brother's praiſe ſeems to be on account of his preaching the Goſpel, and not writing one: others think Barnabas is intended, who was choſen and ſent out out by the churches along with the Apoſtle; but theſe in a ſhort time ſeparated from each other, nor do we read of their coming together again: others are of opinion, that Apollos is deſigned, who was a very eloquent preacher, and of whom the Apoſtle had given the Corinthians an intimation in his former epiſtle, that he would come to them at a convenient time; but to him is objected, that he never was choſen of the churches, to travel with the Apoſtle on ſuch an account as here mentioned: others would have it that Silas or Sylvanus is meant, who was a very conſtant companion of the Apoſtle, and of whom he makes mention in moſt of his epiſtles; and others have made no doubt of it, but John Mark is here meant, who not only wrote a Goſpel, but was an excellent preacher of it, and was choſen by the churches to go along with Paul and Barnabas; and tho' there was ſome diſtaſte taken to him by Paul, he was afterwards reconciled to him, and for his profitableneſs in the miniſtry was greatly deſired by him; but after all, it is difficult to determine who it was, nor is it of any great moment: a brother he was; being not only a regenerate perſon, but a preacher of the Goſpel; a brother in the miniſtry, and one whoſe praiſe was in the Goſpel; greatly admired, and much commended, for his excellent talent in preaching the Goſpel; and for this he was famous throughout all the churches; a very great commendation indeed; but this is not all, it follows,

Ver. 19. And not that only, but who was alſo choſen of the churches, &c.] Not only famous for preaching the Goſpel, but he was alſo appointed by the joint ſuffrages of the churches, which were made by the lifting up or ſtretching out of the hand, as the word here uſed ſignifies; this brother was not choſen to this ſervice by a few private perſons, or by a ſingle church only, but by ſeveral churches; which does not refer to the churches at Jeruſalem and Antioch, as if the Apoſtles were appointed, and others were appointed by theſe churches to travel with them, in order to collect money for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem; of which no mention is any where made, only of their being ſent out by them to preach the Goſpel. James, Cephas, and John indeed, when they gave to Paul and Barnabas the right hand of fellowſhip, that they might go to the heathen, deſired them to remember the poor; Gal. ii. 9, 10. but theſe were not the churches. The church at Antioch did collect for the brethren in Judea, at the time of the famine among them, and ſent their bounty by the hands of Barnabas and Saul, which ſeems to be the caſe here. This brother was choſen by the churches who collected, and not by the churches in Judea, for whom the collections were made; for it was uſual, and what was right and proper, that the churches choſe whom they thought fit to carry their liberality to Jeruſalem; ſee 1 Cor. xvi. 3, 4. Now this brother had the honour to be choſen by theſe churches, to travel, ſays the Apoſtle, with us, with this grace; bounty or beneficence of the churches, what they had freely and liberally contributed for the ſupply of the poor, from a principle of grace, and by the aſſiſtance of it: which is adminiſtred by us; not given by the Apoſtles, but collected by them; or what was procured by their means, in the ſeveral churches to whom they had moved it, and by proper arguments had excited them to it, with which they chearfully complied: and this was done on a two-fold account, both to the glory of the ſame Lord; Jeſus Chriſt, who is the one Lord over all; the ſame Lord of the Apoſtles, and the church at Corinth; the ſame Lord of the Corinthians, and the Macedonian and other churches; and the ſame Lord of the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, and the rich members of the ſeveral churches that contributed to them: and alſo to the declaration of your ready mind; or to ſtir up their ready mind, to increaſe it and promote it in them; as well to make it manifeſt, and that it might appear to others, how readily and freely they came into this ſervice; ſo that the Apoſtle's concern in this adminiſtration, was not from any ſiniſter and ſelfiſh ends; no nor ſo much for the relief of the poor, tho' this was greatly deſigned, as for the glory of Chriſt, and the honour of his churches.

Ver. 20. Avoiding this, that no man ſhould blame us, &c.] There is an alluſion in theſe words to mariners, who, when ſenſible of danger ſteer their courſe another way, in order to ſhun a rock and ſecure themſelves. So the Apoſtles being aware of the cenſorious ſpirits of ſome perſons, and to prevent all ſuſpicion of their converting any part of what they had collected to their own private uſe, ſent Titus with it, a man of known probity and integrity; and not he alone neither, but another brother with him, one who had obtained a good report as a miniſter of the Goſpel in all the churches; and beſides, was appointed not by the Apoſtles, but by the churches themſelves, to this ſervice. This ſhows the good conduct, and great prudence of the Apoſtle, and his care and ſolicitude that the miniſtry be not blamed; he knew he had many enemies, and how ſubject ſuch are to ſuſpicion and jealouſy, when perſons are intruſted with much, which was the caſe here; for tis added, in this abundance which is adminiſtred by us; which deſigns the very large contributions which were made by the churches, thro' the means of the Apoſtles moving, exciting, and encouraging them thereunto; and which were committed to their care and truſt, and at their intreaty they had accepted of.

Ver. 21. Providing for honeſt things, &c.] Or premeditating, forecaſting, or conſidering beforehand in the mind, things that are good, that are of good report among men, as well as accounted good by God; for it becomes profeſſors of religion, and eſpecially miniſters of the Goſpel, to be careful, not only to exerciſe a good conſcience towards God; but ſo to behave, that they may obtain and preſerve the good opinion of men; for when they have once loſt their credit and reputation among men, their miniſtry becomes in a great meaſure uſeleſs: wherefore the Apoſtle adds, not only in the ſight of the Lord; the ſame Lord as before, the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who is a diligent ſearcher of the hearts, and diſcerner of the thoughts, and obſerver of the ways and actions of all his people; but alſo in the ſight of men; not that the Apoſtle affected a mere outſide ſhow, popular applauſe, and the praiſe of men; but was concerned leſt any weak perſons, by their conduct, ſhould be ſtumbled and fall, the edification of any ſhould be hindered, and their miniſtry become unprofitable.

22. And we have ſent with them our brother, &c.] This is a third perſon ſent about this buſineſs. The Apoſtle in this, conformed to the cuſtoms of his nation; at leaſt if he did not purpoſely do it, it agrees with the Jewiſh canons, which require three perſons for the diſtribution of alms. "The alms "diſh, they ſay [x], is by three; nor do they ap-"point פרנסין פחות משלשה, overſeers of it leſs "than three." Again, they ſay [y], "the poors "cheſt is collected by two, ומתחלקת בשלשה, "but diſtributed by three; it is collected by two, "becauſe they don't appoint governors over a con-"gregation leſs than two, and it is diſtributed by "three, even as pecuniary judgments; but the "alms diſh is collected by three, and diſtributed "by three; for the collection and diſtribution are "alike:" who this brother was, ſent by the Apoſtle with Titus and the other perſon, is as uncertain as the former. Some think it was Luke, others Apollos, others Timothy, others Soſthenes, others Epenetus, others Silas, others Zenas the lawyer; a brother he was, and a very conſiderable character is given of him: whom we have oftentimes proved diligent in many things; he was a very diligent and induſtrious man, and ſo fit for this ſervice; he had been tried and proved, and was found to be ſo, not only once or twice, but oftentimes; and that not in a few inſtances, but in many; and in nothing did he ever ſhew more diligence than in this matter: but now much more diligent; than ever he had been in any thing before: upon the great confidence which I have in you; what doubled and increaſed this brother's diligence, and made him ſo eager for, and forward to this work, was, his obſerving the great confidence the Apoſtle expreſſed of the very great readineſs and liberality of the Corinthians; and which tacitly carries in it an argument exciting them thereunto: or this laſt clauſe may be read, which he hath in you; and ſo regards the confidence this brother had in them, which made him ſo ready to engage with, and join the other meſſengers.

Ver. 23. Whether any do enquire of Titus, &c.] The Apoſtle here ſums up the characters of each of the above perſons; as for Titus, he ſays, he is my partner; he had been his companion in his travels, a partner with him in preaching the Goſpel, as well as in the troubles and perſecutions he had met with; and was one with whom he had had ſweet communion and fellowſhip: and fellow-helper, or worker, concerning you; he had been a joint inſtrument with him, either in their converſion, or conſolation, and correction; or for their edification and inſtruction, and ſetting things right, which had been out of order among them: or our brethren be enquired of; if their characters are aſked after, as well as Titus's; by whom are meant not his fellow Apoſtles, but the two brethren who were ſent along with Titus; what may be truly ſaid of them is, they are the meſſengers of the churches; they were choſen and ſent forth by the churches, not only to preach the Goſpel, but particularly to take care of the miniſtration to the poor ſaints. They were meſſengers appointed by the churches for this ſervice, and were alſo appointed to the ſervice of the churches; reſpect ſeems to be had to the publick miniſter in the ſynagogues, who was called, שליח צבור, the meſſenger of the congregation, or church [z]; whoſe buſineſs was to take care about the reading of the law and the prophets, to pray in publick, and alſo to preach if there was no other; ſo we read [a] alſo of שלוחי בית דין, the meſſengers of the Sanhedrim; who were ſent at the proper time to reap the ſheaf of the firſt-fruits, and of others who ſwore the high-prieſt before the day of atonement [b]; and of שלוחי מצוה, the meſſengers of the commandment [c]; who went to hear the expoſition (of the traditions) and viſit the head of the captivity: and the glory of Chriſt; meaning either that the churches were the glory of Chriſt, in whom he is glorified, where his glory is ſeen, and his preſence enjoyed; or rather the meſſengers of them, on whom the image of Chriſt was enſtamped, who faithfully performed the work of Chriſt, in all things ſought his glory and not their own; and in and by whom, his glory was diſplayed, and held forth to others.

Ver. 24. Wherefore ſhew ye to them, and before the churches, &c.] This is the concluſion of the Apoſtle, upon ſumming up the characters of theſe meſſengers; and his exhortation is, that ſince they were perſons of ſo much note and worth, as they ought to be received with great marks of reſpect and affection, ſo they would take care, evidently to make it appear to them who were ſent by the churches, and before the churches, or before them who perſonated the churches; or ſo as that it might be known by the churches from whence they came, when they returned with their report; or be evident to the churches in Judea, when their liberality ſhould be brought to them: the proof of your love; to Chriſt and his poor members, how hearty and ſincere it was: and of our boaſting on your behalf; how willing and forward they were to this good work, and how liberal they would be.

CHAP. IX.

THE Apoſtle proceeds in this chapter upon the ſame ſubject, the making a collection for the poor ſaints; gives the reaſon why he ſent the brethren to them on this account; directs to the manner in which this ſervice ſhould be performed, and ſubjoins ſome freſh arguments to encourage them to it. As for the miniſtration itſelf, he ſuggeſts, it might ſeem needleſs to ſay any more about it, ſince he had ſaid ſo much already in the preceding chapter, ver. 1. and eſpecially ſeeing they were ſo forward to it, and were even prepared for it a year ago; of which the Apoſtle had boaſted to the Macedonian churches, ver. 2. and whereas it might be objected, that ſince there was ſuch an inclination in them to this good work, why did he ſend theſe brethren to them? the reaſon of this he gives, ver. 3, 4. that they might get their collection ready againſt the time he came, leſt ſhould any of the Macedonians come along with him, and this collection not be made, his glorying of them would be in vain, and both he and they would be aſhamed; wherefore he ſent them before-hand to prevent every thing of this kind, and that their collection might appear to be not done in a covetous, niggardly way, but bountifully and chearfully, ver. 5. which manner he directs unto, and encourages from the advantages of it, under the metaphorical phraſes of ſowing and reaping, intimating, that as a man ſows, ſo he reaps; or in proportion to his giving, is he bleſſed, ver. 6. wherefore he adviſes to give heartily, freely, and chearfully, and that from this conſideration, becauſe chearful giving is acceptable to God, being like himſelf, ver. 7. who, as he loves, ſo he rewards the chearful giver; and as he is able to give him abundance, ſo he does, whereby he is more qualified and fitted for ſuch liberal ſervice, ver. 8. And this is confirmed by a paſſage of ſcripture cited out of Pſ. cxii. 9. ſhewing, that he that gives bountifully to the poor is ever regarded by the Lord, ver. 9. and which is further proved from the general courſe of providence, which ſo multiplies and increaſes the ſeed ſown in the earth, that it uſually miniſters ſeed to the ſower, and bread to the eater; to which the Apoſtle had alluded in the uſe of theſe metaphorical expreſſions; or he puts up a prayer that there might, or delivers out a promiſe that there would be a like increaſe in giving liberally, as in ſowing plentifully, ver. 10. And then he makes uſe of a new argument, ſtirring up to bountifulneſs, taken from the glory which is brought to God through thankſgiving to him, from the poor and needy, ſupplied by the liberality of thoſe whoſe hearts he had opened, ver. 11. On which argument he enlarges, ſhewing, that not only by this bounty the wants of the poor are ſupplied, and thankſgivings offered up to God on that account; but alſo the poor ſaints are led to glorify God for ſending his Goſpel to theſe their benefactors, and giving them his grace to ſubmit unto it, which had had ſuch an influence upon them as to cauſe them to communicate to their neceſſities in ſuch a generous manner, ver. 12, 13. To which he adds another argument, taken from the prayers of the poor ſaints, for thoſe who liberally contributed to them, that they might proſper in body and ſoul, in things temporal and ſpiritual, ver. 14. And the chapter is concluded with a thankſgiving to God for the grace beſtowed upon all the churches, and particularly for the gift of Chriſt to the ſons of men; which contains in it another argument for beneficence and liberality, ver. 15.

Ver. 1. For as touching the miniſtring to the ſaints, &c.] It looks at firſt ſight as if the Apoſtle was entering upon a new ſubject, tho' by what follows it appears to be the ſame; for by miniſtring to the ſaints, he does not mean the miniſtry of the Goſpel to them; nor that mutual aſſiſtance members of churches are to give each other; but either the fellowſhip of miniſtring to the ſaints, which the churches had intreated him, and his fellow miniſters, to take upon them, namely, to take the charge of their collections, and diſtribute them to the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem; or rather theſe collections themſelves, and their liberality in them: with reſpect to which he ſays, it is ſuperfluous for me to write to you; that is, he thought it unneceſſary to ſay any more upon that head, becauſe he had uſed ſo many arguments already to engage them in it, in the foregoing chapter; and becauſe he had ſent three brethren to them, who well underſtood the nature of this ſervice, and were very capable of ſpeaking to it, and of enforcing the reaſonings already uſed; and more eſpecially he judged it needleſs to dwell on this ſubject, for the reaſons following.

Ver. 2. For I know the forwardneſs of your mind, &c.] How that they were willing of themſelves to engage, in this good work; how readily they came into it; what a chearful diſpoſition of mind they ſhewed towards it; and how forward they were to begin the collection: for which I boaſt of you to them of Macedonia; he had done it before, which had put them upon the like ſervice, and he ſtill continued to boaſt of them, that Achaia was ready a year ago: not that their collection was ready made ſo long ago; but they had ſhewn a readineſs of mind, as to every good work, ſo to this of communicating to the ſaints a year ago, when they made a beginning, tho' as yet had not finiſhed. By Achaia is meant, the inhabitants of Achaia. The Arabic verſion renders it, the citizens of Achaia; of this country, ſee the note on Acts xviii. 12. It is ſometimes taken in a large ſenſe, and deſigns Greece, and includes the countries of Doris, Hellas, Ætolia, Locri, Phocis, Bœotia, Attica, and Megaris; and had its name, as ſome ſay, from the frequent inundation of waters; and others, from one of the three generals of the Pelaſgi, who were of this name; and ſometimes it is taken ſtrictly and properly for the country of the Peloponneſus, or the Morea. And ſo Druſius, out of Heſychius, has obſerved, that the Achæans were Greeks; but properly they were they that inhabited that part of Peloponneſus, called Achaia; and theſe ſeem to be intended here, The Goſpel was preached in theſe parts with ſucceſs; Epenetus, whom the Apoſtle Paul ſalutes, Rom. xvi. 5. and the houſe of Stephanas he mentions, 1 Cor. xvi. 15. were the firſt-fruits of it; and in proceſs of time ſeveral churches were here gathered, and which continued for ſeveral ages. In the ſecond century there was a ſynod in Achaia, concerning the time of keeping Eaſter, in which Bacchylus, biſhop of Corinth preſided; in the beginning of the fourth century, the biſhops of Achaia were preſent at the council of Nice, and in the ſame century, biſhops out of this country aſſiſted at the ſynod in Sardica; in the fifth century there were many churches in Achaia, and the biſhops of them were preſent in the Chalcedon ſynod; out of this country went ſeveral biſhops, in the ſeventh century, to Conſtantinople, and were in the ſixth ſynod there; and in the eighth century there were biſhops of Achaia in the Nicene ſynod[d]: here by Achaia are deſigned the churches of Chriſt, which were in that part of Greece in which Corinth ſtood, and of which that was the metropolis; ſo that when the Apoſtle ſays Achaia was ready, his meaning is more particularly, that the Corinthians were ready: and, adds he, your zeal hath provoked very many; or the zeal which is of you; which ſprung from, and was occaſioned by them; for not the zeal of the Corinthians is here intended, as ſeems at firſt view, but that emulation which was ſtirred up in ſome of the leading perſons among the Macedonians, upon hearing how ready they at Corinth were to miniſter to the neceſſitous brethren; and the zeal which appeared in theſe principal men, which was very warm, and yet prudent and ſeaſonable, wrought very much on the minds of others, who led by their example, contributed in a very generous and unexpected manner. In the Greek text it is, the zeal out of you; or, as the Arabic verſion renders it, the zeal that aroſe from you, which was occaſioned by them.

Ver. 3. Yet have I ſent the brethren, &c.] Titus, and the other two mentioned in the foregoing chapter: one manuſcript reads, we have ſent; and the Ethiopic verſion, they have ſent, that is, the Macedonians; but the common reading is beſt. It might be objected, that ſince the Apoſtle knew the forwardneſs of their minds, how ready they were a year ago, and had boaſted ſo much of their liberality, that it muſt be unneceſſary to ſend the brethren to them, to ſtir them up to this work; which objection is prevented by obſerving the reaſon of his ſending them: leſt our boaſting of you ſhould be in vain in this behalf; or in this part, in this particular thing, על הדא צבותא, concerning this buſineſs, or affair of beneficence to the poor, as the Syriac verſion renders it. He had boaſted of them with reſpect to other things beſides this; but he was chiefly concerned, knowing the frailty and changeableneſs of human nature, and how poſſible it was that their forwardneſs might abate, and they grow cold and indifferent to ſuch ſervice, leſt his glorying of them ſhould be in vain in this particular inſtance; wherefore he ſent the brethren to put them on, that as they had begun they would finiſh: that as I ſaid ye may be ready. That as he had ſaid to the Macedonians, that they were ready in mind, it might appear to be ſo; or as he had ordered them in his former Epiſtle, they might be actually ready; have their collection ready made, ſo that there might be no gathering when he came.

Ver. 4. Leſt haply if they of Macedonia come with me, &c.] The Apoſtle had determined to come himſelf, tho' he was afterwards prevented by providence, but could not be certain of the coming of the Macedonian brethren with him; however, as it was probable that ſome of them would come, whoſe hearts were ſo much in this work, therefore he judged it fit and proper to ſend the brethren beforehand, in caſe they ſhould come: and find you unprepared; not ſo ready for this ſervice as had been boaſted of, and the collection not finiſhed, which had been begun a year ago. We (that we ſay not you) ſhould be aſhamed in this ſame confident boaſting; or in this ſame ſubſtance, or ſubſiſtence of boaſting; a boaſting, which he thought, they had the moſt ſolid and ſubſtantial ground and foundation to proceed upon; which, ſhould it come to nothing, muſt cauſe ſhame both in the Apoſtles, who had ſo largely, and with ſo much aſſurance, boaſted of them; and in the Corinthians, who muſt be put to the bluſh, when it ſhould be told them how much they had been boaſted of with reſpect to their readineſs, and yet were unprepared: ſo תוחלת, hope, expectation, confidence, is rendered by the Septuagint καυχημα, boaſting, Prov. xi. 7. and in Pſ. xxxix. 5. υποστασις, the word here uſed. And ſome copies, and alſo the Vulgate Latin verſion, only read, in this ſubſtance, or glorying, and leave out boaſting as ſuperfluous.

Ver. 5. Therefore I thought it neceſſary to exhort the brethren, &c.] Titus, and the other two, on whom he did not lay his commands, or apoſtolical injunctions, according to the authority and dignity of his office; only exhorted or beſought them, and which was judged by him very needful and proper at this time: that they would go before-hand unto you; before him, and the Macedonian brethren that might probably come with him: and make up before-hand your bounty; or bleſſing; for any preſent ſent, or delivered, by one perſon to another, as a token of their friendſhip, favour, and good-will, whether in a neceſſitous caſe or not, was by the Jews called ברכה, a bleſſing; ſee Gen. xxxiii. 11. 1 Sam. xxv. 27. and eſpecially what is contributed for the relief of the poor, may be ſo called, becauſe it is not only a part of the bounty of providence, and bleſſings of life, with which men are favoured; but is alſo one way of bleſſing God for the mercies he has bleſſed them with, and likewiſe of bleſſing, or doing good to fellow-creatures and chriſtians. Moreover, becauſe for this the poor bleſs their benefactors; and it is a bleſſing itſelf to do good to others. Now the Apoſtle judg'd it expedient to ſend the brethren before-hand to compleat and finiſh this good work begun. Whereof, ſays he, ye had notice before; in his former Epiſtle, ch. xvi. 1, 2. or which was promiſed before by them; or had been ſpoken of ſo much before by him to other churches: that the ſame might be ready, as a matter of bounty, or bleſſing, not as of covetouſneſs; that is, that the collection being ready made, largely and liberally, it might appear to be a free generous action, and ſhew what a noble bountiful diſpoſition they were of; and not performed as covetous men uſually do what they do, ſparingly, tenaciouſly, keeping their money as long as they can, being loth to part with it.

Ver. 6. But this I ſay, &c.] This the Apoſtle would have the Corinthians take notice of, and well conſider, it being what he could aver for truth, by obſervation and experience; that as in things natural, ſo in things of a moral and ſpiritual kind, he which ſoweth ſparingly ſhall reap alſo ſparingly, and he which ſoweth bountifully, or with bleſſings, ſhall reap alſo bountifully; or with bleſſings; as a man ſows, ſo ſhall he reap; the one is in proportion to the other. Sowing and reaping are here uſed in a metaphorical ſenſe. The former ſignifies doing acts of beneficence and liberality. So it is uſed in the Old Teſtament, and in Jewiſh writings; ſee Eccl. ix. 6. Iſ. xxxii. 20. The interpretation of the latter text, give me leave to produce out of the Talmud [e], as follows, and which will ſerve to illuſtrate this of the Apoſtle's.

“ the law, as an ox to the yoke, and an aſs to the “ burden.” There is a good deal of likeneſs between ſowing the ſeed in the earth, and doing of alms, or acts of beneficence. The ſeed that is ſown is what is ſelected and reſerved out of the ſtock expended or ſold off, which if not done, there would be no proviſion for futurity; ſo that which a man gives for the relief of the neceſſitous, is what he lays by him in ſtore of what God has proſpered him with; in doing which he may hope for a fruitful harveſt, whereas otherwiſe he could expect none: as ſeed is caſt from, and ſcattered about by the ſower all over the field; ſo what is given to the poor, it is parted with unto them, and ſpread among them, every one has a portion; and it looks like a diminution of a man's ſubſtance, and as if it would never return with any advantage; tho' it does, as in a natural, ſo in a metaphorical ſenſe. The ſower caſts and ſcatters his ſeed with an open hand; was he to gripe it in his fiſt, or only let go a grain of corn or wheat here and there, he would have but a poor harveſt; ſo the chearful giver opens his hand wide, and bountifully ſupplies the wants of the needy; who, as the ſower caſts his ſeed on the empty field, ſo he beſtows his bounty on indigent perſons, on all men in want, eſpecially the houſhold of faith: and, as when he has done, he harrows the ground, and covers the ſeed under the earth, where it lies hid, and is very unpromiſing for a while, and yet he exerciſes faith, hope, and patience with reſpect to an harveſt; ſo the generous benefactor does what he does in as private a manner as may be; and tho' for a time his good deeds may ſeem to be attended with little proſpect of reward, yet in the end they certainly ſhall; for as a man ſows, ſo ſhall he reap: if he ſows, that is, gives nothing, he ſhall reap nothing; if he ſows but little, he ſhall reap little; and if he ſows much, he ſhall reap much; and that of the ſelf-ſame kind which he ſows; as he is liberal in things temporal, ſo ſhall he proſper and ſucceed in the ſame; ſee Prov. iii. 9, 10. and xi. 24, 25. Iſ. xxxii. 8. Gal. vi. 7, 8, 9, 10.

Ver. 7. Every man according as he purpoſeth in his heart, &c.] Which is not to be underſtood of the quantity, or any ſet ſum he has fixed upon in his mind to give; but of the quality or nature of giving; or of the manner in which he is to give: ſo let him give; of his own will and free choice, from his very heart; not as directed and forced by others, but according to his own counſel and determination: not grudgingly; or not of grief; with pain and uneaſineſs of mind, grieving at parting with what is given, reflecting on the perſons that move him to it, or on the objects moved for. The Jews[g] reckon this the loweſt degree of all in giving alms; when a man gives to any one, בעצב, with grief, to which the Apoſtle ſeems to refer: who adds, or of neceſſity; of force, by coaction, being obliged to it by the influence, example, or commands of ſuperiors; or through the powerful motives, or prevailing intreaties of others; for without theſe, men, according to their abilities, ſhould give of themſelves freely and liberally: for God loveth a chearful giver; or one that gives, בסבר פנים יפות, with a chearful countenance, as the Jews[h] ſay; or as elſewhere[i], with a chearful heart: their rule is this, “ he that doth the com-“ mandment, i. e. alms, let him do it, בלב שמח, “ with a chearful heart.” Who looks pleaſantly on the perſon or perſons that move him to it, or on the object to whom he gives; who parts with his money willingly, and takes delight in doing good to others; ſuch givers God loves: not that their chearful beneficence is the cauſe of his ſpecial peculiar love to them in his own heart, which ariſes from nothing in man, or done by him; but the meaning is, that God does well to ſuch perſons; ſhews his love to them; he lets them know how kindly he takes ſuch acts of theirs, by proſpering and ſucceeding them in their worldly affairs. In the Septuagint in Prov. xxii. 8. are theſe words, God bleſſes a chearful man, and a giver, which the Apoſtle refers to.

Ver. 8. And God is able to make all grace abound towards you, &c.] By all grace is meant, not the love and favour of God, the ſource of all bleſſings enjoyed in time and eternity; nor the bleſſings of grace, the fruits of it; nor the Goſpel which reveals them; nor the various graces of the Spirit implanted in regeneration; nor gifts of grace, fitting men for miniſterial ſervice; all which God is able to make to abound, and does, when he gives enlarged diſcoveries of his love, makes freſh applications of covenant-grace, leads more fully into the knowledge of his Goſpel, carries on the work of his grace in the ſoul, and calls forth grace into act and exerciſe, and increaſes gifts beſtowed; nor even merely temporal bleſſings of every ſort, which men are unworthy of, are all the gifts of his goodneſs, and are given to his people in a covenant way; and which he can, and often does increaſe: but by it is meant all that goodneſs, beneficence, and liberality exerciſed towards the poor members of Chriſt; God is able, and he will, and it ought to be believed that he will, cauſe to return with an increaſe, all that which is expended in relieving the neceſſities of the ſaints; that is not thrown away and loſt, which is communicated to them, but ſhall be repaid with uſe and intereſt, be reſtored with abundance, any more than the ſeed which the huſbandman caſts into the earth; for as God is able, and has promiſed, and will, and does cauſe that to ſpring up again, and bring forth an abundant increaſe, ſo will he multiply the ſeed of beneficence, and increaſe the fruits of righteouſneſs. This now contains a new argument to move to liberality, and an antidote againſt the fears of want, which perſons are ſometimes preſſed with, and tend to prevent their bountiful acts of charity: that ye always having all ſufficiency in all things; that is, God is able to increaſe, and will ſo increaſe your worldly ſubſtance, that you ſhall have a ſufficiency, a perfect and entire ſufficiency; enough for yourſelves and families, for the entertainment of your friends, and the relief of the poor; which ſhall give you ſatiſfaction and contentment, and that at all times, and with reſpect to every thing neceſſary for you, as to food and raiment, that ſo ye may abound to every good work; as to all good works, ſo to this of beneficence in particular, and to every branch of it, as feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and the like.

Ver. 9. As it is written, &c.] In Pſ. cxii. 9. where it is ſaid of the good and righteous man, he hath diſperſed, ממוניה, his riches, his ſubſtance, as the Chaldee paraphraſe adds by way of explanation; not in a profuſe extravagant manner, but with wiſdom and prudence, and yet largely and liberally, according to his ability. Juſt as the ſower ſcatters his ſeed here, and there, and in every place, with an open and wide hand, ſo the good man diſtributes to all in neceſſity, and makes them all partakers of his bounty; he gives not only to one, but to many, and not to all without diſtinction he meets with, whether neceſſitous or not: he hath given to the poor. This explains the former phraſe, and points out the perſons, the objects of the good man's bounty and compaſſion: his righteouſneſs remaineth for ever. This is not to be underſtood of his juſtifying righteouſneſs, as if that conſiſted of, and was eſtabliſhed upon his works of bounty and charity to the poor; nor of his fame among men on account of his liberality; nor of any reward in another world; but of his beneficence itſelf, it being common with the Jews to call alms, צדקה, righteouſneſs; ſee the note on Matt. vi. 1. and the ſenſe is, that what ſuch a man beſtows in charity on the poor ſhall not be loſt, but ſhall be like the ſeed caſt into the earth, ſhall ſpring up again, and bring forth fruit with increaſe, according to what follows.

[h] Maimon. ib. §. 13.

[i] Vajikra Rabba, fol. 174. 1. Paraſh. 34.

Ver. 10. Now he that miniſtreth ſeed to the ſower, and bread for your food, &c.] For ſo the words ought to be pointed and read, as is clear from Iſ. lv. 10. to which they refer; and are a periphraſis of God, who ſo bleſſes the ſeed that is caſt into the earth, that it brings forth ſuch an increaſe, as that there is a ſufficiency of bread for food to the eater for the preſent year, and a ſufficiency of ſeed to ſow with again the next year; and that God that does this every year, is able to miniſter to, or ſupply your preſent neceſſities; and to multiply your ſeed ſown, and increaſe the fruits of your righteouſneſs: tho' ſome conſider theſe as a wiſh or prayer of the Apoſtle's, that God would do all this for them. Some copies, and the Vulgate Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic verſions, read all in the future tenſe, he will miniſter to you, or ſupply you, and will multiply your ſeed ſown, and will increaſe the fruits of your righteouſneſs; and ſo contain a promiſe of a divine bleſſing, encouraging to liberality with chearfulneſs, by ſtrengthening their faith in the providence of God; who as he multiplies, not the ſeed expended in the family, or ſold at market, or as in the barn, or laid up for a better price, but the ſeed ſown in the field, ſo he will multiply the ſubſtance of men; not what they lay out on themſelves and families, or lay up in their coffers, but what they give away, or beſtow on Chriſt's poor: and all effects which follow acts of liberality, and which are here deſigned by fruits of righteouſneſs, ſuch as a good name among men, bleſſing, praiſe, thankſgiving, and proſperity in things temporal and ſpiritual, theſe God will abundantly increaſe; ſome of which are mentioned in the following verſes. So alms with the Jews is not only called צדקה, righteouſneſs, but ſeed ſown. Thus Jarchi interprets Pſ. xxxvii. 26. and his ſeed is bleſſed, he that, זורע, ſows righteouſneſs or alms, its end ſhall be for a bleſſing, or in the end he ſhall be bleſſed; and the phraſe, rain righteouſneſs, in Hoſ. x. 12. is by the Septuagint rendered, γεννηματα δικαιοσυνης, fruits of righteouſneſs, the ſame as here, from whence it ſeems to be taken.

Ver. 11. Being inriched in every thing to all bountifulneſs, &c.] Theſe words may be connected with ver. 8. the 9th and 10th verſes being included in a parentheſis; and the ſenſe is, that God was not only able to give them a ſufficiency, and would give them a ſufficiency of temporal things, as food and raiment to their ſatisfaction, and contentment for themſelves, but a fulneſs, an exuberancy, an overplus alſo; not for luxury and intemperance, but that having ſuch an affluence in all the good things of life, they might at all times, and upon every occaſion, exerciſe a bountiful diſpoſition in relieving the poor: which cauſeth thro' us thankſgiving to God; not their riches and fulneſs, but their liberal diſtribution of them to the poor ſaints, to which they were ſtirred up by the Apoſtles; who were thankful to God who had ſo well ſucceeded their exhortations and advice, and which was the cauſe of thankſgivings in others: and ſince therefore ſuch beneficence tended to the glory of God, as giving of thanks makes for his glory, this then ought to be attended to, and diligently performed; and ſo it furniſhes out a new argument to this good work, which is enlarged upon in the following verſes.

Ver. 12. For the adminiſtration of this ſervice, &c.] Not only by the Corinthians, and others, in giving and collecting, but by the Apoſtles in miniſtring and diſtributing their contributions to the poor ſaints, produced theſe two very good effects: for it not only ſupplieth the wants of the ſaints; makes up their deficiences, relieves their neceſſities, and furniſhes them with what is comfortable and refreſhing to them under their many ſorrowful circumſtances, which is anſwering a very valuable end: but is abundant alſo by many thankſgivings to God; it has over and above this excellency in it, or its excellent uſe is enhanced, and abundantly appears, by this conſideration; that many precious ſouls are ſent hereby to the throne of grace to give thanks to God, who put it into the hearts of the Apoſtles to move the churches on their behalf, and who wrought upon them ſo chearfully and largely to contribute to their neceſſities.

Ver. 13. Whiles by the experiment of this miniſtration, &c.] That is, the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem having a ſpecimen, a proof, an experience of the liberality of the Gentile churches miniſtred to them by the Apoſtles, firſt, they glorify God; by giving thanks unto him, acknowledging him to be the author of all the grace and goodneſs which they, and others, were partakers of; particularly for your profeſſed ſubjection to the Goſpel of Chriſt. The Goſpel of Chriſt is the doctrine of grace, life, and ſalvation by Chriſt, of which he is the author, as God, the ſubject-matter, as mediator, and the preacher, as man: ſubjection to it lies in a hearty receiving of the doctrines of it, and a chearful ſubmiſſion to its ordinances; and this ſubjection was profeſſed, declared, and made known to the churches in Judea, by their ſending ſo largely to their relief, which they would never have done, if they had not cordially embraced the Goſpel of Chriſt; for true faith in the doctrine of grace, and a ſincere obedience to it, are beſt declared and known by love to the ſaints; for faith works by love, both to Chriſt, and to his people: next they glorified God by giving thanks to him, for your liberal diſtribution unto them, and unto all men; which ſhows, that though they were truly grateful, and heartily thankful for the favours they themſelves received, yet not for theſe only, but for what other poor ſaints, in other places, were alſo partakers of; yea, that in the firſt place they were more ſenſibly affected with, and more eſpecially thankful for the grace of God beſtowed on the Gentiles, in ſending the Goſpel among them, and bringing them to a ſubjection to it, than for the temporal good they received from them.

Ver. 14. And by their prayer for you, &c.] The ſenſe is, they glorify God on your behalf, making mention of you in all their prayers at the throne of grace, giving thanks to God for your liberality to them, and imploring all the bleſſings both of the upper and nether ſprings upon you; and this contains another argument, engaging the Corinthians to liberality, taken from the prayers of the ſaints for them: or the words may be connected with ver. 12. the 13th verſe being in a parentheſis; and ſhew not only that this miniſtring to the poor ſaints relieved their wants, and cauſed thankſgivings to God, but abounded in this fruit alſo; it put them upon daily and importunate ſupplications to God for their welfare both in ſoul and body. Which long after you; or earneſtly deſire you; that is, to ſee you, as the Ethiopic verſion adds; or exceedingly love you: their affections are wonderfully drawn out to you; not ſo much, or barely for your kindneſs to them, as for the exceeding grace of God in you; for that large meaſure of it which was beſtowed upon them in regeneration, as their unfeigned faith, lively hope, and ſincere love; and for all that grace which was diſplayed in their juſtification, adoption, ſanctification, and whole ſalvation.

Ver. 15. Thanks be unto God for his unſpeakable gift.] Meaning either the goodneſs of God, both to the giver and receiver; for that the one gave ſo liberally, and the other received ſo largely, was from the grace of God, who ſo powerfully inclines the hearts of his children to do good, and offer ſo willingly of what he has given them, and who ſo wonderfully provides for the ſupply of the poor and needy; or elſe that exceeding grace of God which was ſo eminently, largely, and freely beſtowed on the Corinthians in their effectual vocation; or, as ſome think, Chriſt himſelf, who is to be ſure the unſpeakable gift of God; who, though his Son, his own Son, his only-begotten Son, the Son of his love, his Son and heir, yet he gave him to be a covenant to the people, the head of his church, the ſaviour of ſinners, and to be a ſacrifice in their room and ſtead: none can tell how great this gift is, which is ſo ſuitable and ſeaſonable, ſo large and comprehenſive, nor declare the love both of the Father and the Son, expreſſed in it. Thankful we ſhould be for it; and our thankfulneſs ſhould be ſhewn by highly prizing and valuing this gift; by laying the whole ſtreſs of our ſalvation on Chriſt; by aſcribing all the glory of it to him; by giving up ourſelves to him, and to his intereſt; by walking worthy of him in all well-pleaſing, and by communicating to the ſupport of his cauſe, and the ſupply of his poor miniſters and members. And thus the Apoſtle tacitly ſuggeſts one of the ſtrongeſt arguments that can be uſed, to ſtir up the ſaints to generoſity and liberality, taken from the wonderful grace of God in the gift of his Son; for if he of his free grace, and unmerited love, has given his Son to, and for his people, and with him all things freely, both the riches of grace and glory, then they ought freely and bountifully to communicate temporal good things to the poor members of Chriſt, for whom God and Chriſt have an equal love, as for themſelves.

CHAP. X.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle has chiefly to do with the falſe teachers, and it is taken up in refuting their calumnies of him, and in expoſing their boaſting of themſelves; and as he goes along, he takes notice of the efficacy of the Goſpel, and of the ſucceſs and extent of it, as it was preached by him, and other Goſpel miniſters, and points at the proper manner and ground of glorying. And whereas the falſe teachers had repreſented him as a mean-ſpirited man, as well as his outward aſpect was contemptible, and that he had not that authority and courage he boaſted of, he deſcribes himſelf by thoſe characters they had reproached him with: by his name Paul, which ſignified little, they ſuggeſting that he was little in ſoul, as well as in body; by his modeſty and humility, when he was with the Corinthians, and by his boldneſs, now abſent from them: and he intreats them by the meekneſs and gentleneſs of Chriſt, which he imitated, and they ought alſo, that they would not join in thoſe ſneers, nor reproach him for theſe things, ver. 1. and that they would ſo behave, that when he came among them, he might have no occaſion of uſing that power and authority, which the falſe teachers called bluſter and boldneſs; and which he had thought and determined in his own mind to exerciſe on ſome who traduced him and his fellow-miniſters as carnal, ſelfiſh perſons, ver. 2. which calumny he removes by owning, that they walked in the fleſh, in the body, and were ſubject to imperfections, as men; but denies that their miniſterial warfare or ſervice was managed in a carnal and worldly, or in a weak way and manner, ver. 3. aſſigning this reaſon for it, becauſe the weapons they made uſe of, in the warfare of their miniſtry, to defend truth, and annoy the enemy, to enlarge Chriſt's kingdom, and weaken ſatan's, were not carnal, weak, and worldly, but ſpiritual and efficacious, through the power of God that accompanied them; and which appeared by the uſe they were of to the demoliſhing the ſtrong holds of the fleſh, and bringing down the haughty and lofty imaginations of the fleſhly mind, which were oppoſed to the knowledge of God, and the refuting all the ſophiſms of fleſhly wiſdom, and carnal reaſonings againſt the Goſpel of Chriſt. This was the influence it had on ſome thro' the power of divine grace, whereby they became obedient to Chriſt, and ſubject to his word and ordinances, ver. 4, 5. whilſt on others, as on Elymas the ſorcerer, who ſought to pervert the right ways of God, the apoſtolical power was exerciſed in a way of juſt puniſhment and awful vengeance, ver. 6. The Apoſtle moreover ſuggeſts to the Corinthians, that they judged of him, and the falſe teachers, according to the outward appearance of things, which was wrong: however, let theſe men make ever ſo great a ſhow in the fleſh, or what pretenſions ſoever to chriſtianity, to being the members and miniſters of Chriſt, the Apoſtle would have them obſerve, that he, and thoſe with him, were, and were to be looked upon as equally the ſame, ver. 7. nay, ſhould he exalt himſelf above them, and affirm he had an authority ſuperior to theirs, which he deſcribes by the efficient cauſe of it, the Lord, and by its end, edification, and not deſtruction, he ſhould have no reaſon to be aſhamed, ſince he was capable of giving proof of it, ver. 8. however, he would ſay no more of this for the preſent, leſt he ſhould ſtrengthen the calumny caſt upon him, that it was his way to terrify by his letters, with bluſtering menaces, of his power and authority, ver. 9. and which calumny is more fully expreſſed in the words of the falſe teachers, who ſaid, that his letters were bold and bluſtring, and by which he would be thought to be a man of power and authority; though, alas! a man of no ſpeech nor preſence, when in perſon among men, and ſo not to be regarded, ver. 10. In anſwer to which the Apoſtle returns, that he would have ſuch a reviler know, that as he was in word by letters when abſent, ſuch would he be found to be in deed when preſent, ver. 11. and then proceeds to expoſe the vain-glorying of the falſe teachers, and to obſerve thoſe things which he, and other faithful miniſters of the word might glory of; tho' they could not give themſelves the liberties they did, and choſe to glory in the Lord; they could not commend themſelves in that bold and inſolent manner, to the contempt of others, when there was no neceſſity for it, as the falſe teachers did, ver. 12. nor could they boaſt of things they never did; of converſions they never were inſtruments of; of the planting of churches they had no concern in; and of ſpreading the Goſpel where they had never been, which was the caſe of theſe men: whereas, whenever they gloried, it was when there was an abſolute neceſſity for it, and always with modeſty, acknowledging the grace and goodneſs of God unto them, and ever with truth; and of their own labours, and not of others; and particularly with reſpect to Corinth, it was with the ſtricteſt regard to truth that they affirmed they were the firſt that preached the Goſpel there, converted ſouls, and planted a Goſpel-church, and hoped they ſhould be the means of ſpreading it further ſtill, ver. 13, 14, 15, 16. However, they did not deſire to glory in themſelves, but in the Lord, from whom they had all their gifts, ſucceſs, and uſefulneſs; and ſo they directed others to do, ver. 17. and that for this reaſon, becauſe he that commends himſelf is not approved of God, but he that is commended by the Lord, ver. 18.

Ver. 1. Now I Paul myſelf beſeech you, &c.] The Apoſtle having ſaid what was neceſſary and proper to ſtir up the Corinthians to a liberal contribution for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, returns to the vindication of himſelf againſt the falſe Apoſtles; and earneſtly entreats the members of this church, by the meekneſs and gentleneſs of Chriſt, not to regard their reproaches, and join with them in them; for did they but conſider the meek and gentle deportment of Chriſt, ſo worthy of his and their imitation, they would ſee there was no reaſon to reflect on him for that part of his conduct, in which he followed his Lord and Maſter; whoſe meekneſs was to be ſeen in the aſſumption of human nature, in the whole of his life and converſation, and in his ſufferings and death; and his gentleneſs of Spirit to be obſerved in his coming into this world, not to judge and condemn it, but that the world might be ſaved; in bearing all indignities and inſults, without being provoked to wrath and revenge; in rebuking his diſciples for the ſeverity of their ſpirits, declaring he came to ſave, and not take away the lives of men; in praying for his enemies, and in his ſilence under all the ill-treatment he met with from the worſt of men. As the Apoſtle had this excellent example before him, which ſerved both to regulate his conduct, and ſupport him under the hard meaſures he met with, ſo he was deſirous to direct others to the obſervance of it, which might be a check upon the ill uſage of him. He here ſpeaks of himſelf in the language of his adverſaries, who meant by theſe characters to expoſe him to ſcorn and contempt: I Paul myſelf; whoſe name the falſe teachers play'd upon, it ſignifying little; and he being little of ſtature, they reproached him for it, and would inſinuate, that as his name was little, and his perſon mean, his bodily preſence weak, and his ſpeech contemptible, that he had a little ſoul, was a man of ſmall knowledge, mean parts, and a very inſignificant miniſter. Now it is as if the Apoſtle ſhould ſay, I am not aſhamed of my name, nor of my perſon, and I am willing to own myſelf the leaſt of the Apoſtles, yea, leſs than the leaſt of all ſaints; but I beg of you by the mild and gentle ſpirit of my Lord and Maſter, whom I am not aſhamed to imitate, that you would not join in thoſe ſneers. I am Paul, αυτος, the ſame in my principles and practice, in my doctrine and life, when preſent and abſent; tho' my enemies ſay the contrary, as that I am ſuch an one, who in preſence am baſe, or humble among you: they ſuggeſted, that when he was at Corinth he was humble and modeſt in his converſation, mild and gentle in all his expreſſions and deportment; and which they interpreted of a meanneſs and baſeneſs of ſpirit, as though he crept and cringed to curry favour with men, to avoid offence, and gain and keep an intereſt among them: but being abſent, am bold toward you; wrote bluſtering, hectoring, terrifying letters, threatening to come with his apoſtolic rod and deliver them up to ſatan, to fright them into a compliance with him.

Ver. 2. But I beſeech you, that I may not be bold when I am preſent, &c.] That is, he entreated them that they would ſo behave for the future, that he might have no occaſion, when he came among them, to uſe that power and authority they called boldneſs, which he had received from Chriſt for edification, and not deſtruction; as for that aſperity and roughneſs with which he wrote, and which was thought to be too ſevere, it was in order to reclaim them, and ſo prevent that ſharpneſs he was empower'd by Chriſt to uſe: for tho' he had ſaid in his former Epiſtle, ch. iv. 21. ſhall I come unto you with a rod or in love? and in the ſpirit of meekneſs? he choſe to come in the latter, rather than with the former; namely, not with that confidence wherewith, ſays he, I think to be bold: by confidence he means the faith of miracles he was poſſeſs'd of, and particularly the power he, and other Apoſtles had, of ſtriking dead or blind incorrigible offenders, or of delivering them to ſatan to undergo ſome corporal puniſhment; which he had been thinking of, and reaſoning about in his own mind, and was almoſt come to a concluſion concerning it, to inflict it upon, and with it to be bold, againſt ſome which think of us as if we walked according to the fleſh; who not barely thought ſo within themſelves, but reaſoned the matter with others, and would fain perſuade them to believe that they did walk in a carnal manner; not that they had the face to ſay, that they walked after the dictates of corrupt nature, or lived in open vice and prophaneneſs; but that they walked in craftineſs, had their converſation in the world with fleſhly wiſdom, ſeeking their own worldly intereſt and ſecular advantage; which is denied by the Apoſtle, ch. i. 12. and was the real caſe, and true picture of the falſe teachers themſelves.

Ver. 3. For tho' we walk in the fleſh, &c.] The Apoſtle removes the calumny of walking after the fleſh, by owning that they were in the fleſh, in the body, in a ſtate of imperfection, attended with many weakneſſes and infirmities, and ſurrounded with a variety of afflictions and ſorrows; in this ſenſe they were, and lived and walked in the fleſh; but then he denies the charge exhibited againſt them, we do not war after the fleſh: every chriſtian's life is a warfare with ſatan, and his principalities and powers, with the world, the men and luſts of it, and with the corruptions of their own hearts; and much more is the life of a miniſter of the Goſpel, who is called forth to meet the adverſary in the gate; to ſtand in the hotteſt place of the battle, and ſuſtain the whole fire and artillery of the enemy; to fight the good fight of faith, endure hardneſs as a good ſoldier of Chriſt, and with the weapons he is furniſhed with to war a good warfare: which is not done after the fleſh; in ſuch a manner as the men of the world wage war with one another; or upon carnal principles; or with carnal ſelfiſh views; or in a weak way and manner; but in a ſpiritual way, with all ſimplicity and diſintereſted views, with great courage and intrepidity of mind.

Ver. 4. For the weapons of our warfare, &c.] By warfare is here meant, not that which is common to all believers, who are enliſted as voluntiers under the captain of their ſalvation, and fight his battles, and are more than conquerors thro' him; but what is peculiar to the miniſters of the Goſpel; and deſigns the miniſterial function, or office, and the diſcharge of it. So the Levitical function, or the miniſterial ſervice of the Levites, is called צבא העבדה, the warfare of the ſervice, Numb. viii. 25. The miniſtry of the word is ſo ſtiled, becauſe that as war is waged in defence of mens rights, properties, and liberties, and for the weakening of an enemy's power and poſſeſſions, and for the enlargement of kingdoms and dominions, ſo this is in defence of the truths and liberty of the Goſpel, that they may continue and abide; for the weakening of ſatan's kingdom, by delivering the lawful captives, taking the prey from the mighty, turning ſouls from the power of ſatan to God, and tranſlating them from the kingdom of darkneſs into the kingdom of Chriſt Jeſus; and ſo for the enlargement of his kingdom, by ſpreading the Goſpel far and near. The weapons with which this warfare is managed are the ſcriptures of truth, the ſword of the Spirit, the word of God; and which indeed are an armoury, out of which may be taken weapons of all ſorts, both offenſive and defenſive; ſuch as ſerve both to eſtabliſh and ſecure the doctrines of the Goſpel, and to refute the errors of the wicked: to which may be added all thoſe gifts which Chriſt has received for, and gives to men, qualifying them for the work of the miniſtry, and for the underſtanding of the ſacred writings; together with all thoſe means made uſe of by them for their improvement in ſpiritual knowledge; ſuch as diligent reading the word of God, and the labours of his faithful ſervants, frequent meditation thereon, and earneſt prayer to God for more light and experience. Alſo the various graces of the Spirit, with which they are endued, may be taken into the account; ſuch as the breaſtplate of faith in Chriſt, and love to himſelf, his people, word, ordinances, cauſe and intereſt; the helmet of ſalvation, hope, the girdle of truth and faithfulneſs, and the excellent grace of patience to endure all hardſhips, reproaches, inſults, afflictions and perſecutions chearfully; and finally, all the acts of their miniſtration, ſuch as preaching, prayer, the adminiſtration of ordinances, and laying on of cenſures, with the conſent of the church. Now theſe weapons are not carnal; ſuch as the men of the world fight with, not the temporal ſword; for Chriſt ſent forth his Apoſtles without that, naked and unarmed amidſt their enemies, his kingdom not being of this world, and ſo not to be defended and propagated in ſuch a way; or as the weapons the falſe Apoſtles uſed, ſuch as natural eloquence, fleſhly wiſdom, carnal reaſon, cunning craftineſs, the hidden things of diſhoneſty, and great ſwelling words of vanity; or they were not weak and impotent, which is ſometimes the ſignification of fleſh; ſee Gen. vi. 3. Iſ. xxxi. 3. but mighty thro' God; powerful and effectual thro' the bleſſing of God, and the influences of his grace and Spirit for the converſion of ſinners, the edification of ſaints, the defence of truth, the confutation of error, the deſtruction of ſatan's kingdom, and the enlargement of Chriſt's: for theſe weapons are not powerful of themſelves; they are paſſive inſtruments, which are only efficacious when uſed by a ſuperior hand; when the Goſpel-miniſtration is attended with the demonſtration of the Spirit, and of power; and then they are ſerviceable to the pulling down of ſtrong holds. The alluſion ſeems to be to the falling of the walls of Jericho, at the ſound of rams horns, which muſt be aſcribed not to thoſe inſtruments, which were in themſelves weak and deſpicable, but to the power of God that went along with the ſound of them. By ſtrong holds are meant, the ſtrong holds of ſin and ſatan; ſuch as unbelief, pride, hardneſs of heart, &c. with which the heart of man is walled (ſo קירות לב, the walls of the heart, Jer. iv. 19.) againſt God and Chriſt, and the Goſpel of the grace of God, and by which ſatan fortifies himſelf, and keeps the palace and goods in peace, until the everlaſting doors are thrown open, which were bolted and barr'd; and theſe walls of defence are pull'd down by the king of glory, who enters in, which is uſually done by the power of God in the miniſtry of the Goſpel: ſo ſins are called ſtrong holds, fortreſſes, and bulwarks by the Talmudiſts[k], who give this as the ſenſe of Eccl. ix. 14. "a little city, "this is the body; and few men in it, theſe are the "members; and there came a great king againſt it, "and beſieged it, this is the evil imagination, luſt, "or concupiſcence; and built againſt it, מצודים, "great bulwarks, or fortreſſes, אלה עונות, theſe "are iniquities." And ſo Philo the Jew[l] ſpeaks of, τα βεβαια της κακιας ερεισματα, the firm munitions of vice being broken down. Or elſe by them may be meant the fortreſſes of a man's own righteouſneſs, holineſs, good works, and moral duties, in which he entrenches, and thinks himſelf ſafe; which the Spirit of God, in the miniſtry of the word, blows a blaſt upon, and which are caſt down by it, that revealing a better righteouſneſs, even the righteouſneſs of Chriſt; or elſe the fleſhly wiſdom, rhetorical eloquence, and ſophiſms of falſe teachers, with which they endeavoured to fortify themſelves againſt the doctrines of the Goſpel, but in vain.

Ver. 5. Caſting down imaginations, &c.] Or reaſonings; the carnal reaſonings of the minds of natural men againſt God, his providences and purpoſes, againſt Chriſt, and the methods of ſalvation, and every truth of the Goſpel; which are all diſproved, ſilenced, and confounded, by the preaching of the word, which, tho' reckoned the fooliſhneſs and weakneſs of God, appears to be wiſer and ſtronger than men; and whereby the wiſdom of the wiſe is deſtroy'd, and the underſtanding of the prudent brought to nothing: and every high thing that exalteth itſelf againſt the knowledge of God; every proud thought of the heart, every great ſwelling word of vanity, every big look, even all the lofty looks and haughtineſs of men, with every airy flight, and high towring imagination, reaſoning, and argument advanced againſt the Goſpel of Chriſt; which is here meant by the knowledge of God, and ſo called, becauſe it is the means of leading ſouls into the knowledge of God, even into a better knowledge of him than can be attained to, either by the light of nature, or law of Moſes; to a knowledge of him, and acquaintance with him in Chriſt the mediator, in whom the light of the knowledge of the glory of God is given; and with which knowledge of God eternal life is connected, yea, in this it conſiſts; it is the beginning of it, and will iſſue in it. And bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Chriſt; or carrying captive the whole underſtanding; that is, ſo illuſtrating it with divine light, that it clearly ſees Chriſt to be the alone, able, willing, full, and ſuitable ſaviour, and ſo becomes obedient to him, both as a ſaviour and a king; ſuch an enlightened ſoul looks to him alone for life and ſalvation, ventures on him, and relies upon him, and is deſirous and willing to be ſaved by him in his own way; he receives and embraces all his truths and doctrines with faith and love, and obeys them from the heart, and chearfully and willingly ſubmits to all his commands and ordinances; for tho' he is taken by the grace of God, and all his ſtrong holds, reaſonings, and high thoughts are demoliſhed by the power of God in the Goſpel, and he himſelf is carried captive, yet not againſt, but with his will, to be a voluntary ſubject of Chriſt, and chearfully to ſubmit to the ſceptre of his kingdom.

Ver. 6. And having in a readineſs to revenge all diſobedience, &c.] Not with the temporal ſword, as the civil magiſtrate, but with the ſpiritual one; meaning either cenſures and excommunication, which a faithful miniſter of the Goſpel, with the ſuffrage of the church, has at hand, and a power to make uſe of, for the reclaiming of diſobedient perſons; or rather that extraordinary power which was peculiar to the Apoſtles, of inflicting puniſhments on delinquents, ſuch as what was exerciſed by Peter upon Ananias and Sapphira, by the Apoſtle Paul on Elymas the ſorcerer, the inceſtuous perſon, and Hymenæus and Philetus, and which ſtill continued with him; it was ready at hand, he could exerciſe it whenever he pleaſed, he only waited a proper time: when your obedience is fulfilled; till they were thoroughly reformed from the ſeveral abuſes, both in doctrine and practice, they had fallen into, and were brought into a better order and decorum, and appeared to have been in all things obedient to the directions he had given; being unwilling, as yet, to uſe the awful authority he had from Chriſt, leſt any of the dear children of God, who were capable of being reſtored by gentler methods, ſhould ſuffer with the refractory and incorrigible.

Ver. 7. Do ye look on things after the outward appearance, &c.] Or look upon things, ironically ſaid; or ye do look on things, a reproof for making judgment of perſons and things, by the outward appearance of them; ſo many judged of Paul by the meanneſs of his perſon, the weakneſs of his body, the lowneſs of his voice, his outward circumſtances of life, his poverty, afflictions, and perſecutions; and deſpiſed him; whilſt they looked upon the riches, eloquence, haughty airs, noiſineſs, and perſonable mien of the falſe Apoſtles, and admired them: if a man truſts to himſelf that he is Chriſt's; is fully aſſured that he has an intereſt in his love and favour, is redeemed by his blood, is a partaker of his grace, and a believer in him; or rather, that he is a miniſter of the Goſpel, and an Apoſtle of Chriſt, one that is qualified and ſent forth by him to preach the word: let him, of himſelf, think this again, that as he is Chriſt's, even ſo are we Chriſt's; that is, he may, and ought of himſelf, without another's obſerving it to him, of his own accord, willingly reaſon and conclude, by the ſelf-ſame marks and evidences he would be thought to be a miniſter of Chriſt, that we are alſo. The ſenſe is, that let a man be ever ſo confident of his being a true miniſter of the Goſpel, he'll not be able to point out one criterion or proof his being ſo, but what he might diſcern in the Apoſtle Paul, and the reſt of his fellow-miniſters, and therefore ought to conclude the ſame of them as of himſelf. In which may be obſerved the great modeſty of the Apoſtle, who does not go about to diſprove others being Chriſt's, who ſo confidently boaſted of it; nor bid them look to it to ſee if they were or no, ſince all that ſay ſo are not; only as if granting that they were, he would have them look upon him, and his fellow Apoſtles as ſuch alſo, who had at leaſt equal pretenſions to this character.

Ver. 8. For tho' I ſhould boaſt ſomewhat more of our authority, &c.] Than as yet he had done, or uſed to do; or rather the ſenſe is, ſhould he boaſt of a greater authority than the falſe Apoſtles, or even than the true miniſters of the Goſpel in common had, he ſhould not exceed the bounds of truth and modeſty; for as an Apoſtle he not only had an authority from Chriſt to preach the Goſpel, and adminiſter ordinances, but alſo had an extraordinary power of puniſhing offenders, as before obſerved: which the Lord hath given us for edification, and not for deſtruction; a power which no mere man, no creature, tho' ever ſo exalted, could have given; none but Chriſt, who is Lord of heaven and earth, and who has all power in his hands, could clothe with ſuch authority as this; and which is given by him, tho' for the deſtruction of the fleſh, or puniſhment of the body, yet for the ſalvation and good of the ſoul or ſpirit, as in the caſe of the inceſtuous perſon; and tho' ſometimes for the deſtruction of the individual perſon or perſons puniſhed by it, as in the caſe of Ananias and Sapphira, yet for the edification, ſpiritual inſtruction and welfare of the whole community or church, of which theſe were a part. So this authority was exerciſed on Hymenæus and Philetus, that either they themſelves might not learn to blaſpheme, or ceaſe to blaſpheme Chriſt, or his Apoſtles, or the truths of the Goſpel; or that others might be deterred from ſuch a practice; and ſo was for the edification of the one, or the other, and the preſervation of the whole. I ſhould not be aſhamed; as one that has told an untruth, or as a vain-glorious man, who has made his boaſt of what he has not. The Apoſtle ſignifies, that he ſhould be able to make good ſuch an aſſertion, ſhould he think fit to mention it.

Ver. 9. That I may not ſeem as if I would terrify you by letters.] Here ſeems to be ſomething wanting, which is to be ſupplied. The ſenſe is, tho' I might lawfully boaſt of the ſuperior authority which we Apoſtles have above other perſons, in uſing ſharpneſs with men inſolent and hardened in ſin; yet I will not, I forbear every thing of that kind, I drop it, I don't chuſe to inſiſt upon it; מרהמא אנא, I overlook, or neglect it, I don't care to do it, as the Syriac verſion ſupplies it; and this he thought moſt prudent and adviſeable, leſt he ſhould give any occaſion to the above calumny that he was bold, and bluſtering, and terrifying by his letters when abſent, and only threatened that he had no power to perform.

Ver. 10. For his letters, ſay they, are weighty and powerful, &c.] Theſe words contain the reaſon, why he did not chuſe to ſay any more of his authority as an Apoſtle to puniſh offenders, that he might give no occaſion for ſuch a calumny; ſome among them, or the falſe Apoſtles had caſt upon him; that his epiſtles, referring particularly to his former epiſtle, and that part of it which reſpected the inceſtuous perſon, and his delivery to ſatan, were bluſtering and thundring; were laden with ſharp reproofs and ſevere menaces; were heavy with charges, were filled with great ſwelling words, with boaſts of power and authority, and with threatenings what he would do, when he came among them; whereas when preſent, as at his firſt coming to them, he was mild and gentle, even to a degree of meanneſs and baſeneſs, as they ſuggeſted; and ſo they concluded he would be, ſhould he come again; and therefore his letters were not to be regarded: but his bodily preſence is weak, and his ſpeech contemptible; he made a mean figure, being of a low ſtature, and having an infirm body: the account the hiſtorian [m] gives of him is this, that "he had a ſmall and contracted body, ſomewhat "crooked and bowed, a pale face, looked old, "and had a little head; he had a ſharp eye; his "eye-brows hung downwards; his noſe was beau-"tifully bent, ſomewhat long; his beard thick "and pretty long; and that, as the hair of his "head, had a ſprinkling of gray hairs:" hence one in Lucian [n] ſcoffingly ſays of him, "when the "baldpated Galilean met me, with his hook-noſe, "who went through the air to the third heaven:" tho' the words of this text rather regard his mind and mien, than the make of his body; and ſuggeſt, that he was not a man of that greatneſs of ſoul, and largeneſs of mind, not poſſeſſed of thoſe abilities and gifts, and of that freedom of ſpeech, and flow of words, his letters promiſed; but inſtead of that, was a man of a mean ſpirit, very abject and ſervile, and to be deſpiſed; his conduct weak, and carrying no majeſty and authority with his preſence, his words without weight, his language vulgar, and ſtile neglected; and upon all accounts, a perſon worthy of no notice, and not at all to be either feared or regarded.

Ver. 11. Let ſuch an one think this, &c.] The Apoſtle ſeems to have in view ſome one particular perſon, though he does not chuſe to name him, who had more eſpecially reproached him after this manner; and who was either one of the members of this church, or rather one of the falſe Apoſtles: and ſo in the foregoing verſe, inſtead of ſay they, in which way both the Syriac and Vulgate Latin read, and is followed in our verſion, it is in the original text φησι, ſays he, or he ſays; and ſo a certain particular perſon ſeems deſigned in ch. xi. 4. whom the Apoſtle would have to know and conclude with himſelf, and of which he might fully aſſure himſelf, that ſuch as we are in word by letters, when we are abſent, ſuch will we be alſo in deed, when we are preſent: he threatens the calumniator, that he ſhould find him to his ſorrow, the ſame man preſent as abſent; that what he ſent by letters, ſhould be found to be fact, when he came again; whoſe coming would not be with all that tenderneſs and gentleneſs, as when he firſt preached the Goſpel to them, for which there was then a reaſon; ſince he and others had ſwerved from the truths of the Goſpel, and the right ways of God, which would require the ſeverity he threatened them with, and the execution of which might be depended upon.

Ver. 12. For we dare not make ourſelves of the number, &c.] Some underſtand this as ſpoken ironically, as if the Apoſtle jeeringly ſhould ſay, he would not pretend to join, or put himſelf upon a level, who was a poor little mean deſpicable perſon, with ſuch great men as the falſe Apoſtles were; men of ſuch large gifts, and of ſuch great learning and eloquence; though they may be underſtood without an irony, that the modeſty of the Apoſtle and his fellow-miniſters, would not ſuffer them to mingle with ſuch perſons, and act the vain-glorious part they did: or compare ourſelves with ſome that commend themſelves; they were not ſo vain and fooliſh, as to give high encomiums of themſelves, therefore would not boaſt even of the authority they had, and much leſs ſay that in letters, which they could not make good in fact: but they meaſuring themſelves by themſelves, and comparing themſelves among themſelves, are not wiſe, or underſtand not; how fooliſh they are, how ridiculous they make themſelves; they do not underſtand what they ſay, nor whereof they affirm; they don't underſtand themſelves, what they really are; for to form a right judgment of themſelves, they ſhould have conſidered the gifts and abilities, the learning and knowledge of others, and thereby might have taken an eſtimate of their own; but inſtead of this, they only conſulted themſelves, and meaſured and compared themſelves with themſelves; which was acting juſt ſuch a fooliſh part, as if a dwarf was to meaſure himſelf not with any kind of meaſure, or with another perſon, but with himſelf; only ſurveys himſelf, and his own dimenſions, and fancies himſelf a giant. Juſt the reverſe is this, to what is ſaid in Philo the Jew [o], "την γαρ ȣθενειαν την εμαυτȣ "μετρειν εμαθον, I have learned to meaſure the no-"thingneſs of myſelf, and to contemplate thy ex-"ceeding great bounties; and moreover, perceive "myſelf to be duſt and aſhes, or if there is any "thing more abject."

Ver. 13. But we will not boaſt of things without our meaſure, &c.] Or things unmeaſurable; meaning not doctrines, the knowledge of which they had not attained to, and which were not to be meaſured by reaſon or revelation, ſuch as the Gnoſticks boaſted of; but the ſenſe is, that they would not glory in, and boaſt of actions, that were never done by them, within the compaſs of their miniſtration, as the falſe Apoſtles did; who pretended that they had been every where, and had preached the Goſpel, and had made converts in all parts of the world; but the Apoſtle and his fellow-labourers, deſired only to ſpeak of thoſe things which were done of them, and of their ſucceſsful labours: according to the meaſure of the rule; not the meaſure of the gift of Chriſt, or of faith beſtowed upon them; nor the meaſuring rule and canon of the ſcriptures, though both are truths; but the places or parts of the world, which God in his ſecret purpoſe had fixed, and in his providence directed them to preach in: or as he ſays, which God hath diſtributed to us; parted and divided to them; aſſigning ſuch and ſuch places to ſome, and ſuch and ſuch to others, as he himſelf pleaſed, to diſcharge their miniſterial office in; drawing as it were a line, or ſetting a bound by which, and how far each ſhould go, and no farther: a meaſure to reach even unto you; the line of their miniſtration was drawn, or the bounds of their preaching were carried from Judea, and through all the intermediate places to Corinth, ſo that the Corinthians were properly under the juriſdiction of the Apoſtles, and in their diſtrict; wherefore the falſe Apoſtles had really no right nor claim, to be among them; nay, their meaſure reached to the ends of the world, according to Pſal. xix. 4. their line קום, is gone out thro' all the earth, and their words to the end of the world.

Ver. 14. For we ſtretch not ourſelves beyond our meaſure, &c.] They did not go beyond the bounds ſet them by the purpoſe and providence of God, by going to Corinth; nor did they boaſt of things without their meaſure, when they ſpoke of their labours, and of the ſucceſs of their miniſtrations among them; nor did they aſſume and arrogate to themſelves, what did not belong to them, when they claimed an authority over them, and a right of exerciſing their apoſtolical office among them: as though we reached not unto you; by right, or according to the will of God, and the meaſuring-line and bounds he drew and fixed for them: for we are come as far as to you alſo in preaching the Goſpel of Chriſt. The caſe is clear, it is a plain matter of fact, that they were not only come to other places, where they had preached the Goſpel, and planted churches, but as far as to Corinth alſo, where they came in, by, or with the Goſpel of Chriſt: not their own, or what was of their own invention, but Chriſt's; of which he is the author, miniſter, and ſubject; they did not come without ſomething with them; they came with the good news and glad tidings of ſalvation by Chriſt; they came preaching the Goſpel, which was owned for the converſion of many ſouls, and for the raiſing a very conſiderable church; all which was a full proof that they were of right, and not by uſurpation, come to them; that they had not thruſted themſelves in, where they had no buſineſs, and conſequently ſtill retained a power over them.

Ver. 15. Not boaſting of things without our meaſure, &c.] The Apoſtle here aſſerts what he had done before, ver. 13. with a view to explain it, as he does, ſaying, that is of other men's labours; when they boaſted of the Corinthians as their converts and children, whom they had begotten thro' the Goſpel of Chriſt, they did not boaſt of other mens labours, as did the falſe Apoſtles; who when they came to Corinth, found a church already planted by the Apoſtle, and a multitude of believers, of whoſe converſion and faith he had been an inſtrument; and yet theſe men claimed them as their own, and an authority over them, when they were the fruit of the Apoſtle's labours: but having hope that when your faith is increaſed, that we ſhall be enlarged by you according to our rule abundantly; the ſenſe is, that the Apoſtle hoped, for he could not be ſure, this lying in the ſecret will of God, that when the faith of the Corinthians was grown ſtronger, and more ſettled and eſtabliſhed, and ſo would not ſtand in ſo much need of their care and inſtruction, they ſhould be enlarged through their means; and that they ſhould not ſtop here, but that the line, meaſure, or rule of their miniſtry, ſhould be drawn to a greater length, and the bounds of it extended and carried abundantly further. The Apoſtle intimates, that the weakneſs of their faith, and the diſorders and diviſions that were among them, were a hindrance to the ſpread of the Goſpel; and that if their church-ſtate were in a better and a more ſettled condition, as it would give the Apoſtles more leiſure to preach the Goſpel elſewhere, ſo it would ſerve to recommend it to other places beyond them; which would be an enlargement of the bounds of their miniſtry, and a means of magnifying of Chriſt and his Goſpel, and of them alſo.

Ver. 16. To preach the Goſpel in the regions beyond you, &c.] Here the Apoſtle clearly expreſſes what he hoped for, and explains what he meant by being enlarged according to rule; namely, that he ſhould be at liberty to preach the Goſpel elſewhere; and hoped he ſhould be directed by the providence of God, to carry it into the more remote and diſtant parts of the world, where as yet Chriſt had not been named: and not to boaſt in another man's line; or enter into another man's province, glory in other mens labours, as did the falſe Apoſtles: and boaſt of things made ready to our hand; that is, of places cultivated and improved, by the preaching of the Goſpel, ſo as to bring forth fruit to the honour and glory of God; where many ſouls were already converted, and churches were planted and put into good order, and were in a flouriſhing condition; ſee Rom. xv. 18, 19, 20, 21.

Ver. 17. But he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord.] Not in himſelf, nor in his outward circumſtances of life, or inward endowments of mind; not in his natural or acquired parts; not in his wiſdom, knowledge, learning, and eloquence; nor in his own righteouſneſs, labours, and ſervices, much leſs in other mens labours; nor in his own ſenſe of himſelf; nor in the opinion and popular applauſe of others; but in the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, as the author and donor of all gifts, natural and ſpiritual; in his wiſdom, righteouſneſs, ſanctification, and redemption; and in his judgment and approbation of men and things, which ſenſe the following words direct unto.

Ver. 18. For not he that commendeth himſelf is approved, &c.] Such may be ſaid to commend themſelves, who aſcribe that to themſelves, which don't belong to them; as that they are the miniſters of Chriſt, and ſent forth by him, when they are not; who boaſt that they have large miniſterial gifts, when they have none; and of their great ſervice and uſefulneſs, when it is all the produce of other mens labours; and what they have and do, they wholly impute to their own power and induſtry, and not to the grace and power of God: now ſuch perſons are neither approved by God, nor good men; for their own ſelf-commendation ſtands for nothing, and is ſo far from being acceptable to God or men, that it muſt be nauſeous and diſagreeable; ſee Prov. xxvii. 2. But whom the Lord commendeth; they are approved by God and men, and they are ſuch whom he highly honours, as he did Paul, by counting them faithful; and putting them into the miniſtry, by qualifying them for his ſervice, by aſſiſting them in it, and making them abundantly uſeful for the good of ſouls, and the glory of his name: by all which he bears a teſtimony to them, and ſhews his approbation of them, and at laſt will ſay, well done good and faithful ſervant, enter into the joy of thy Lord.

CHAP. XI.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle continues his diſcourſe concerning the falſe teachers; blames the Corinthians for their connivance at them, and ſubjection to them; gives a true and ample deſcription of them; compares himſelf with them, and by various inſtances ſhews, that he was greatly ſuperior to them: and whereas ſelf-commendation was neceſſary, and could not be avoided in this argument, and this might look like folly, and by ſome be deemed ſuch, he entreats the Corinthians that they would bear with him in it, as well as in his reproofs and admonitions to them, ver. 1. and aſſigns his godly jealouſy over them, as the reaſon why he entered into this ſubject, and proceeded in ſuch a way of reaſoning on it; and the rather this might be bore with in him, ſince he had ſuch a concern in eſpouſing them to Chriſt; his end in which was, to preſent them a chaſte virgin to him, ver. 2. and what this jealouſy was he explains, leſt their minds ſhould be corrupted by the falſe teachers, and they ſhould forſake the pure and ſimple Goſpel of Chriſt; which he exemplifies in the inſtance of Eve, being deceived by the ſerpent, ver. 3. and proceeds to blame them, for preferring theſe falſe teachers, to the faithful miniſters of the word; ſeeing, put them in the beſt light they could, it was but the ſame Jeſus they preached, and not another and a better Saviour; and it was but the ſame Spirit of faith they received through their miniſtry, and not another and a better; and the ſame Goſpel they brought, and did not come with better news, or more joyful tidings; had this been the caſe, there would have been ſome reaſon for extolling one above another, ver. 4. for which there was not the leaſt foundation, eſpecially with reſpect to the Apoſtle Paul, who was not inferior to the chief of the true Apoſtles of Chriſt, and therefore could not be at all behind theſe men, ver. 5. and ſeeing it might be objected to him that he was rude in ſpeech, when theſe were men of great eloquence, he allows it; but then affirms he was not ſo in knowledge, in which he exceeded them; for the truth of which, he appeals to the Corinthians themſelves, ver. 6. and he ſuggeſts, that it was very ungrateful in them, that inaſmuch as he humbled himſelf when among them, by working with his own hands, that they might be exalted, that they ſhould deſpiſe him on that account, and prefer theſe avaritious men before him, ver. 7. when that he might be able to preach the Goſpel freely, he took of other churches, ver. 8. and particularly was ſupplied by the Macedonian brethren, and ſo was not at all chargeable and burdenſome to them, and he was determined ever to remain ſo, ver. 9. and which he confirms by an oath, that no man ſhould ever be able to prevail upon him to take any thing of the churches in the region of Achaia, in which Corinth was, ver. 10. and whereas it might be inſinuated, and that ſuch a reſolution ſhowed that he had no true affection for them, this he denies, and appeals to the omniſcient God for the truth of his love to them, ver. 11. but the true reaſon why he had ſo determined, was to prevent the falſe teachers having any opportunity to reproach him, and exalt themſelves, ver. 12. and this leads him on to a deſcription of them, by their ambition and arrogance, in aſſuming a title that did not belong to them; by their crafty, cunning, and deceitful manner of working, and by their hypocriſy in mimicking the Apoſtles of Chriſt, ver. 13. nor need this ſeem ſtrange to any, when ſatan himſelf has been transformed into an angel of light, ver. 14. and whom the Apoſtle ſuggeſts, theſe men imitated; whoſe miniſters they were, though they looked like miniſters of righteouſneſs, and on whom the Apoſtle denounces ſevere puniſhment, ver. 15. and as he ſaw himſelf under a neceſſity of boaſting, in order to ſtop the mouths of theſe men, to vindicate himſelf, and prevent miſchief being done by them, he renews his intreaty in ver. 1. that the Corinthians would not reckon him as a fool; or if they did, that they would bear with his folly, and ſuffer him to boaſt of himſelf a little, ver. 16. and that the chriſtian religion and the Goſpel of Chriſt, might not come under any reproach and blame, for his conduct in this particular, he obſerves, that what he was about to ſay on this head of boaſting, was not by any order or direction from the Lord, but of himſelf, and might have the appearance of folly in it, ver. 17. and the rather he might be indulged in it, ſeeing many, even the falſe teachers, had gloried in a carnal way, and of outward things, and which made it neceſſary that he ſhould glory alſo, ver. 18. and which fooliſh boaſting in them, even many of the Corinthians had bore with, and that with a great deal of pleaſure; and therefore might ſuffer him, a ſingle man, to boaſt a little of himſelf unto them, whom he ironically calls wiſe, ver. 19. of which he gives inſtances, by being brought into bondage, devoured, pillaged, inſulted, and abuſed, by the falſe teachers, ver. 20. nor had they abuſed and reproached them only, but the Apoſtle alſo, as weak and contemptible; but then he would not bear it, but would boldly engage and enter the liſts with them, though this might be by ſome reckoned fooliſh boaſting, ver. 21. and then follows the compariſon between him and them, by which it appears that he was upon an equal foot with them, on account of nation, deſcent, and parentage, ver. 22. that he was ſuperior to them as a miniſter of the Goſpel, as was manifeſt by his more abundant labours in it, and by his ſufferings for it, the dangers he was expoſed unto on account of it, and the many hardſhips he endured in the miniſtration of it, of which he gives a variety of particulars, ver. 23, 24, 25, 26, 27. to which he adds, beſides theſe things, and all other outward ones, that the daily care of all the churches of Chriſt was upon him, ver. 28. and ſuch was his ſympathy with all ſorts of chriſtians, even the weak and offended brethren, that he was affected with them, bore their infirmities, and ſought to reconcile and make them eaſy, which greatly increaſed the weight of buſineſs that was upon him, ver. 29. and ſeeing there was a neceſſity of glorying, he choſe to glory in his infirmities and ſufferings, and on which he had moſtly enlarged, ver. 30. and for the glory of divine providence, and to expreſs his thankfulneſs for the mercy, he relates a particular inſtance of deliverance from imminent danger; for the truth of which he appeals to the God and Father of Chriſt, the eternally bleſſed one, ver. 31. the danger he eſcaped, the manner and means of the eſcape, and the place where, are particularly mentioned, ver. 32, 33.

Ver. 1. Would to God you could bear with me a little, &c.] The falſe Apoſtles boaſted ſo much of their gifts, abilities, and uſefulneſs, that the Apoſtle found himſelf under a neceſſity of ſaying ſome things in his own defence, for the honour of God, and the good of this church; which otherwiſe his modeſty would not have permitted him, and which he ſaw would be accounted and cenſured as folly in him by others; and therefore he intreats their patience a little while, and that they would ſuffer him to ſay a few things in vindication of his character, and not be offended; though it would be in commendation of himſelf, which were he not forced to, would look vain and fooliſh: and therefore ſays, bear with me a little in my folly, and which he preſſes with importunity, and indeed bear with me; he inſiſts upon it, he urges it as what he muſt not be denied in; for could he have avoided it, he would not have done it; but ſuch was the caſe, that if he did not do it, he muſt greatly ſuffer in his character and uſefulneſs; the members of this church would be in great danger from theſe falſe Apoſtles, and the honour and glory of Chriſt lay greatly at ſtake; which when conſidered, he hoped his requeſt would be granted: the laſt clauſe may be rendered, but alſo ye do bear with me; ſignifying that they had done ſo already, and continued to do ſo, and therefore he could not but encourage himſelf, that they ſtill would bear with him a little longer, and in a few things more.

Ver. 2. For I am jealous over you with godly jealouſy, &c.] He lets them know it was not ſo much on his own account, or at all with any ſelfiſh views, or for any ſecular intereſt of his own, that he was ſo concerned, but it was a godly jealouſy, or a zeal of God; which he was inſpired with by God, and which was for the honour and glory of God, even Jeſus Chriſt, who is God over all; and for their real good and ſpiritual welfare, as a church of Chriſt, that poſſeſſed him, which put him upon ſaying what he was about to do; and what affected him the more was, when he conſidered himſelf as a friend of the bridegroom, who had been concerned in the betrothing of them to Chriſt: for I have eſpouſed you to one huſband; by whom is meant Chriſt, as the following clauſe explains it: Chriſt ſtands in the relation of an huſband, to the church catholic and univerſal; to the whole general aſſembly and church of the firſt-born, whoſe names are written in heaven; even to all the elect of God, that ever were, are, or ſhall be; and ſo he does to particular congregated churches, as he did to this church at Corinth, and ſo he does to every individual believer: which character he acts up to, by loving them with a love prior to theirs, a love of complacency and delight, which is ſingle, ſpecial, and peculiar, ſtrong and affectionate, wonderful and inconceivable, conſtant, and what will laſt for ever; by ſympathizing with them under all their afflictions, temptations, deſertions, and exerciſes of every kind; by nouriſhing and cheriſhing them, which phraſes are expreſſive of the ſpiritual food and cloathing he provides for them, of that intimate communion he admits them to, and of that whole care he takes of them; by paying all their debts, ſupplying all their wants, ſupporting them with his right-hand, protecting them againſt all their enemies, giving them grace here, and glory hereafter; and laſt of all, by intereſting them in his perſon, and all that he has, in all the bleſſings and promiſes of the covenant, in his wiſdom, righteouſneſs, ſanctification, and redemption. The act of eſpouſing, the Apoſtle here with reſpect to this church, takes to himſelf, tho' in another ſenſe, and which is the principal one, it is aſcribed to Chriſt himſelf, who betroths all his to himſelf in righteouſneſs, in judgment, in loving kindneſs, and tender mercies: he ſaw them in his Father's purpoſes and decrees, in all the glory they were deſigned to be brought unto, when he loved them as his Father did, and deſired them for his ſpouſe and bride, which was granted to him; and then ſecretly in covenant betrothed them to himſelf, and ever after looked upon them as in a conjugal relation to him; wherefore though they fell in Adam, and became guilty and filthy, he gave himſelf for them as his church and bride, to ſanctify and cleanſe them, that he might preſent them to himſelf, juſt ſuch a glorious church he had ſeen them before. In conſequence of this, the Spirit of God attends the miniſtration of the Goſpel, to the converſion of each of theſe ſouls, when they become willing to be the Lord's, and give their free and full conſent to have him for their huſband; and this is the day of their open eſpouſal to him, and in this the Apoſtle had, and other miniſters of the Goſpel have a concern; he was a means in the hands of the Spirit, of their regeneration, a miniſter by whom they believed, an inſtrument in directing their ſouls to Chriſt, by ſetting forth his unſearchable riches, the glory of his perſon, and fulneſs of his grace: as Abraham's ſervant ſet forth the greatneſs of his maſter, and the large poſſeſſions his ſon was heir to, and brought out his bracelets and ear-rings, his jewels of gold and ſilver, and thereby gained his point, a wife for Iſaac; ſo the Spirit of God going along with the miniſtration of the Apoſtle, ſo wrought upon theſe Corinthians, as to give up themſelves to the Lord, and take him for their head and huſband, ſaviour and redeemer. This was the concern the Apoſtle had herein, and his view, deſire, and hope were, to ſet them before Chriſt their huſband, pure and incorrupt: that I may preſent you as a chaſte virgin to Chriſt; that is, ſingle in their love to him, ſtrictly adhering to him, and him only, as ſtanding in ſuch a relation to them; incorrupt in the principles of faith, ſincere and upright in their worſhip, and holy in their lives and converſations; nothing was more deſireable to him than this, that he might thus preſent them to Chriſt at the great day; whereby it would appear, that his labour was not in vain in the Lord: now having been concerned in this affair of eſpouſing them to Chriſt, and they not yet preſented to him, or took home by him, he could not, as things were circumſtanced, but entertain a godly jealouſy over them in his own breaſt, leſt the falſe Apoſtles ſhould draw them aſide in any degree, from their love to Chriſt, and faith in him.

Hosea 2.19.

Ver. 3. But I fear leſt by any means, &c.] Jealouſy is always attended with fear, care, and ſolicitude, whether in things natural or ſpiritual. The Apoſtle, as things were in this church, could not but expreſs his fears, leſt as the ſerpent beguiled Eve through his ſubtlety; that is, the old ſerpent the devil, who made uſe of a ſerpent, the moſt ſubtle creature of all the beaſts of the field, and ſeduced Eve from her obedience to God, to tranſgreſs his command, by eating the forbidden fruit. The Apoſtle here ſpeaks the language and ſenſe of the Jews, who ſay [p], that, שטן ונחש שם אחד להם, ſatan and the ſerpent have one name, i. e. are the ſame; and that it was the old ſerpent (the devil,) דפתי לחוה, that beguiled Eve [q], and who is ſaid to be corrupted by him; "the ſerpent, they ſay [r], "was corrupted firſt, after that, נתקללה חוה, Eve "was corrupted, and after that Adam was corrupted."

[q] Raya Mehimna in Zohar in Exod. fol. 50. 1.

[r] T. Bab. Taanith, fol. 15. 2.

So the Apoſtle was jealous and fearful, knowing that the falſe Apoſtles were miniſters of ſatan, artful and cunning men, leſt through their craftineſs and ſophiſtry, your minds, ſays he, ſhould be corrupted from the ſimplicity that is in Chriſt; that is, leſt their judgments ſhould be miſled, their minds be vitiated with corrupt principles, and be carried away in any degree with the error of the wicked, from off the pure and ſimple doctrine of the Goſpel, which reſpects the perſon and grace of Chriſt; and chiefly lies in this one plain, eaſy, and important truth, ſalvation alone by him. The Vulgate Latin verſion reads, your minds ſhould be corrupted, and ſhould fall from the ſimplicity that is in Chriſt.

Ver. 4. For if he that cometh, &c.] Meaning either ſome particular man, the Apoſtle might have had ſome information of, who came from Judea to Corinth, under the character of a true Apoſtle; or any one of the falſe Apoſtles whatever, who came of their own accord, and was never ſent by Chriſt, or by any of his churches: preacheth another Jeſus whom we have not preached; that is, if he propoſes and recommends in his miniſtry, a better Saviour and Redeemer, than had been preached by the Apoſtles; one that was better qualified, and more fit for the purpoſes of ſalvation; one that they could more ſafely venture their ſouls upon, and believe in, as the alone able and all-ſufficient Saviour, a thing impoſſible to be: or the ſenſe is, if this other Apoſtle taught the doctrine of ſalvation by Chriſt, in another and better method, and in a clearer manner, more to the honour of the Redeemer, the glory of God, and the good of their ſouls, they would have ſome reaſon then to pay a greater regard to him: or if ye receive another Spirit which ye have not received; a better Spirit than the Spirit of God, which they had received through the preaching of the Goſpel by the Apoſtles; either for graces, for they had received him as a Spirit of regeneration and converſion, of ſanctification and faith, of adoption and liberty, of peace and joy, and comfort; or for gifts, both ordinary and extraordinary, which could not poſſibly be; the Spirit which the contrary miniſters brought with it, and tended to ingenerate in them, muſt be the reverſe of this, even a ſpirit of bondage again to fear: or another Goſpel which ye have not accepted, or embraced; a better Goſpel than had been preached by the Apoſtles, and received by them; which contained more wholeſome doctrines, more comfortable truths, more excellent promiſes, better tidings of good things, than thoſe of peace, pardon, righteouſneſs, life, and ſalvation, by a crucified Jeſus; propoſed a better ſcheme of things, more for the honour of the divine perfections, and for the comfort and ſafety of believers; and which laid a better foundation for faith and hope, and tended more to encourage true religion and powerful godlineſs: ye might well bear with him; receive his doctrine, ſubmit to his authority, and prefer him to the Apoſtles: but ſince another and a better Saviour, than Jeſus of Nazareth, could not be propoſed, or the doctrine of ſalvation by him, be preached in another and better manner than it was; nor had they received, nor could they receive, another and a better Spirit, than the Spirit of grace and truth, which was communicated to them, through the Apoſtle's miniſtry; nor was a better and a more excellent Goſpel preached to them, than what they had heard; therefore they ought not to connive at, indulge and tolerate, ſuch a falſe Apoſtle among them, which it ſeems they did; and was the reaſon of the Apoſtle's fears and jealouſies, before expreſſed: and beſides, ſuppoſing that this man that was among them, and careſſed by many of them, did preach the ſame Jeſus, and the ſame doctrine of ſalvation by him, and the ſame Spirit and power went along with his miniſtry, it being the ſame Goſpel that was preached by Paul and others, there was no reaſon why he ſhould be ſet up above them, who had been the inſtruments of conveying the Goſpel, and the Spirit of it to them, long before he was known by them.

Ver. 5. For I ſuppoſe I was not a whit behind, &c.] This is very modeſtly expreſſed by the Apoſtle; for he does not aſſert, and in a haughty and confident way affirm, but only ſuppoſes, or thinks that this might be admitted, that he was not inferior to, or did not come ſhort of, in gifts, grace, and uſefulneſs, the very chiefeſt of the Apoſtles: ſuch as Peter, James, and John; who ſeemed to be pillars, were eminent Apoſtles, of great note among them, and ſuch as Chriſt in the days of his fleſh, took particular notice of. This he ſays, not to exalt himſelf, but to ſhew, how weakly and injudiciouſly the Corinthians acted, in ſetting up the falſe Apoſtle above him; or elſe theſe words are ſpoken ironically, and deſign the falſe teachers, who vaunted ſo much of their gifts, learning, eloquence, and uſefulneſs; and extolled themſelves at ſuch a rate, as if they were υπερ λιαν αποστολων, greatly above the Apoſtles; and therefore he jeeringly calls them the very chiefeſt of them; and yet thinks fit to put himſelf at leaſt, upon an equality with them: one manuſcript reads, the chiefeſt of the Apoſtles among you; and the Ethiopic verſion ſeems to have read you.

Ver. 6. But though I be rude in ſpeech, &c.] Which might be objected to him, ſetting himſelf upon a level with men ſo famous for their diction, and elegance of ſtile; and to this he anſwers, not by owning he was ſo, but granting it to be ſo; for the Apoſtle Paul was not an unlearned man, an idiot in ſpeech, unſkilful in language, his writings teſtify the contrary; he did not indeed in his publick miniſtry, dreſs his ſermons with the flowers of rhetoric, or adorn his diſcourſes with the words of humane wiſdom, with bombaſt, and great ſwelling words of vanity; he choſe a plainer and eaſier ſtile, more accommodated to the vulgar, to the capacities of the people he was concerned with; for he had not to do with philoſophers and ſenators, but with the common people chiefly; with perſons of every ſex, age, and condition of life: in this ſenſe indeed he acted as an idiot, a plebeian, a private perſon; he uſed a popular ſtile, or as the Jews ſay of ſeveral of their Rabbins [*], he דורש לשון הדיוט, preached, or explained in the common language of people; which the common people uſed, and not the learned, and to which reference may be had here: but though he wiſely purſued this method, as being moſt likely to be uſeful, yet he was not rude in knowledge, or unſkilful in the myſteries of the Goſpel; he was well learned in the knowledge of Chriſt, and in the doctrines of grace, as all his diſcourſes, ſermons, and letters teſtified; and however negligent he might be thought to be of his ſtile, and take no pains or care about the elegance of his language, but rather ſtudied a plain and popular diction, yet he was always careful to convey profitable and uſeful knowledge to the ſouls of men; and though his diſcourſes might not be fraught with all the beauties of oratory, and enticing words of man's wiſdom, they were full of ſpiritual knowledge, and ſhewed him to have a large underſtanding of divine things, for the truth of which he appeals to the Corinthians: but we have been thoroughly manifeſt among you in all things; his faith and doctrine, as well as manner of life, were well known unto them; he had not ſhunned to declare the whole counſel of God unto them; his knowledge in the myſtery of Chriſt's perſon and grace, and in all the parts of the everlaſting Goſpel, was no ſecret to them; he had uſed no artful methods to hide himſelf, or conceal the truth; but by manifeſtation of it, had commended himſelf to every man's conſcience in the ſight of God; and by obſerving this, as he had witneſſes enow among them, of the truth of it, ſo he ſtrikes at the hypocriſy and deceitful methods the falſe teachers took, to cover themſelves, their practices, and principles.

[*] T. Bab. Bava Metzia, fol. 104. 1.

Ver. 7. Have I committed an offence in abaſing myſelf, &c.] Either by behaving among them when he was firſt with them, in a very modeſt and humble manner, in much fear and trembling, without pride and haughtineſs, or affectation of power and authority over them; or by uſing a popular ſtile, ſuited to the capacity of the common people; or by labouring with his own hands, exerciſing his trade of tent-making among them, that he might provide food for himſelf, and not be chargeable to them; and which he ſuggeſts was ſo far from being criminal in him, that he ought rather to be commended for it; ſince it could not be thought to be with any view to himſelf, and his own advantage, but purely for their good: that you might be exalted; that nothing might lie in their way of receiving the Goſpel of Chriſt, or prejudice them againſt it; that they might the more eaſily be brought to liſten to it, come to the knowledge of it, and embrace it, and ſo be exalted, as they were, to a participation of the grace of Chriſt; to fellowſhip with him; to the honour and dignity of being a church of Chriſt; to an enjoyment of the privileges of God's houſe; to have a name better than that of ſons and daughters, and to have a right and title to the heavenly glory: becauſe, or is it becauſe I have preached to you the Goſpel of God freely? The Goſpel he preached was not his own, but God's; of which he was the author; his grace was the ſubject of it, and his glory the end of its miniſtration; which he had given to the Apoſtle to preach; to which he had ſeparated him; for which he had abundantly qualified him, and in which he was greatly ſucceeded by him. This he preached freely to the Corinthians at his firſt coming among them, without putting them to any expence, or receiving any thing from them; which though he might lawfully have done, yet he judged it moſt adviſeable at that time, to miniſter to his own neceſſities, by working with his hands, leſt he ſhould be burdenſome to them; and this be an objection to the Goſpel he preached, that he ſought rather theirs than them; and for ſo doing he was not to be blamed, but to be praiſed: and yet ſuch was the weakneſs of many at leaſt in this church, that they highly valued the falſe Apoſtles, who made merchandize of them, and treated with contempt this excellent ſervant of Chriſt, who had freely imparted the Goſpel to them.

Ver. 8. I robbed other churches, &c.] Meaning the churches of Macedonia; not that what he had of them was by force and rapine, or by plundering of them, and ſpoiling of their ſubſtance, and living upon them againſt their wills, as ſoldiers uſe a conquered people, though the alluſion is to ſuch a cuſtom; for what he had of theirs, was freely communicated to him, as appears from the following verſe: but becauſe theſe churches from whom he received were poor, and the Corinthians whom he ſerved were rich, he calls it a robbing of the former, though there was no injury in the caſe, for it was voluntary, becauſe it was expended for the ſervice of the latter: taking wages of them to do you ſervice; or for your miniſtry; either to ſupply their poor, or rather to ſupport the miniſtry of the Goſpel among them. The Apoſtle continues the metaphor, taken from ſoldiers, to whom wages are due for their warfare; as are alſo to the miniſters of the Goſpel, the good ſoldiers of Jeſus Chriſt; ſince no man goes a warfare at his own charges and expence, but is provided for by thoſe in whoſe ſervice he is: and therefore though the Apoſtle did not think it adviſeable to aſk for, and inſiſt upon wages from them at that time, for his ſervice among them, yet he took it of others in lieu of it; and this he mentions, partly to ſhew that wages were due to him for his miniſtry, and partly to obſerve to them who they were beholden to for the ſupport of the Goſpel at firſt among them; as alſo to ſtir them up to be ſerviceable to other churches, as others had been to them.

Ver. 9. And when I was preſent with you, and wanted, &c.] Whilſt he was among them, preaching the Goſpel to them, he wanted the common neceſſaries of life: and yet, ſays he, I was chargeable to no man, or benumbed no man; a metaphor, as ſome think, taken from the Torpedo, or cramp-fiſh; which is of ſuch a cold and benumbing nature, as that when even at the hook, it will ſtrike the fiſherman with its cold, and ſo benumb him, as to take away his feeling, and the uſe of his limbs: now the Apoſtle's meaning is, that he did not chill and benumb any man's charity, by aſking relief from him, for he importuned no man on this account; nor was he benumbed himſelf, to the detriment of any man; for though he was reduced to great ſtraits, he was not ſlothful and ſluggiſh in preaching the Goſpel, but purſued it with as much diligence and induſtry, as if he had been ſupported by it in the moſt handſome manner; nor did he act the part of an idle drone, ſit ſtill and ſtarve, but laboured with his own hands, to the relief of himſelf and others; and whereas it could not be thought he ſhould be able to provide this way thoroughly, both for himſelf and thoſe that were with him, it was made up by other hands: for that which was lacking to me; which he could not make up by his own hand labour and induſtry: the brethren which came from Macedonia ſupplied; meaning either Silas and Timotheus, who came to him from Macedonia, whilſt he was at Corinth, working at his trade with Aquila and Priſcilla, Acts xviii. 5. who might bring him a ſupply out of theſe parts; or elſe ſome that belonged to the churches of Macedonia, particularly the Philippians, who frequently communicated to him, and ſent him preſents by ſome or other of the brethren, as by Epaphroditus, Phil. iv. 15, 16, 18. And in all things, adds he, I have kept myſelf from being burdenſome unto you; he worked hard, lived ſparingly, and received from others; that as in reſpect to his maintenance, ſo in every thing elſe, he might live without being a dead weight upon them, or any ways troubleſome to them: not that a miniſter's maintenance is, or ought to be reckoned a burden upon a people; it is but a due debt, and what is their juſt right; but becauſe it is accounted ſo by carnal men, and ſuch as are diſaffected to the Goſpel, and the miniſtry of it, therefore the Apoſtle uſes ſuch language: and ſo will I keep myſelf; that is, for the future; he having taken up a reſolution in himſelf, not to be chargeable and troubleſome to them, but to provide for himſelf ſome other way. This he adds, leſt they ſhould think that he had ſaid what he did to ſtir them up to a diſcharge of their duty, in contributing towards his ſupport for time to come.

Ver. 10. As the truth of Chriſt is in me, &c.] To ſhew the firmneſs of his reſolution, and how determined he was to abide by it, he joins an oath to it; for theſe words are the form of an oath; and it is as if he ſhould ſay, as ſure as Chriſt is truth, who is in me; or as that the truth of grace, or the truth of the Goſpel of Chriſt is in my heart and mouth, ſo ſure will I conſtantly perſevere in this determination; or let the truth of Chriſt never be thought to be in me, if I do not: no man ſhall ſtop me of this boaſting in the regions of Achaia; or this boaſting ſhall not be ſtopped in me; of preaching the Goſpel freely at Corinth, and that he had not been chargeable and burdenſome to them; nor would he be for time to come, neither there, nor in any part of Achaia, of which Corinth was the metropolis; ſee the note on ch. ix. 2. No man ſhould ſtop his mouth from boaſting of this, by putting any thing into his hands, for he was determined not to receive any thing from any perſon in theſe climates; not but that he reſerved a liberty in himſelf to receive from other perſons and churches, for his comfortable ſubſiſtence, and ſo much the limitation of his reſolution to theſe parts implies; for if he had not intended to have received a ſupply from any perſons whatever, the reſtriction to the regions of Achaia would have been unneceſſary; and he ſhould rather have ſaid, that no man ſhould ſtop him of this boaſting in any part of the world. The Vulgate Latin verſion reads, this boaſting ſhall not be broken; and to the ſame ſenſe the Syriac verſion, this boaſting ſhall not be aboliſhed.

Ver. 11. Wherefore, becauſe I love you not? &c.] Why did the Apoſtle do this? why did he take nothing, and reſolve to take nothing of the Corinthians, for preaching the Goſpel to them? why did he determine, that no man ſhould prevent his glorying of this, in all the country of Achaia? was it becauſe he did not love the Corinthians? ſome might inſinuate this was the reaſon of it, that he had no true affection for them, and therefore would take none of their gifts, but deſpiſed both them and theirs, and loved the Macedonian and other churches better than they. To which he anſwers by ſaying, God knoweth; which is another form of an oath, and is a ſolemn appeal to God, the ſearcher of hearts, who knows all things, that he knew he heartily loved them; that it was not want of love to them, which was the reaſon of his entering into ſuch a reſolution, never to take any thing of them; but it was ſomething elſe, quite another thing, which induced him to it, and is mentioned in the following verſe.

Ver. 12. But what I do, that I will do, &c.] As he preached the Goſpel freely at Corinth and in Achaia, ſo he was determined to do it for the future, for this reaſon only, or chiefly: that, ſays he, I may cut off occaſion from them which deſire occaſion; meaning the falſe Apoſtles, who ſought for, and were deſirous of every occaſion and opportunity of exalting themſelves, and reproaching him: that wherein they glory, they may be found even as we; the ſenſe of which according to ſome interpreters is, that whereas ſome of the falſe Apoſtles, at leaſt who were rich men, took nothing for preaching, but gave their labours freely, were very deſirous that the Apoſtle would receive of the churches in theſe parts, that they might have an occaſion againſt him, and an opportunity of ſhewing themſelves, as in learning and eloquence, ſo in this reſpect, to be ſuperior to him, in that they preached freely, and he for gain; wherefore to cut off ſuch an occaſion, the Apoſtle determines he would take nothing; that in this very thing which they boaſted of, that they preached the Goſpel freely, they might appear to be at moſt to be but upon a par with the Apoſtle, and not to exceed him. This ſenſe would ſeem very appoſite, was it a clear point that the falſe Apoſtles received nothing for preaching; but the contrary is moſt evident; wherefore the Apoſtle's meaning is, that theſe men were deſirous that he would take wages, becauſe they did; that in this reſpect he might not excel them, and that they might be able to plead his example and authority, and ſo get an occaſion of extorting more money from the Corinthians: wherefore to cut off all ſuch occaſion from them, the Apoſtle reſolves to take nothing himſelf; that whereas they boaſted they were equal to, or ſuperior to the Apoſtles, they might be found, would they follow their example, even as they, not taking any money at all of them, and poor, and working with their own hands.

Ver. 13. For ſuch are falſe Apoſtles, &c.] Such as thoſe he had in view, who ſought an occaſion to depreſs him, and exalt themſelves, and to get money from the Corinthians; theſe were falſe Apoſtles, or Apoſtles falſly ſo called; they had the name, but not the thing; they were not called and ſent forth by Chriſt; they had not the grace of Apoſtleſhip, or gifts qualifying them for that high office; the power and authority they exerciſed, was uſurped by them; they could not prove their miſſion by true and real miracles; nor had they any ſeals of their Apoſtleſhip, as thoſe who were ſent by Chriſt had: deceitful workers; they went by the name of labourers in Chriſt's vineyard, when they were loiterers in it; they pretended to work, but did not; and to work for Chriſt, when they only ſerved themſelves, and their own bellies; they took upon them to interpret the ſcriptures, but in a very fallacious manner; they walked in craftineſs, and handled the word of God deceitfully, and lay in wait to deceive men; and were maſters of ſo much art and cunning, that if it was poſſible, they would have deceived the very elect: transforming themſelves into the Apoſtles of Chriſt; not ſo much by putting on a like garb or dreſs, but by pretending to be of the ſame principles, and to follow their practices, and to purſue the ſame good ends in their miniſtrations.

Ver. 14. And no marvel, &c.] This need not be wondered at, nor is it any new or ſtrange thing; nor ſhould it be thought to be incredible, that there are ſuch perſons in being: for ſatan himſelf is transformed into an angel of light; a good angel, one that has his abode in the regions of light; and is poſſeſſed of divine and ſpiritual light and underſtanding; who is cloathed and arrayed with light, this is his form and eſſence. The Apoſtle ſpeaks agreeable to the notion of the Jews, who ſay [t], that "המלאכים כלם הם אור׃, that all the angels are light, the cloathing of God himſelf;" and they have a diſtinction between, מלאכין דיום, angels of the day, and angels of the night [u]: now ſatan the enemy of mankind, ſometimes appears in the form of one of theſe; as he did to Eve in the garden, and to Chriſt in the wilderneſs; and by ſuch appearances, he often impoſes on mankind; pretends the greateſt friendſhip, when he deſigns nothing but ruin; and under a notion of good, either honeſt, or pleaſant, or profitable, draws on into the commiſſion of the greateſt evils; and under a ſhew of truth, introduces the moſt notorious falſhoods and errors; and under a pretence of religion, all ſorts of idolatry, ſuperſtition, and impiety; 'tis in this way he has ſucceeded in his enterprizes and temptations; theſe are his wiles, ſtratagems, and cunning devices.

[t] R. Abraham Seba, Tzeror Hammor, fol. 18. 4.

[u] Zohar in Num. fol. 91. 1. & 93. 3.

Ver. 15. Therefore it is no great thing, &c.] It is no ſtrange and wonderful thing; it may eaſily be given into; no man need to make any doubt of it, or heſitate concerning it, ſince the devil himſelf, who is an angel of darkneſs, is transformed into an angel of light: if his miniſters alſo be transformed as the miniſters of righteouſneſs; not that they really are transformed into ſuch miniſters, but they appear and look like ſuch; they are not really, but as the miniſters of righteouſneſs; they put on the form and air of faithful upright miniſters of the word, and would be thought to be ſuch; they mimick Goſpel preachers, who aſſert the doctrine of juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, though they moſt miſerably corrupt it, and blend it with ſomething of their own; and which they endeavour to palliate and cover, from the ſight of men; and eſpecially they ſet up themſelves as ſuch, by pretending to be great friends to holineſs and good works, which they preſs with much vehemence, and oppoſe to the doctrines of grace, with all their might and main; in doing which, they greatly ſerve their maſter, whoſe miniſters they are; and who well knows, that the doctrine of works may do much prejudice to the Goſpel intereſt, and churches of Chriſt, but will never convert nor ſave one ſoul: a dreadful character theſe men have, for though they would paſs for miniſters of righteouſneſs, friends to holineſs, and men zealous of good works, they are no other than miniſters of ſatan, doing his work, ſerving his intereſt, and propagating his kingdom, which is a kingdom of darkneſs: whoſe end ſhall be according to their works; for either God will make publick examples of them in this world, or if they are not made manifeſt here, though they may deceive themſelves and others, they cannot deceive God; he'll take off the maſk, their hypocriſy ſhall be detected, their evil works will be laid open, and they'll be judged according to them, and condemned for them to everlaſting puniſhment.

Ver. 16. I ſay again, let no man think me a fool, &c.] For praiſing himſelf, or ſpeaking in his own commendation; which he was obliged to do, in vindication of his own character, againſt the falſe Apoſtles, for the ſake of the Goſpel he preached, and for the advantage and welfare of the Corinthians; that they might not be impoſed upon and carried away, with the inſinuations of theſe deceitful men; wherefore he deſires them once more, that if he muſt be accounted a fool for ſpeaking in his own behalf; if otherwiſe, ſays he, if they could not be perſuaded that he acted a wiſe part, but muſt be looked upon as a fool, for what he ſaid of himſelf, yet as a fool receive me; or ſuffer me, or bear with my folly: he deſires that he might have, and uſe the liberty which fools have uſually granted to them, to ſpeak out the truth, and all they know, which is not always allowed to wiſe men: that I may boaſt myſelf a little; in a few inſtances, and for a ſmall ſpace of time; he ſuggeſts, that the falſe Apoſtles boaſted much of themſelves, and they bore with them, and had done ſo for a great while; and therefore it was no unreaſonable requeſt he made, that they would alſo ſuffer him to boaſt of himſelf a little, eſpecially ſince there was ſuch an abſolute neceſſity for it.

Ver. 17. That which I ſpeak, &c.] Meaning in vindication and commendation of himſelf, on this ſubject of glorying; or as here expreſſed, in this confidence of boaſting; for which he thought he had good ground and foundation to go upon, and therefore might expreſs himſelf with the greateſt aſſurance, ſee ch. ix. 4. this declares he ſpoke not as from the Lord, but of himſelf: I ſpeak it not after the Lord; or Chriſt, as ſome copies read; or our Lord, as the Syriac verſion; his ſenſe is, that he did not then ſpeak as an Apoſtle, or one ſent by Chriſt; he put off this character for the preſent, and took that of a fool upon him, that he might ſpeak the more freely to the Corinthians, and the more ſeverely againſt the falſe Apoſtles; he did not pretend to any expreſs command from Chriſt for ſo doing, or that he acted in imitation of him, who was meek and lowly; or that what he ſaid, came from the Spirit of the Lord; or indeed, that it was agreeable to his own ſpirit, and the principles of grace formed in him; but was obliged to it, through the boaſts of the falſe Apoſtles; which though it was not criminal and unlawful, but neceſſary, right, and proper, conſidering the reaſons of it, the end for which, and the intention and view with which it was done; yet viewing the form and manner of this boaſting, without attending to the circumſtances of it, it had the appearance of folly: wherefore the Apoſtle ſays, he ſpoke not as according to the commandment, or example of his Lord; or according to the Spirit of the Lord, or his own ſpirit, as renewed by his grace: but as it were fooliſhly; he does not ſay, that what he ſaid was fooliſhneſs, but it looked like it, and would be deemed ſo by ſuch, who were ſtrangers to the true ſprings of it.

Ver. 18. Seeing that many glory after the fleſh, &c.] Or with reſpect to things external, ſuch as their high birth and parentage, carnal deſcent, circumciſion, learned education, and the like; of which the falſe Apoſtles being Jews, boaſted, who it ſeems were many; and though a multitude is not to be followed to do evil, yet the Apoſtle thought, that ſince there were ſo many who were indulged by this church in this way, he might be allowed to boaſt alſo of ſuch like things, ſo far as he could with truth and a good conſcience, and in order to ſecure ſome valuable ends: I will glory alſo; for he was of the ſeed of Abraham as well as they, of the ſtock of Iſrael, and tribe of Benjamin, circumciſed the eighth day, and brought up at the feet of Gamaliel; but theſe are not all the things he could, and would, and did glory of; he gloried of theſe, and of others beſides them, which the falſe Apoſtles could not, and thereby proved himſelf to be ſuperior to them, even in external things, of which they bragged ſo much.

Ver. 19. For ye ſuffer fools gladly, &c.] They bore with the falſe Apoſtles, who were fools; were continually proclaiming their folly, boaſting of themſelves, aſcribing that to themſelves, which did not belong to them, and were puft up by their fleſhly minds; they indulged theſe men in their folly, and that with pleaſure and delight; they not only winked at it, and overlooked it, but were pleaſed with it: ſeeing ye yourſelves are wiſe; acting like men who count themſelves wiſe, and keep fools for their pleaſure, diverſion and ſport. Theſe words may be conſidered, either as ſpoken ſeriouſly by the Apoſtle, and as wondering that they ſhould ſuffer ſuch fools to go on in their vain boaſts, and eſpecially with pleaſure; ſince they were men of wiſdom, who were otherwiſe taught of God, and by the word; they had been made wiſe unto ſalvation, and were enriched in all utterance, and in all knowledge; they had been inſtructed by the Spirit of wiſdom and revelation, in the knowledge of Chriſt, and in the myſteries of his Goſpel; and therefore it was ſurprizing that they could bear with ſuch vain and fooliſh men, and eſpecially with delight; for tho' it is the part of a wiſe man to bear with fools, yet not with pleaſure; ſo that this carries in it a tacit reproof to them: or elſe the laſt clauſe may be conſidered as ſpoken ironically, and as a ſevere jibe upon their folly, for tolerating ſuch a parcel of fools among them; as if he ſhould ſay, you ſhew yourſelves to be men of wiſdom, as you would be thought to be; you act the wiſe part, don't you, in ſuffering ſuch empty-headed men to converſe with you, and delight in their vain talk and converſation? however, the whole furniſhes out an argument for the Apoſtle, and which he means to improve; that if they could ſuffer and bear with ſuch fools, and ſo many of them, and that gladly; then they might and ought to bear a little with him in his folly, which is what he intreats of them.

Ver. 20. For ye ſuffer if a man bring you into bondage, &c.] They not only ſuffered and tolerated the fooliſh boaſting of theſe men with pleaſure, but patiently and ſtupidly bore their oppreſſions, injuries, and inſults, things that were intolerable, which no man of any ſenſe and wiſdom would ever ſuffer; and yet they took all quietly from them, made no objection, but patiently ſubmitted to them, and therefore might well bear a little with him; they were voluntarily led captive, and brought into bondage by them, to the yoke of the ceremonial law, to the obſervance of circumciſion, meats and drinks, days, months, times and years; and to the yoke of human doctrines, traditions, tenets, laws, and rules: if a man devour or eat; tho' they devoured their houſes as the Phariſees did; eat up their ſubſtance, were inſatiable in their covetouſneſs; were greedy dogs that could never have enough, could not ſatisfy their voracious appetites, without devouring and conſuming all they had, yet they took it patiently: if a man take of you; not food and raiment, or a proper ſtipend, or wages which might be voluntarily raiſed, and chearfully given; but they took away their goods from them by force, as the Arabic verſion reads it, whether they would or no, to which they quietly ſubmitted: if a man exalt himſelf; as theſe men did, extolling their nation, their deſcent and lineage, their parentage and education, and fleſhly priviledges; inſulting the Corinthians as perſons of a mean and baſe extraction, as having been heathens and ſinners of the Gentiles, yet not a word was returned in anſwer thereunto: if a man ſmite you on the face; tho' they gave them very opprobrious language, vilifying and reproaching them as uncircumciſed perſons, upbraiding and hitting them on the teeth with their former idolatries and manners of life; yet all was taken in good part, ſo much were they under the government and influence of theſe men.

Ver. 21. I ſpeak as concerning reproach, &c.] Theſe words may be conſidered, either as explanative of the latter part of the former verſe, if a man ſmite you on the face; that is not to be underſtood ſtrictly and literally, of one man's ſtriking another on the face, but of reproach and contumelious language, uſed by the falſe Apoſtles to the Corinthians; or they may have reference to the Apoſtle's deſign in the whole, which was partly to reproach the Corinthians for acting ſuch a ſtupid part, in patiently bearing ſo many and ſuch indignities from theſe men; and partly to expoſe the ſcandalous and reproachful uſage of them by the falſe Apoſtles, that if poſſible their eyes might be opened to ſee thro' them, and diſcard them: or elſe theſe words may be regarded in connexion with what follows, as tho' we had been weak; and then the Apoſtle's meaning is, that as to the buſineſs of ſcandal and reproach he was ſpeaking of, this was not confined to the Corinthians only, but they the true Apoſtles had their ſhare of it; for the falſe Apoſtles reproached them, as poor, weak, fearful, and puſillanimous men; becauſe they did not uſe that authority, and exerciſe that domination over them, they did not bring them into bondage, devour their ſubſtance, take away their goods from them by force, inſult over them, and treat them in an ignominious and contemptuous manner; and intimated that they were upon all accounts inferior to them, and not worthy to be mentioned with them; which moved the Apoſtle to exert himſelf, and boldly riſe up in his own defence, ſaying, howbeit, wherein ſoever any is bold; to boaſt of his pedigree, character, office, and uſefulneſs, I ſpeak fooliſhly; as it might ſeem, and be ſo interpreted by ſome, I am bold alſo; to enter the liſts with him, to compare notes, and ſee on which ſide the ſuperiority lies; and which is done in the following verſes, to the full confutation of all the pride, vanity, and boaſting of the falſe Apoſtles.

Ver. 22. Are they Hebrews? ſo am I, &c.] The nation of the Jews were called Hebrews, not from Abraham as ſome have [w] thought, thro' ignorance of the Hebrew language, which will by no means admit of ſuch a derivation and etymology of the name; wherefore the Jewiſh writers never make mention of this opinion as among any of them; had they took their name from Abram or Abraham, they would rather have been called Abramites or Abrahamites, and not Hebrews; beſides, Abraham himſelf is called an Hebrew, Gen. xiv. 13. and to be ſo called from himſelf, and not denominated from ſome other perſon or thing, can never be imagined, it would be moſt abſurd and ridiculous; to which may be added, that the Apoſtle in this verſe makes mention of being the ſeed of Abraham, as a diſtinct character from that of Hebrews: others have been of opinion that the name is derived from עבר, Habar, which ſignifies, to paſs over; and was occaſioned by one or other of the following events; either from Abraham's paſſing over the river Euphrates, when he came out of Meſopotamia into the land of Canaan, and ſo was called Abram, העברי, Habibri, the paſſer over, or the Hebrew [x], and ſo his poſterity were called after him; or from the poſterity of Canaan, who after the confuſion at Babel, ſettled in that part of Aſia which lies between the river Jordan and the Mediterranean ſea, and from them called the land of Canaan; and who were called by the Chaldeans, from whom they ſeparated, and by the neighbouring nations, Hebrews, or paſſers over, becauſe they paſſed over the river Jordan; and ſo Abraham paſſing over the river Euphrates [x] Hieronymus in Ezek. c. 7. fol. 183. B. Theodoret. in Gen. Qu. 60.

Euphrates to them, and learning their language, and continuing there, he was called an Hebrew alſo, and his poſterity after him [y]; or from Arphaxad, or Heber paſſing over the river Tigris or Euphrates, and ſettling in the land of Canaan [z]; but it is not likely that a nation ſhould take its name from ſuch an event: others think it a more probable opinion that Abraham was ſo called, and hence his poſterity after him, from the name which the Canaanites gave to Meſopotamia from whence he came; calling it Heber Hannahar, or the country beyond the river: juſt as we call foreigners, Tranſmarines, or people beyond ſea; and of this opinion were ſome of the Jewiſh writers [a]; but not Meſopotamia, but Canaan is called the land of the Hebrews, Gen. xl. 15. The more commonly received opinion with the [b] Jews is, and which is moſt likely, that they are ſo called from Heber, the father of Peleg, in whoſe days the confuſion of languages was made, and what is now called the Hebrew language being the firſt and original one, was retained in him and in his family; hence Shem is ſaid to be the father of all the children of Heber, Gen. x. 21. that is, the Hebrews, as the ſame people are called the children of Iſrael from Iſrael, and the children of Judah from Judah, and ſometimes they go by the name of Heber, as in Numb. xxiv. 24. when as the Aſſyrians are called Aſhur, from whom they have their name, ſo the Hebrews are called Heber, from whom they take their denomination: and it ſhould be obſerved, that this is not only a national but a religious name, and thoſe people were called ſo becauſe they were of the faith as well as the deſcendants of Heber; ſo Shem was the father of others, but in a peculiar manner the father of the children of Heber, becauſe the religion he profeſſed was continued with them; and ſo Abraham is particularly called the Hebrew, not only becauſe he deſcended from Heber, but was of the ſame religion; and ſo his poſterity, not in the line of Iſhmael, but of Iſaac are ſo called; and not as deſcending from Iſaac in the line of Eſau, but of Jacob; and hence it was not lawful for the Egyptians to eat bread with the Hebrews, not becauſe they were of another nation, but becauſe of another religion, Gen. xliii. 32. It ſeems that theſe falſe Apoſtles were Jews, ſince it is not denied by the Apoſtle, but granted; they were ſome ſuch like falſe brethren as thoſe, who came from Judea to Antioch and diſturbed the church there, Acts xv. 1. and whereas they boaſted of their being Hebrews, the deſcendants of the ancient patriarch Heber in the line of Abraham; the Apoſtle was able to match them in this, and aſſerts himſelf to be an Hebrew too, which he could do with the ſtricteſt truth, for he was an Hebrew of the Hebrews, he was an Hebrew by father and mother's ſide: are they Iſraelites? ſo am I. The Jews were called Iſraelites from Iſrael, a name which was given to Jacob their anceſtor, upon his wreſtling with an angel, and prevailing over him; and was accounted an honourable one, or title of honour; for the people of Iſrael, were they whom God choſe for a peculiar people to himſelf above all others, brought them out of Egypt, fed them in the wilderneſs, and led them thro' it, and ſettled them in the land of Canaan, and beſtowed upon them ſpecial and peculiar priviledges; ſee Rom. ix. 4, 5. The Jews are very extravagant in the praiſe of Iſraelites; they not only make them the favorites of God, beloved of him, becauſe called children, and had the law given them [c], and extol them above all mankind; ſee the note on Rom. iii. 9. but they even make them equal to the miniſtring angels, and ſay they are pure from ſin as they, eſpecially on the day of atonement [d], yea, more excellent than they [e]: in this alſo the Apoſtle could anſwer them, for he was of the ſtock of Iſrael, and of the tribe of Benjamin, a ſon of Jacob or Iſrael; and was an Iſraelite indeed, as Nathaniel, for all are not Iſrael that are of Iſrael: are they the ſeed of Abraham? ſo am I; of this the Jews mightily boaſted; ſee John viii. 33. they reckon themſelves, even the pooreſt among them, as the nobles and princes of the earth [f]; and even other people have been fond of being reckoned of the ſtock of Abraham, as particularly the Lacedemonians, 1 Maccab. xii. 20, 21. The Jews make a merciful diſpoſition to men, to be a ſign and evidence of being of the ſeed of Abraham [g]; but in a ſpiritual ſenſe, an intereſt in Chriſt, and faith in him, denominate men to be truly Abraham's ſeed, and heirs of the promiſe: this is to be underſtood here in a natural ſenſe, and of being of Abraham's ſeed in the line of Jacob, for otherwiſe the Iſhmaelites and Idumeans were of the ſeed of Abraham; but they were his ſeed in that line in which the promiſed ſeed, the Meſſiah was to come; tho' this was of no avail, without having the ſame faith Abraham had, and believing truly in Chriſt, as his ſpiritual ſeed do, whether they be Jews or Gentiles; however, the Apoſtle was equal to them in this reſpect; he was of the ſeed of Abraham according to the fleſh, and above them in another, in that he was of Abraham's ſpiritual ſeed by faith in Chriſt Jeſus.

Ver. 23. Are they miniſters of Chriſt? &c.] The Apoſtle could have anſwered to this queſtion that they were not, being neither ſent by Chriſt, nor preachers of him, and who ſought their own things and not his, being falſe Apoſtles, and deceitful workers; but he choſe not to litigate this point with them, and by a rhetorical conceſſion allows it; and replies, I ſpeak as a fool; that is, he might be thought to ſpeak as ſuch an one, for what he afterwards ſays; and if he was, he muſt be content, he could not help it, there was a neceſſity for it, to ſtop the mouths of theſe vain boaſters: I am more; that is, more a miniſter of Chriſt than they, more manifeſtly ſo than they were; yea, he was more than an ordinary miniſter of Chriſt, he was an Apoſtle, the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and laboured and ſuffered more than even the reſt of the true Apoſtles of Chriſt, and therefore muſt be greatly ſuperior to the falſe ones: in labours more abundant; in taking fatiguing journeys, preaching the Goſpel conſtantly, adminiſtring ordinances, working with his own hands, &c. in ſtripes above meaſure; which were cruelly and unmercifully inflicted on him by his enemies, and which he after mentions: in priſons more frequent; as at Philippi, and ſo after this at Jeruſalem, and Rome, and perhaps in other places, tho' not recorded; Clemens Romanus ſays [h], that he was ſeven times in bonds: in deaths oft; that is, frequently in danger of death, in ſuch afflictions and evils as threatned with death, and therefore are ſo called; ſee chap. i. 8, 9, 10.

Ver. 24. Of the Jews five times received I forty ſtripes ſave one.] We have no account in the Acts of the Apoſtles, or elſewhere, of any one of theſe five ſcourgings, which the Apoſtle underwent from the Jews; but there is no doubt to be made of them. The number of ſtripes he received at each time, agrees with the traditions and cuſtoms of the Jews. The original law for ſcourging a delinquent is in Deut. xxv. 2, 3. where it is ſaid, forty ſtripes he may give him, and not exceed; according to the nature of the caſe, forty ſtripes and no more might be inflicted, but fewer might ſuffice in ſome caſes; the Apoſtle's having but thirty-nine at a time, was not becauſe the Jews thought his crime did not require full forty; or that they out of tenderneſs and compaſſion to him abated him one; but they proceeded with him to the utmoſt rigor of this law, according to their interpretation of it; for ſo runs their tradition[i], "with how many ſtripes do "they beat him? (a criminal,) it is anſwered, "ארבעים חסר אחת, with forty ſave one; as it is "ſaid, with the number forty; that is, which is "next to forty; R. Judah ſays, with full forty is "he to be beaten;" but the deciſion is not according to R. Judah, as the commentators ſay[k]; and this is the general ſenſe of their[l] interpreters of that law, and what they take to be the genuine meaning of it; ſo that the Apoſtle was puniſhed according to the extremity of it, in their account. This is a ſettled rule and point with them, מלקות תורה ארבעים חסר אחת[m], that ſcourging according to the law is with forty ſtripes ſave one; Maimonides[n] obſerves, that "they did not add to "forty, if a man was as ſtrong and robuſt as Sampſon, "but they leſſen the number to a man that is weak; "for if a weak man ſhould be beaten with many "ſtripes, he may die; wherefore the wiſemen ſay, "that if he be never ſo robuſt, they ſcourge him "but with thirty nine;" ſo that no mercy was ſhewn to Paul, or any regard had to his weak conſtitution, for it was the utmoſt they ever inflicted; beſides, according to their manner of ſcourging, of which ſee the note on Matt. x. 17. they could not have given him another ſtroke, without giving him three ſtripes more, which would have made it forty-two, and ſo have exceeded, which the law forbids; for they whipped with a ſcourge of three cords, and every ſtroke went for three; ſo that by thirteen ſtrokes, thirty-nine ſtripes were given, and if a fourteenth had been added, there would have been forty-two ſtripes; agreeable to which they ſay[o], "when they adjudge a delinquent to how many "ſtripes he is able to receive, they don't count "but by ſtripes that are fit to be trebled; if they "reckon he is able to bear twenty, they don't ſay "he is to be beaten with twenty-one, ſo that they "may be able to treble, but he is to be beaten with "eighteen; they adjudge to receive forty, and after "he begins to be beaten, they ſee he is weak, and "they ſay, he cannot receive more than theſe nine "or twelve with which he is beaten, lo, this is "free; they adjudge him to receive twelve, and after "he is ſcourged they ſee he is ſtrong and able to "receive more, lo, he is free, and is not to be "beaten any more upon the eſtimation:" ſo that you ſee that according to their own canons, they could if they would have mitigated this puniſhment of the Apoſtle's; but ſuch was their cruelty and malice, that they carried it to the utmoſt heighth they could.

Ver. 25. Thrice was I beaten with rods, &c.] Or wands, by the Romans; for this was a Roman puniſhment, diſtinct from ſcourging with cords uſed by the Jews. There is mention made but of one time only that he was ſo beaten, elſewhere, and that is in Acts xvi. 22, 23. which was at Philippi; but that he was ſo many times beaten in this way, there is no room to doubt: once was I ſtoned. This was at Lyſtra, at the inſtigation of the Jews that came from Antioch and Iconium, Acts xiv. 19. by whom he was left for dead: thrice I ſuffered ſhipwreck; neither of which are mentioned by Luke in the Acts of the Apoſtles; for the ſhipwreck he ſuffered as he went to Rome, was ſome time after the writing of this epiſtle, and therefore cannot be one of theſe here referred to: a night and a day I have been in the deep; ſome underſtand this of a well, called Bythos or the deep, which was near Lyſtra, where the Apoſtle was hid for ſuch a ſpace of time after his deliverance there; but this, were it ſo, he would ſcarcely reckon among his very great hardſhips and ſufferings: others of a priſon at Cyzicum in Aſia, which becauſe of its very great heighth, was called the depth of the ſea, in which the Apoſtle was impriſoned for ſuch a time; but we no where read that he ever was at that place, or preached there, and much leſs was impriſoned there; and had he, it is not likely that he ſhould ſo particularly point out ſuch a ſhort impriſonment, but would have let it paſs in the general account of being in priſons before-mention'd: but rather this is to be underſtood of the ſea, often called the deep in ſcripture, where by ſome accident he was caſt, and was in it, as the Syriac verſion has it, דלא ספינתא, where was no ſhip, or without one, being ſhipwrecked; or being caſt, or having fallen into the ſea, he was ſwimming in it, or was preſerved by a broken piece of the ſhip, or by ſome other means, or by the wonderful providence of God for ſo long a time; tho' as ſailing in thoſe times was chiefly by coaſting, this phraſe may only ſignify that the ſhip in which he was, was drove from the coaſt into the ſea, and loſt ſight of land for the ſpace of a day and night, and lay floating about in the deep, which was reckoned very dangerous. The word νυχθημερον, a night-day, ſignifies a whole natural day, conſiſting of a night and a day; and is an Hebraiſm, and anſwers to ערב ובקר, the evening and the morning, which make a full day; ſee Gen. i. 5, 8, 13, 19, 23. Dan. viii. 14.

Ver. 26. In journeying often, &c.] Thro' ſeveral countries and kingdoms to preach the Goſpel, as he did from Jeruſalem round about to Illyricum: in perils of waters; by the floods being out, which made it very troubleſome and dangerous travelling, eſpecially to perſons on foot, as was the caſe of our Apoſtle: in perils of robbers; for tho' he had ſeldom much to loſe, yet was in danger of being ill uſed, and of his life being taken away by ſuch ruffians: in perils by my own countrymen; the Jews, who bore an implacable hatred to him, becauſe of the doctrines of grace he preached, in oppoſition to the works of the law of Moſes, whether moral or ceremonial; and who generally were concerned in ſtirring up the Gentiles againſt him wherever he came: in perils by the heathen; the Gentiles, who were incenſed againſt him for inveighing againſt their idols and idolatrous worſhip, and other wicked and enormous practices they were addicted to; particularly at Epheſus, by the means of Demetrius the ſhrine-maker, Acts xix. in perils in the city; in any and every city he came into; for bonds and afflictions abode him every where, as at Jeruſalem, Damaſcus, Antioch, Epheſus, Philippi, Theſſalonica, &c. in perils in the wilderneſs; by robbers and wild beaſts, thro' hunger and thirſt, and by the ſands in hurricanes and tempeſts; tho' this may be underſtood not ſtrictly of deſart places, but of the country in diſtinction from the city; ſee the note on Matt. iii. 1. where travelling is difficult and dangerous, and the people more ruſtic and uncivil: the phraſe, בסכנת המדברות, in perils of the wilderneſſes, is a rabbinical one[p]; as is alſo, הסכנה בים, peril in the ſea[q], next mentioned: in perils in the ſea; not only by ſhipwreck, but thro' pirates, and the ill uſage of mariners, want of proviſions, &c. in perils among falſe brethren; who pretended to be chriſtians, but judaized, teaching the neceſſity of obſerving circumciſion, and other ceremonies of the law, in order to ſalvation; theſe, as the Apoſtle always warmly oppoſed, ſo they were ſworn enemies to him, and ever ſought to do him what miſchief they could.

Ver. 27. In wearineſs and painfulneſs, &c.] Thro' long journies and frequent preaching; or in labour and trouble; or in troubleſome labour, for all labour is not ſo; as hunting, hawking, &c. tho' laborious, yet delightful; but the labours of the Apoſtle were painful and troubleſome to the fleſh, tho' he had much inward ſpiritual delight and pleaſure in them: in watchings often; being ſometimes engaged at midnight, either in preaching, or praying, or ſinging Pſalms, and ſometimes obliged to work early and late with his own hands to ſupply his neceſſities: in hunger and thirſt; as when at ſea, or in wilderneſs places, or where no notice was taken of him for preaching the Goſpel; he doing that freely without aſking the aſſiſtance of any, which in ſome places would have been prejudicial to his deſigns, and the ſpread of the Goſpel: in faſtings often; voluntary ones, which he engaged in, not as meritorious works, but to keep under his body, and as proper to attend the work of prayer at certain times: in cold and nakedneſs; when travelling in the winter ſeaſon, and but poorly cloathed to keep him from the inclemencies of the weather; and having no certain dwelling-place to retire unto and abide in, during any ſevere ſeaſon there might be, and wanting the comforts of life to ſupport under ſuch inconveniencies.

Ver. 28. Beſides thoſe things that are without, &c.] Or are omitted, which he had paſſed by, and had not mentioned in the account and enumeration of things he had given; for otherwiſe the things he had taken notice of and inſtanced in, were things external; but beſides them and many other things which would be too tedious to relate, that which cometh upon me daily, is not to be forgotten; meaning the prodigious deal of buſineſs which was every day upon his hands, thro' the continual coming of brethren to him, either for advice, or comfort, or inſtruction; and thro' the multiplicity of letters from divers parts, which he was obliged to give anſwers to; and the ſeveral duties of the day, as prayer, meditation, reading, praiſing, preaching, &c. and to ſum up the whole, and which is explanative of the phraſe, the care of all the churches; not of ten, or twenty, or ſome only; but of all of them, he being the Apoſtle of the Gentiles, and was concerned in planting, and raiſing them, and preaching the Goſpel to moſt of them; and who continually ſtood in need of his watch and care over them, to provide miniſters for ſome, to prevent ſchiſms and heal diviſions in others; to preſerve others from errors and hereſies, and warn them of the dangers to which they were expoſed by falſe teachers; and to animate, ſtrengthen and ſupport others under violent perſecutions, leſt their faith ſhould fail, and they be tempted to deſert the Goſpel, and drop their profeſſion of religion.

Ver. 29. Who is weak, and I am not weak? &c.] What church is ſo? or what particular believer is ſo? for he had not only the care of all the churches, but of all believers upon him; whoever was weak in the faith he was concerned for them, to inſtruct, eſtabliſh, and ſtrengthen them; and ſuited his diſcourſes, reaſonings, and language to their capacity, that they might underſtand him, and take in right notions of things: or whoever was of a weak and ſcrupulous conſcience about things indifferent, and fearful of uſing them leſt they ſhould ſin in ſo doing, he was cautious of offending them, or doing any thing by which their conſciences ſhould be defiled, and their peace be broken: or whoever was afflicted, either in body or mind, he ſympathized and bore a part with them: who is offended, and I burn not? whoever was ſtumbled and made to fall by any thing he ſaid or did, or by the words and actions of others, it gave him ſenſible pain, it made him very uneaſy; he was as one in a flame, all on fire, full of grief and trouble till the cauſe of the offence was removed, and the perſon offended made eaſy and reſtored; the word here uſed anſwers to the Hebrew word, עגם, uſed in Job xxx. 25. where it is ſaid, was not my ſoul grieved for the poor? which Mr. Broughton renders, did not my ſoul burn for the poor? Now by all this which the Apoſtle did and ſuffered, by all actions and ſufferings, care and ſympathy, he fully appeared to be a true and faithful miniſter of Chriſt, and abundantly more than the falſe Apoſtles, who could produce none of theſe things as teſtimonies in their favour.

Ver. 30. If I muſt needs glory, &c.] The Apoſtle ſignifies that glorying was not agreeable to him; he was not fond of it, it was a ſubject he did not delight to dwell upon; what he had done was by force, and thro' neceſſity; he was compelled to it by the boaſts of the falſe Apoſtles: and ſince he muſt needs glory in order to ſtop their mouths, I will glory, ſays he, of things which concern mine infirmities; meaning not his ſins, for theſe cauſe ſhame; but his afflictions and ſufferings for Chriſt, under which he was ſupported, and from which he was delivered by the power of Chriſt, and that was the reaſon he choſe to glory of them; for tho' they rendered him mean and deſpicable in the eyes of the world, yet his bearing them with ſo much patience, courage and pleaſure, and his many ſingular deliverances out of them, ſerved greatly to illuſtrate the power and grace of Chriſt, and at the ſame time proved him to be a true and faithful miniſter of the Goſpel; to whom ſo much honour was vouchſafed, as to ſuffer ſhame for the name of Chriſt, and to be ſo ſingularly mark'd out by him, as the object of his favour, love, and care.

Ver. 31. The God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] Theſe words are in the form of an oath, and are a ſolemn appeal to God that knows all things, for the truth of the whole that he had declared in the foregoing verſes, and of the remarkable deliverance related in the following. God, ſays he, who is the ſearcher of hearts, and an omniſcient being, to whom all things are open and manifeſt, knoweth that I lye not; in any one ſingle inſtance he had mentioned, nor in what he was about to declare; which becauſe it was a fact done by a ſtratagem, and a good while ago, and which was not known to the Corinthians, and of which perhaps at that time he could not produce any witneſſes; therefore calls God to teſtify the truth of it, whom he deſcribes as the God and Father of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; God is his God as mediator, and head of the elect, to whom as to them he is a covenant God; and as man, being his creator, ſupporter, and the object of his faith, hope, love and worſhip; and his Father as God, and the Son of God, by ſupernatural generation, being the only begotten of him, in a way ineffable and inexpreſſible: and who is bleſſed for evermore; in himſelf, and Son, and Spirit, and is the ſource of all happineſs to his creatures.

Ver. 32. In Damaſcus the governor under Aretas the king, &c.] Aretas or Al-Hareth was a king of Arabia, of the family of the Gaſſanii, among whom were many of this name [r]; and who for ſome hundreds of years ruled over Syria, of which Damaſcus was the Metropolis. The fourth king of that family was of this name, and perhaps is the perſon here meant; and after him there were four more of the ſame family ſo called; it was a name of Arabian kings in other families. The fifteenth king of the Yamanenſians was of this name, and ſo was the ſeventeenth of the Hirenſians [s], and the third of the kings of Cenda; in the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, there was an Aretas king of the Arabians, mentioned in 2 Maccab. v. 8. [t] Joſephus [u] alſo makes mention of Aretas king of the Arabians, who ſeems to have been king of Arabia Petræa, ſince his royal ſeat was at Petra, to whom Hyrcanus fled by the advice of Antipater the father of Herod the great; and there was alſo one of this name in the times of Herod himſelf, who ſucceeded Obodas [w]; yea, there was an Aretas king of Petræa, in the times of Herod the Tetrarch, whoſe daughter Herod married, and put her away when he took Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, which occaſioned a quarrel between him and Aretas, which iſſued in a battel, in which Herod was beaten [x]; and who is thought to be the ſame king which is here ſpoken of: the name Aretas or Al-Hareth, as Hillerus [y] obſerves, ſignifies the lion; and a lion with the eaſtern nations was a ſymbol of royalty and dominion; hence ſuch names were given to perſons of illuſtrious birth and power; ſo Ali the ſon-in-law of Mahomet, was called by the Arabs and Perſians, the lion of God: now Syria where Damaſcus was, and which is called by Pliny [z] Damaſcus of Syria, had been of long time in the hands of the kings of Arabia; and [a] Joſephus makes mention of Aretas king of Cæle Syria, who was called to the government by thoſe who had Damaſcus in their hands; very probably by Mileſius, who was governor of the tower of Damaſcus, and commanded των Δαμασκηνων την πολιν, the city of the Damaſcenes, as Joſephus calls Damaſcus, juſt as it is here in the next clauſe; in which country of Cæleſyria, Ptolomy [b] alſo places Damaſcus; and Grotius has proved from Juſtin Martyr [c] and Tertullian [d], that Damaſcus formerly belonged to Arabia, tho' in their times it was reckoned to Syro Phœnicia: here the Apoſtle preached to the confounding of the Jews that dwelt there, which provoked them to enter into a conſultation to take away his life; and that he might not eſcape their hands, they moved to the then governor who was under the king, that the gates might be watched day and night; ſee Acts ix. 23, 24, 25. to which he agreed; and as the Apoſtle here ſays, kept the city of the Damaſcenes with a garriſon, or ſet a guard about it; or as the Arabic verſion reads it, he ſhut up the city; and placed a watch at the gates of it night and day, or allowed the Jews to do ſo: deſirous to apprehend me; in order to deliver him into their hands, who were now his ſworn enemies for the Goſpel's ſake; willing to do them this favour to ingratiate himſelf into their affections; or perhaps it might be inſinuated to him, that he was a ſeditious perſon.

Ver. 33. And thro' a window in a baſket was I let down, &c.] The houſe in which he was, like Rahab's, was built upon the wall of the city, and as ſhe let down the ſpies by a cord thro' the window, and as David was by Michal; ſo the Apoſtle was let down by the brethren with cords, as Jeremiah was, Jer. xxxviii. 6. where the Septuagint uſe the ſame word as here, thro' a window; which as the Arabic verſion reads it, was in the wall; or he was let down by the wall ſide, in a baſket or net; ſo σαργανη, and סריגתא, the word which the Syriac verſion here uſes, ſignifie and deſign a baſket made of withs, wrought together in the form of net-work; frequent mention is made in the Jewiſh writings [e] of סריגות החלונות, the net-works and lattices of windows; whether theſe were not taken off the window and put into a form like a baſket, and in it the Apoſtle let down by the brethren with the help of cords, may be inquired into: however, he eſcaped his hands; the governor's, and the Jews too who lay in wait for him. This deliverance he mentions with thankfulneſs to God, and as an inſtance of divine providence in the preſervation of him, for much uſefulneſs to the church of Chriſt; the Vulgate Latin verſion reads, and thus he eſcaped his hands.

CHAP. XII.

THE Apoſtle in this chapter proceeds upon the ſame ſubject, in vindicating himſelf againſt the falſe teachers, and giving proof of his apoſtleſhip; he takes notice of a very remarkable and unuſual viſion he was favoured with; makes mention of an uncommon temptation of ſatan, how he was delivered from it, and the uſe it was of to him; excuſes his boaſting to the Corinthians; lays the blame of it upon them who obliged him to do it, tho' they had ſuch undeniable proofs of his apoſtleſhip among them; ſignifies he intended to come and ſee them, and expreſſes his ſtrong affection for them, and good will towards them; removes the calumnies of covetouſneſs, guile, and craftineſs; reproves them for their ſins, and threatens them in caſe of impenitence. Tho' in ſome reſpects glorying was not ſo convenient, and quite diſagreeable to the Apoſtle himſelf, yet ſuch were his circumſtances, that it was become neceſſary for him to do it, and therefore goes on with it; and to his character, qualifications, labours, ſufferings, and deliverances, adds the viſions and revelations of the Lord he had been honoured with, ver. 1. and ſingles out a very particular one, which he deſcribes by the time when, about fourteen years ago; by the perſon who ſaw it, himſelf, whom he ſpeaks of in the third perſon, that there might be as little appearance of boaſting as poſſible; by the place where it was ſeen, the third heaven, into which he was caught; by the form or manner of the viſion, or the circumſtance and condition in which he was when he ſaw it, of which he could give no account; as whether in or out of the body, ver. 2. which laſt circumſtance is repeated to denote the certainty of it, and his ignorance as to this part of it; for the truth of which he appeals to God, ver. 3. and affirms again, that ſuch an one as he had deſcribed was caught up to paradiſe; by which he explains what he meant by the third heaven, and further declares, that being there he heard words unutterable, ver. 4. Now tho' this viſion was matter of glorying, yet ſince he was the perſon that was ſo highly honoured with it, he would not dwell any longer on it, but rather ſpeak of his infirmities, as he afterwards does, ver. 5. yet if he had ſhewn a deſign of boaſting, it would not have been acting a fooliſh part; however, he thought it beſt to forbear, leſt it ſhould lead any into too high an opinion of him, ver. 6. and indeed, theſe high enjoyments were apt to fill himſelf with pride and vanity, wherefore God in his infinite wiſdom, thought fit to take ſome methods to humble him; which leads him to give an account of a ſore temptation that befel him, which was grievous to him, and in which he was buffeted by ſatan; the end of which was to keep down his pride, and hide it from him, ver. 7. The uſe this was of to him, and how he behaved under it, and the requeſt he made to the Lord to be freed from it, are declared in ver. 8. to which he received an anſwer, which was full and ſatisfactory, gave him pleaſure, and determined him to glory in his infirmities, ver. 9. which he does in ver. 10. and gives an enumeration of them, and his reaſon for glorying in them: and whereas he knew he ſhould be chargeable with folly, in glorying in other things as he had done, he blames the Corinthians for it, who had obliged him to it; for had they engaged as they ſhould have done in the vindication and commendation of him, there would have been no need of his own; and they were furniſhed with matter and arguments enough for ſuch a purpoſe, ſince it muſt have been a plain caſe to them that he was not inferior to the chief of the Apoſtles, ver. 11. of which they had a full demonſtration, partly by the ſigns, wonders, and mighty deeds which were done in the midſt of them by him, ver. 12. and partly by the gifts of grace beſtowed on them thro' his miniſtry, on account of which they did not come ſhort of any other churches; unleſs it was in this, that they had the Goſpel preached without charge unto them, ver. 13. the Apoſtle goes on to acquaint them, that he had a third time intended to come and ſee them, when he would be no more burdenſome and chargeable to them than he had been before; have no regard to theirs but to them, acting the part of a father that lays up for his children, but takes nothing from them, ver. 14. and expreſſes his ſtrong affection for them, even tho' they ſhould ſhew but little to him, and his earneſt deſire to be ſerviceable to them, and the pleaſure he ſhould take therein, ver. 15. and whereas it was ſuggeſted by the falſe teachers, that tho' he did not take money of them in perſon, he had uſed ſome underhand crafty methods by the means of others, to drain them of it, ver. 16. he replies and vindicates his innocence, by putting the queſtion to them in general; whether he had made any gain by any perſons he had ſent to them, ver. 17. and particularly inaſmuch as he had ſent Titus and another brother, whether he had made any gain of them, and whether the Apoſtle and he were not of the ſame ſpirit; and whether they did not take the ſame ſteps, ver. 18. and then obſerves, that all the pains that he took in the vindication of himſelf, was not ſo much on his own account as theirs, even for their edification, that that might not be hindred, for whom he had the moſt indeared affection; and for the truth of all this he appeals to God, ver. 19. and cloſes this chapter with obſerving the many evils which were among them, which he feared he ſhould find among them when he came, unrepented of; and which would be matter of grief and humiliation to him, and oblige him to uſe that ſeverity among them which would not be agreeable to them, ver. 20, 21.

Ver. 1. It is not expedient doubtleſs for me to glory, &c.] Tho' it was lawful for him to glory, and was neceſſary in the preſent circumſtances of things, in vindication of himſelf, and to preſerve the Corinthians from being carried away with the inſinuations of the falſe Apoſtles; and ſo for the honour and intereſt of Chriſt and the Goſpel; yet it was not expedient on ſome other accounts, or profitable and ſerviceable to himſelf; he might find that it tended to ſtir up pride, vanity and elation of mind in him, and might be interpreted by others as proud boaſting and vain glorying; wherefore he choſe to drop it, and paſs on to another ſubject; or rather tho' it was not expedient to proceed, yet before he entirely quitted it, he thought it proper to ſay ſomething of the extraordinary appearances of God unto him. Some copies, and the Vulgate Latin verſion read, if there was need of glorying, it is not indeed expedient; the Syriac verſion, there is need of glorying, but it is not expedient; and the Arabic verſion, neither have I need to glory, nor is it expedient for me: I will come to viſions and revelations of the Lord; ſuch as the Lord had made to him, and not man; and which were not the fruit of his own fancy, or the deluſions of ſatan; but were from the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, and for his glory. The Apoſtle might very well ſpeak of viſions, or heavenly appearances, ſince he was favoured with many; his converſion was owing to a viſion or appearance of Chriſt to him, whom he ſaw with his bodily eyes, and heard him ſpeaking to him, and which he calls, the heavenly viſion; at another time when at Troas, a viſion appeared to him in the night, and a man of Macedonia ſtood and prayed him to come over and help them; and when at Corinth the Lord ſpoke to him by a viſion, and bid him not be afraid, but go on preaching the Goſpel, becauſe he had much people there to be brought in thro' his miniſtry: and as for revelations, beſides what are ordinary and common to all believers, he had extraordinary ones; the Goſpel and the ſcheme of it, the knowledge of the ſeveral particular doctrines of it, were not attained to by him in the common way, but he had them by the revelation of Jeſus Chriſt; the ſeveral myſterious parts of it, particularly that of the calling of the Gentiles, to which might be added, the change that will be upon the living ſaints at Chriſt's ſecond coming, were made known to him by revelation; and ſometimes in this extraordinary way, he was directed to go to ſuch or ſuch a place, as at a certain time he went up to Jeruſalem by revelation, where he was to do or ſuffer many things for the ſake of Chriſt: tho' he had no revelation of any thing that was different from, and much leſs contrary to the Goſpel, and as it was preached by the other Apoſtles; for there was an entire agreement between him and them in their miniſtry; ſee Gal. ii. 2, 7, 8. and theſe viſions and revelations were for his inſtruction, direction, and encouragement in the miniſtration of the Goſpel; and being of an extraordinary nature, were ſuitable to thoſe extraordinary times, and not to be expected in an ordinary way, nor is there any need of them now; beſides, theſe were viſions and revelations of the Lord, and not the effects of enthuſiaſm, and a warm imagination, nor diabolical deluſions, or the pretenſions and cheats of deſigning men; and were for the confirmation and eſtabliſhment of the Goſpel, and not to countenance a new ſcheme, or introduce a new diſpenſation; wherefore all viſions and revelations men pretend to, which are for ſuch a purpoſe, are to be deſpiſed and rejected.

Ver. 2. I knew a man in Chriſt above fourteen years ago, &c.] Which is to be underſtood of himſelf, as appears from ver. 7. where he ſpeaks in the firſt perſon; and the reaſon why he here ſpeaks in the third, is to ſhew his modeſty and humility, and how much he declined vain glory and popular applauſe; and whilſt he is ſpeaking of himſelf, ſtudies as it were to conceal himſelf from being the perſon deſigned, and to draw off the mind of the reader from him to another perſon; tho' another cannot be intended, for it would not have been to his purpoſe, yea, quite beſide it, when he propoſes to come to viſions and revelations he had of the Lord, to have inſtanced in the rapture of another. Moreover, the full and certain knowledge he had of this man, of the place he was caught up to, and of the things he there heard beſt agrees with him; as alſo his atteſting, in ſuch a ſolemn way, his ignorance of the manner of this rapture, whether in the body or out of the body, and which he repeats and refers to the knowledge of God, clearly ſhews he muſt mean himſelf; beſides, it would otherwiſe have been no inſtance of any viſion of his, nor would the rapture of another have at all affected his character, commendation, and praiſe, or given him any occaſion of glorying as this did; tho' he did not chuſe to take it, as is clear by his ſaying that if he gloried of it he ſhould not be a fool, yet forbore, leſt others ſhould entertain too high an opinion of him; and after all, he was in ſome danger of being elated with this viſion along with others, that the following ſore temptation was permitted, to prevent his being exalted with it above meaſure: and when he calls this perſon, meaning himſelf, a man, it is not to diſtinguiſh him from an angel, whoſe habitation is in the third heaven, and ſo no wonderful thing to be found there; or from any other creature; nor perhaps only to expreſs his ſex, a man, and not a woman, tho' the Syriac verſion uſes the word גברא, peculiar to the maſculine ſex; but merely to deſign a perſon, and it is all one as if it had been ſaid, I knew a perſon, or I knew one in Chriſt: and the phraſe in Chriſt, is not to be connected with the word know, as if the ſenſe was, that he called Chriſt to witneſs the truth of what he was about to ſay, and that what he ſhould ſay was not with a view to his own glory, but to the glory and honour of Chriſt only; but it is to be connected with the word man, and denotes his being in Chriſt, and that either, as Dr. Hammond thinks, in a ſingular and extraordinary manner; as John is ſaid to be in the Spirit, Rev. i. 10. that is, in an extaſy; and ſo here this man was in the Spirit of Chriſt, and tranſported by him to ſee viſions, and have revelations; or rather it intends a ſpiritual being in Chriſt, union to him, the effect of which is communion with him. The date of fourteen years ago, may refer either to the time when the Apoſtle firſt had the knowledge of his being in Chriſt, which was at his converſion; he was in Chriſt from all eternity, being given to him, choſen in him, loved by him, ſet as a ſeal upon his heart, as well as engraven on the palms of his hands, and repreſented by him, and in him, in the everlaſting covenant; and ſo in time, at his crucifixion, death, burial, reſurrection, aſcenſion, and ſeſſion at the right hand of God; in conſequence of all which when the ſet time was come, he became a new creature, was converted and believed in Chriſt, and then he knew himſelf to be in him; he was in him ſecretly before, now openly; and this was about fourteen years before the writing of this epiſtle; the exact time of his converſion might well be known and remembered by him, it being in ſuch an extraordinary manner: or elſe this date may refer to the time of his rapture, which ſome have thought was ſometime within the three days after his converſion, when he was without ſight, and neither eat nor drank; ſome have thought it to be eight years after his converſion; but the moſt probable opinion is, that it was not at Damaſcus, but when he was come again to Jeruſalem, and was praying in the temple, and was in a trance or extaſy, Acts xxii. 17. tho' the difference there is among chronologers, and the uncertainty of their conjectures, both as to the time of the Apoſtle's converſion, and the writing of this epiſtle, makes it very difficult to determine this point. They that make this rapture to be at the time of his converſion, ſeem to be furtheſt off of the truth of things; for whether his converſion be placed in the 34th year of Chriſt, as ſome, or in the 35th, as others, or in the 36th; and this epiſtle be thought to be written either in the 56th or 58th or 60th, the date of fourteen years will agree with neither: they indeed make things to agree together beſt, who place his converſion in the year 36, make this rapture to be eight years after, in the year 44, and this epiſtle to be written in the year 58. Dr. Lightfoot puts the converſion of the Apoſtle in the year 34, the rapture of him into the third heaven, in the year 43, at the time of the famine in the reign of Claudius, Acts xi. 28. when he was in a trance at Jeruſalem, Acts xxii. 17. and the writing of this epiſtle, in the year 57. That great chronologer biſhop Uſher, places Paul's converſion in the year 35, his rapture in the year 46, and the writing of this epiſtle in the year 60. So that upon the whole it is hard to ſay when this rapture was; and it may be, it was at neither of the viſions recorded in the ſcripture, which the Apoſtle had, but at ſome other time no where elſe made mention of: when, as he here ſays, ſuch an one was caught up to the third heaven; the ſeat of the divine majeſty, and the reſidence of the holy angels; where the ſouls of departed ſaints go immediately upon their diſſolution; and the bodies and ſouls of thoſe who have been tranſlated, caught up, and raiſed already, are;

and where the glorified body of Chriſt is and will be, until his ſecond coming. This is called the third heaven, in reſpect to the airy and ſtarry heavens. The Apoſtle refers to a diſtinction among the Jews of שמיא עילאי ושמיא מיצעאי ושמיא תתאי, the ſupreme heaven, the middle heaven, and the lower heaven [f]; and who alſo make a like diviſion of worlds, and which they call עולם עליון ועולם האמצעי והעולם השפל, the ſupreme world, and the middle world, and the lower world [g]; and ſometimes [h] the world of angels, the world of the orbs, and the world of them below; and accordingly the Cabaliſtic doctors talk of three worlds; עלמא תליתאה, the third world, they ſay [i], is the ſupreme world, hidden, treaſured, and ſhut up, which none can know; as it is written, eye hath not ſeen, &c. and is the ſame with the Apoſtle's third heaven. The ſtate and condition in which he was during this rapture, is expreſſed by the following words, put into a parentheſis, whether in the body I cannot tell, or whether out of the body I cannot tell, God knoweth; whether his ſoul remained in his body, and he was caught up ſoul and body into heaven, as Elijah was carried thither ſoul and body in a chariot with horſes of fire; or whether his ſoul was out of his body, and he was diſembodied for a time, as Philo the Jew [k] ſays that Moſes was, ασωματον, without the body, during his ſtay of forty days and as many nights in the mount; or whether this was not all in a viſionary way, as John was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and Ezekiel was taken by a lock of his head, and lifted up by the Spirit between earth and heaven, and brought in the viſions of God to Jeruſalem, cannot be ſaid. The Apoſtle did not know himſelf, and much leſs can any other be able to ſay how it was; it is beſt with him to refer and leave it to the omniſcient God; one of the four perſons the Jews ſay entered into paradiſe, who are hereafter mentioned in the note on ver. 4. is ſaid to have his mind ſnatched away in a divine rapture [l]; that is, he was not himſelf; he knew not where he was, or whether in the body or out, as ſays the Apoſtle.

Ver. 3. And I knew ſuch a man, &c.] The ſame man, namely himſelf, is here deſigned, and the ſame rapture ſpoken of, and the condition he was in expreſſed in the ſame words; which repetition is made for the more ſtrong affirmation of what he delivered, and to ſignify the marvellouſneſs of this viſion, and how ſurpriſing and unaccountable it was.

Ver. 4. How that he was caught up into paradiſe, &c.] Not the earthly paradiſe in which our firſt parents were; this was deſtroyed by the flood, and the place where it was not now to be known; and to what purpoſe the Apoſtle ſhould be carried thither cannot be gueſſed at; tho' ſome have thought that this is here meant: but nor this, nor any place diſtinct from the third heaven, or place of the bleſſed, is meant; which is the ſenſe of many of the ancients, who ſuppoſe the third heaven and paradiſe to be two diſtinct places, and that the Apoſtle had two ſeparate raptures. Clemens Alexandrinus [m], reads the words thus, I knew a man in Chriſt caught up to the third heaven, κακειθεν εις τον παραδεισον, from thence to paradiſe; and ſo Theophylact upon the place ſays, "from the third heaven he "was immediately caught up into paradiſe;" and ſo Œcumenius, "he was caught up unto the third "heaven, and again from thence into paradiſe;" and ſome modern writers have been inclined to think there were two raptures, and the rather inaſmuch as the Apoſtle is ſaid to be caught up to the one, and caught up into the other, and makes uſe of the words caught up twice; or otherwiſe he would be guilty of a tautology, both in that and in repeating his ignorance of the manner of the rapture; to which is added, that he propoſed to ſpeak of viſions and revelations in the plural number, ver. 1. and afterwards calls this viſion an abundance of revelations, ver. 7. but as it was at the ſame time that he was caught up to the third heaven, and into paradiſe, there being one and the ſame date of fourteen years ago to both; and as in the account of the one and the other, he was equally ignorant of the manner how he was caught up, whether in the body, or out of the body; and ſeeing that there is no account of what he ſaw and heard in the third heaven, but only what he heard in paradiſe, which is referred to be told in the after account of this viſion; and as the third heaven and paradiſe are one and the ſame place, it ſeems moſt reaſonable to conclude, that not two raptures and two viſions are here deſigned, but only one; and without any ſhew of a vain repetition, the Apoſtle having begun the account of this viſion, might re-aſſume what he had ſaid, in order to give a more plain and clear account of it; and eſpecially as there were ſome things he had not yet mentioned, and the whole was not eaſy to be underſtood and taken in, and the manner of it, even unknown to himſelf; and this he might do to raiſe the attention the more unto it, as being ſomething wonderful and extraordinary; beſides, if his deſign had been to have given an account of two raptures, he would have diſtinguiſhed them in a numerical way; and would have told us that he was twice caught up, as well as he afterwards ſays that he beſought the Lord thrice, at another time; and this would have been neceſſary to have prevented a miſtake, of taking the one and the other for the ſame rapture, as is generally done: heaven is called paradiſe, becauſe as the garden of Eden which bears that name, was of God's planting, ſo is this made and prepared by him; as that was a delightful place, ſo is this; alſo becauſe of Chriſt the tree of life, which is in the midſt of it, beſides an innumerable company of angels, and ſpirits of juſt men made perfect, the pure and undefiled inhabitants of it; and becauſe of the river of divine love, of endleſs pleaſures, the ſaints there are made to drink of. It was uſual with the Jews to call heaven גן עדן, the garden of Eden, or paradiſe; and which they [n] ſometimes ſpeak of as upper and lower; the lower they ſuppoſe the ſouls of men are introduced into, immediately upon their diſſolution; where they ſtay a while, and then go up to the upper paradiſe, the world of ſouls, where Abraham, Iſaac and Jacob are. The Jews ought not to object to the Apoſtle's being had into paradiſe before his de[illegible], for they tell us of ſeveral that entered there whilſt alive; "nine, they ſay [o], נכנסו בחייהם בגן עדן, entered "in their life time into the garden of Eden, or pa-"radiſe; and theſe are they, Enoch the ſon of "Jared, and Elijah, and the Meſſiah, and Eliezer "the ſervant of Abraham, and Hiram king of "Tyre, and Ebed Melec the Ethiopian, and Jabez "the ſon of Rabbi Judah the prince, and Betbiah "the daughter of Pharaoh, and Sarah the daughter “ of Aſher; and there are ſome that ſay alſo [p], Rabbi Joſhua ben Levi;” and in another place [q], “ four נכנסו בפרדם, entered into paradiſe; and theſe are they, Ben Azzai, and Ben Zoma, another, and R. Akiba;” upon which is [r] added, “ they entered into paradiſe as it were by the hands of God, and they did not aſcend up above really, but it ſeemed to them as if they aſcended;” how far this may ſerve to explain and illuſtrate the Apoſtle's caſe, I leave, with this obſervation more concerning another uſe of the word paradiſe with them; which ſometimes ſignifies a conſiderable ſhare of knowledge of myſterious things, relating to the nature of God, Angels, &c. of which Maimonides having ſpoken, ſays [s], “ theſe things the former wiſe men called, פרדס, paradiſe, as they ſay, four entered into paradiſe; and altho' they were the greateſt men of Iſrael, and exceeding wiſe men, yet they had not all of them power to know and comprehend all theſe things clearly; and I ſay, that he is not fit to walk בפרדס, in paradiſe; but he whoſe belly is filled with fleſh and bread, and it is bread and fleſh to know what is forbidden, and what is lawful, and the other precepts of a like nature:” and again [t], “ a man that is filled with all theſe virtues (meaning with wiſdom, and underſtanding, and government of the paſſions and appetites) is perfect in his body, as he that enters into paradiſe, and inclines himſelf to theſe things which are great and afar off:” once more [u], “ the words of the tradition are comprehended in the written law, and the expoſition of them in the oral law; and the things which are called פרדס, paradiſe, are contained in the Talmud;” this they [w] call, פרדס החכמה, the paradiſe of wiſdom; whether this ſenſe and uſe of the word may be applied to the paſſage before us, and ſo be expreſſive of that large ſhare of divine knowledge which was communicated in an extraordinary way to the Apoſtle, may deſerve ſome conſideration: however, this is certain, that when he was caught up into paradiſe, he heard unſpeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter; to inſtance in particular things, which he then either ſaw or heard, as ſome have done, is bold and daring; as that he ſaw the divine being with the eyes of his underſtanding, the ſeveral angelic forms, thrones, dominions, principalities and powers, and the glory and beauty of the ſouls of departed ſaints; and heard the harmonious muſick of each of theſe happy creatures; had a view of the book of life, and was ſhown the order and method of divine predeſtination; was let into the myſtery of the calling of the Gentiles, and the change that will be on living ſaints; and heard the whole account of the diſpenſation of things, in the church of Chriſt to the end of the world: the things were unſpeakable, never yet related, and ſo not to be known; they were ſuch things which the Apoſtle himſelf, when out of the rapture, might have but very inadequate ideas of, and ſuch he as was not able to put into proper words and language to be underſtood by others; and which as he heard them not from a mere man, but from the Lord, ſo no mere man was able to utter them, none but he of whom he had heard them: and beſides, whatever conceptions the Apoſtle might have of them himſelf, and how capable ſoever he was of expreſſing them; yet they were not fit and proper to be told in the preſent ſtate of things, being no part of the counſel of God relating to man's ſalvation, the whole of which he faithfully declares; and yet were neceſſary to be heard by him, in order to eſtabliſh his faith in the Goſpel, to animate him in his miniſtry, and fortify his mind againſt all the afflictions, reproaches and perſecutions, he was to meet with for the ſake of Chriſt. The phraſe ſeems to be the ſame with אי אפשר לאמרו, it is impoſſible to ſay it [x]; and of ſuch like ſecret things in paradiſe, or the world of ſouls, the Jews ſay [y], that “ they are hidden, and which אינם ראוים לעלות בכתיבה, are not fit to produce in writing;” and ſo theſe were ſuch as were not lawful to ſpeak out, γλωσσαις ανθρωπιναις, with human tongues, as Juſtin Martyr ſays [z]: they were not in ſuch ſenſe unſpeakable, as not to be expreſſed by any; for they were expreſſed either by Chriſt himſelf, who was glorified in human nature, whom the Apoſtle might now ſee and hear, or by ſome angel or angels, or they could not have been heard by the Apoſtle as they were; but they were ſuch as before had never been ſpoken to any mortal man, and ſo could never have been ſpoken by any; and tho' they had been ſpoken to a mortal man, yet they could not be ſpoke by him to others; for tho' when he heard them, his human ſoul, for that preſent time, might conceive and take in much of the nature and meaning of them, yet were ſuch he could not expreſs by words, and repreſent to others by ſpeech after the viſion was over, and eſpecially at this diſtance: not that it was ſinful to have done it, if he could have done it; or that the things themſelves were of ſuch a nature, that it would have been criminal to have rehearſed them; but rather that it was impoſſible to do it, at leaſt fully, ſince they might greatly regard the glory of the divine being, and the worſhip paid him by the heavenly inhabitants; or could it be done in any tolerable manner, it might not be altogether convenient and proper in the preſent ſtate of things; ſince the worſhip of the upper world lying in praiſe without prayer, might not be ſo fit to be related, leſt it ſhould be imitated by ſaints on earth: and ſeeing what the Apoſtle heard was ineffable and not to be ſpoken by himſelf; no credit is to be given to thoſe ſpurious things called the Revelation and Aſcenſion of ſaint Paul, in which the author or authors of them pretend to tell us what theſe things were.

Ver. 5. Of ſuch an one will I glory, &c.] [a] The Apoſtle in great modeſty ſeems to ſpeak of ſome other perſon, and not himſelf, as caught up into the third heaven, when he yet means himſelf; and does as it were diſtinguiſh himſelf from himſelf; himſelf in paradiſe, from himſelf on earth; his ſenſe is, that tho' he might lawfully glory of ſuch a perſon ſo highly exalted and favoured, yet ſince this was his own caſe, he choſe to forbear and ſay no more of it: yet of myſelf I will not glory; tho' he could, and might, and did glory in the Lord, who had done ſuch great things for him; as that he was in Chriſt, and knew himſelf to be ſo, had been rapt up into heaven and heard things unutterable; yet he would not glory of theſe things as from himſelf, as owing to any merit or worthineſs of his, but as inſtances of mere favour, grace and goodneſs; if he gloried of any thing of himſelf in his preſent ſtate and condition, it ſhould be of his weakneſſes: but in mine infirmities; not his ſinful ones, for theſe he mourned over, and was humbled before God and man under a ſenſe of; but his many preſſing difficulties of life, heavy reproaches, very great afflictions, and violent perſecutions he endured for Chriſt's ſake; ſee ver. 10.

Ver. 6. For tho' I would deſire to glory, &c.] Had a mind to it, choſe it, and was fond of it, thought fit to proceed in this way concerning this viſion, or this with many others: I ſhall not be a fool; in reality; tho' he might ſeem and be thought to be ſo by others; he does indeed before, call his glorying folly, and ſpeaking fooliſhly; but he means only as it might be interpreted by others, for in fact it was not: the reaſon is, for I will ſay the truth; he ſaid nothing but what was ſtrictly true, in the account of himſelf in the preceding chapter, and appeals to God as his witneſs; nor any thing in the relation of this viſion, but what was entirely agreeable to truth; and to ſpeak truth, tho' it be of a man's ſelf, when he is called to it cannot be deemed folly: but now I forbear; he did not chuſe to go on, or ſay any more upon this head at this time; tho' he had many viſions, and an abundance of revelations, yet he did not judge it proper to give a particular account of them: leſt any man ſhould think of me above that which he ſeeth me to be, or that he heareth of me; ſhould take him to be more than human, as before this the Lycaonians at Lyſtra did; who ſuppoſed that he and Barnabas, were Gods come down in the likeneſs of men, and brought out their oxen and garlands to do ſacrifice to them; and as after this, the inhabitants of Melita ſeeing the viper drop from his hand without any hurt to him, ſaid he was a God; to prevent ſuch extravagant notions of him, he forbore to ſay any more of his extraordinary viſions and revelations; but choſe rather that men ſhould form their judgments of him, by what they ſaw in him and heard from him, as a miniſter of the Goſpel.

Ver. 7. And leſt I ſhould be exalted above meaſure, &c.] Over much elated in his mind, and ſwelled with a vain conceit of himſelf: thro' the abundance of the revelations; for he had not only one or two, or a few, but an abundance of them; and which, as every thing does but grace, tended to lift up his mind, to ſtir up the pride of his heart, and to entertain too high and exalted thoughts of himſelf. Pride is naturally in every man's heart; converted perſons are not without it; knowledge, gifts, and revelations are apt to puff up with ſpiritual pride, unleſs counterbalanced and overpoized by the grace of God. This great Apoſtle was not out of danger by them, for he was not already perfect; wherefore to prevent an exceſs of pride and vanity in him on account of them, he ſays, there was given to me a thorn in the fleſh, the meſſenger of ſatan to buffet me: many have been the thoughts and conjectures of men about what is here meant by the Apoſtle. This ought to be allowed and taken for granted, that the thorn in the fleſh and the meſſenger of ſatan, deſign one and the ſame thing; the former is a figurative expreſſion, the latter a literal one, and explanative of the former. Some have thought that corporal afflictions are here deſigned, which may be compared to thorns; ſee Hoſ. ii. 6. and which are not joyous, but grievous to the fleſh, and come not by chance, but are by divine appointment, and are deſigned and made uſe of, to hide pride from men; and ſometimes, by divine permiſſion, ſatan has an hand in inflicting them, as in the caſe of Job: whilſt ſuch a general ſenſe is kept to, it is not to be deſpiſed, without entering into the particular bodily diſorder with which the Apoſtle was afflicted, as ſome do; ſome ſaying it was the cholic, others the gout, others a pain in the ear, and others the head-ach; which latter it is ſaid he was much troubled with; but theſe are mere conjectures: others think that the corruptions of nature are intended, which in regenerate perſons are left, as the Canaanites were in the land, to be thorns in the eyes and ſides of the Iſraelites, Joſh. xxiii. 13. Judg. ii. 3. Theſe to be ſure were felt by the Apoſtle, and were very grievous and humbling to him, and were no doubt ſometimes ſtirred up by ſatan, which made him complain bitterly, and groan earneſtly; and it may be obſerved, to ſtrengthen this ſenſe, that it was uſual with the Jews to call concupiſcence, or the vitioſity of nature, ſatan; for ſo they [a] often ſay, השטן הוא יצר הרע, ſatan, he is the evil imagination, or corruption of nature; and particularly, they call the luſt of uncleanneſs by this name; and it is ſaid [b] of a young man of Iſrael, being tempted by a young woman of Midian, thro' the counſel of Balaam, that בוער בו השטן, ſatan burned in him, and he turned aſide after her; and that the evil imagination is the old ſerpent; yea, they call this the meſſenger of hell, a phraſe very much like what is here uſed. "R. Hona [c], as he was preaching to the children of men to take warning, ſaid "unto them, children beware, משליחא של גיהנם, "of the meſſenger of hell; but who is this? the "evil imagination, or concupiſcence, is that which "is the meſſenger of hell;" and this ſenſe is agreeable, provided the particular corruption the Apoſtle was haraſſed with is not pretended to, as is by ſome, who pitch upon the luſt of uncleanneſs, and ſpare not to mention the perſon by name, one Tecla, who they ſay, travelled with him, and was a ſnare to him; but this is to do injury to the character of ſo holy an Apoſtle, and to repreſent him as expoſing himſelf to the falſe Apoſtles, againſt whom he was guarding: others think that a variety of afflictions, reproaches and perſecutions, for Chriſt's ſake and the Goſpel, are here meant, which were as pricking briars and grieving thorns to him; ſee Ezek. xxviii. 24. and which were given and ordered by divine appointment for his good; this ſenſe, ver. 9, 10. lead unto, and ſeem to confirm: others are of opinion that the temptations of ſatan are deſigned, which, as they are called fiery darts, which the archers of ſatan and his principalities and powers, ſhoot thick and faſt at the ſaints, to their great annoyance; ſo may be here called, eſpecially ſome very particular, eminent and ſore temptation, a thorn in the fleſh, very pungent, and giving a great deal of pain and uneaſineſs: others ſuppoſe that ſome particular emiſſary of ſatan, either ſome one of the falſe Apoſtles and teachers, who greatly oppoſed him, as Alexander the copper-ſmith, who did him much harm; or ſuch an one as Hymenæus or Philetus, that blaſphemed and ſpoke evil of him; or ſome violent perſecutor of him is intended. But after all, I ſee not but that the devil himſelf may be meant; for, as before obſerved, the phraſe a thorn in the fleſh, is metaphorical, and the other a meſſenger of ſatan, is literal, and explains it; and the whole may be read thus, there was given to me a thorn in the fleſh, namely, αγγελος σαταν, the angel ſatan to buffet me: ſo that ſatan, who was once an angel of light, now of darkneſs, is the thorn in the fleſh; and might be ſuffered to appear viſibly to him from time to time in a very terrible manner, and which was very grievous to be born; he might by permiſſion have great power over his body, as he had over Job's, to uſe it ill, to beat and buffet it; for this alſo may be taken literally: and he might likewiſe otherways greatly diſtreſs him by ſtirring up the corruptions of his heart; by following him with his ſatanical injections, ſuggeſtions, and temptations; by raiſing violent perſecutions, and inſtigating many of his emiſſaries againſt him; and this ſenſe is the rather to be choſen, becauſe it includes all others that have any ſhew of truth. The Jews[d] ſometimes make mention of the angel or meſſenger of ſatan, mocking at the righteous and buffeting them; ſo God is by them ſaid[e], to deliver Nebuchadnezzar למלאך השטן, to a meſſenger of ſatan. This ſore exerciſe befel the Apoſtle for his good, to keep down the pride of his nature; leſt, adds he again, I ſhould be exalted above meaſure; for ſuch ends and purpoſes does the Lord in his infinite wiſdom, deal with his people. The[f] Jews have a notion that this was one reaſon of God's tempting or trying Abraham with the ſacrifice of his ſon, to depreſs that pride that was likely to ariſe in him becauſe of his greatneſs. "This temptation, they ſay, was neceſſary at that time, becauſe above, the grandeur of Abraham is declared how great it was before his enemies made peace with him; and Abimelech king of the Philiſtines, and Phicol the chief captain of his hoſt, were obliged to enter into a covenant with him, and aſked him to ſhew favour to them, and to the land in which he ſojourned; and perhaps hereby גבה לבו, his heart was lifted up, in the ways of God; ורמו עיניו, and his eyes were lofty; when he ſaw himſelf bleſſed with riches, and with children, and with grandeur and glory, as the glory of kings; wherefore God was willing to try him; with a wall of iron, (this great difficulty) to ſee if there was any droſs left in him."

Ver. 8. For this thing I beſought the Lord thrice, &c.] With reſpect to the thorn in the fleſh, the meſſenger ſatan, who gave him ſo much continual diſturbance. This ſent him to the throne of grace, to requeſt of the Lord, that it, or rather he might depart from me; this requeſt greatly confirms the above ſenſe, for it can hardly be thought the Apoſtle would be ſo importunate about the removal of a common bodily affliction; and he knew that the corruption of his nature would remain with him as long as he was in the body; and as for afflictions, reproaches, and perſecutions for the Goſpel's ſake, he was well apprized they would abide him wherever he went; but that ſo troubleſome an adverſary might depart, as it muſt be greatly deſirable, ſo it was a very proper requeſt: and it is made to a very proper perſon, to the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; who in the days of his fleſh had ſuch power over the devils, as to diſpoſſeſs them from the bodies of men by a word ſpeaking, and held them in ſubjection, and in a pannic fear of him; and when upon the croſs, he ſpoiled principalities and powers, and in the latter day will bind ſatan with a chain, and ſhut him up in the bottomleſs pit for a thouſand years. This requeſt was made thrice, not with any view to the three perſons in the Godhead, Father, Son, and Spirit; nor to the three uſual times of prayer in a day, morning, noon, and night; nor is any exact number of times intended; but the ſenſe is, that he frequently beſought the Lord on this account.

Ver. 9. And he ſaid unto me, &c.] Either by what the Jews call בת קול, Bath Kol, a voice from heaven, an articulate, audible one; or by ſome extraordinary revelation of the Spirit of God; or by a divine impreſſion upon his mind; whereby he was aſſured of what follows, my grace is ſufficient for thee; the Lord always hears and anſwers his people ſooner or later, in one form or another, tho' not always in the way and manner they deſire; but yet in ſuch a way as is moſt for his glory and their good: the Apoſtle had not his requeſt granted, that ſatan might immediately depart from him, only he is aſſured of a ſufficiency of grace to ſupport him under the exerciſe, ſo long as it ſhould laſt. There ſeems to be an alluſion to the word שדי, Shaddai, an appellation of God, Gen. xvii. 1. and ſignifies, which is ſufficient; for God is all-ſufficient, and is a name that belongs to the Meſſiah. The angel whom God promiſed to the Iſraelites, to go before them in the wilderneſs, Exod. xxiii. 23. the Jews ſay[g] is Metatron (which is a corruption of the word mediator) whoſe name is as the name of his maſter. Metatron by Gematry is Shaddai, one that is ſufficient: however, certain it is, that the grace of Chriſt is alone ſufficient for all his people, to all ſaving purpoſes, in all their times of need. It is alone ſufficient, not to the excluſion of the grace of the Father or the Spirit; but in oppoſition and diſtinction to any thing elſe, that may be rightly or wrongly called grace; what men generally call common or ſufficient grace, which they ſay, is given to all men, is a mere Chimera; no grace is ſufficient but what is effectual, and that is only the grace of Chriſt; the light of nature is inſufficient to any ſaving purpoſe; the Goſpel which is called grace, and is the means of grace, is inſufficient of itſelf to ſalvation, without the powerful and efficacious grace of Chriſt going along with it; and ſo are gifts, whether ordinary or extraordinary: nothing ſhort of the grace of Chriſt is ſufficient grace; and this is ſufficient for all the elect of God, Jews and Gentiles, Old and New Teſtament ſaints, the family in heaven and in earth, the people of God that are already called, and are to be called, and for the worſt and vileſt of ſinners; and it is ſufficient to all ſaving purpoſes, to the acceptance of their perſons before God, to their juſtification in his ſight, to their pardon and cleanſing, to their regeneration and ſanctification, to the ſupply of all their wants, and to their perſeverance in grace unto glory; and it is ſufficient in all their times of need, in times of bodily affliction, of violent perſecution, ſoul-deſertion, ſatan's temptations, and at the hour of death, and in the day of judgment. The reaſon given to ſupport this anſwer, and to ſtrengthen the Apoſtle's faith in it is, for my ſtrength is made perfect in weakneſs; by the ſtrength of Chriſt is meant, not his ſtrength as the mighty God, but that communicative ſtrength which he has, and is in him as mediator, and which ſaints look to him for, and receive from him; this is made perfect in their weakneſs; not that their weakneſs can add perfection to his ſtrength, for his ſtrength is perfect in itſelf, not to ſay any thing of the contradiction ſuch a ſenſe carries in it; but the meaning is, that the ſtrength of Chriſt is made to appear, is illuſtrated and ſhines forth in its perfection and glory, in ſupplying, ſupporting, and ſtrengthening his people under all their weakneſs; and if they were not left to ſome weakneſſes in themſelves, his ſtrength would not be ſo manifeſt; ſee Jam. ii. 22. The anſwer to the Apoſtle's requeſt ſupported with this reaſon, was wonderfully ſatisfactory to him; wherefore he concludes, moſt gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities; in the weakneſſes which attended either his body or ſoul, thro' the buffetings of the angel ſatan, rather than in his viſions and revelations; or rather than inſiſt upon his departure from him, he is content things ſhould be as they were, ſince he had ſuch a promiſe of a ſufficiency of grace to bear him up, under and thro' whatever was the pleaſure of God concerning him; and ſince the ſtrength of Chriſt was made illuſtrious thro' his weakneſs, ſo that ſatan was not able to make any advantage over him, he is willing to remain in the ſame poſture and condition: that the power of Chriſt, ſays he, may reſt upon me, or tabernacle over me; he conſidered himſelf as a poor weak feeble creature, and the power of Chriſt as a tabernacle over him, as the power of God is repreſented as a garriſon about the believer, 1 Pet. i. 5. ſheltering, preſerving, and protecting him from the inſults of ſatan, in every form and ſhape; ſee Iſ. iv. 6. where Chriſt is ſaid to be a tabernacle, for a place of refuge, and for a covert.

Ver. 10. Therefore I take pleaſure in infirmities, &c.] Not in them ſimply conſidered, but as they were made uſe of to his advantage, for the exerciſe of his grace, and for his more abundant conſolation; and eſpecially as they tended to the glory of Chriſt, and made his grace, power, and ſtrength the more conſpicuous: by infirmities are meant all outward troubles, every thing that is mean and abject, diſtreſſing and afflicting, whether from ſatan or the world; it ſeems to be a general term, which includes and is explained by the following particulars: in reproaches; of ſatan, the accuſer of the brethren, who ſometimes reproachfully inſinuates that they are hypocrites, and ſerve God and Chriſt with mercenary views and ſelfiſh ends; and of the men of the world, who traduce them as deceivers, treat them with opprobrious language, and load them with revilings and contumelies, endeavour to take away their characters, credit, and reputation; the faithful ſervants of Chriſt muſt go thro' bad report, and ſuffer ſhame for the name of Chriſt; but theſe reproaches with Moſes are eſteemed by them, greater riches than the treaſures of Egypt: in neceſſities; not of the ſoul, the better part, there being a ſufficiency of grace in Chriſt to relieve all its wants; but of the body, the Apoſtle was ſometimes reduced to very neceſſitous circumſtances, wanting the common neceſſaries of life, being hungry, thirſty and naked, and yet chearful: in perſecutions; from place to place by the enemies of the Goſpel, by whom he was ſeverely handled by beating, ſcourging, and impriſonment; but his ſtripes were the marks of the Lord Jeſus; his chains were his crown, and his priſon a palace to him: in diſtreſſes, or ſtraits; both as to body and mind, encompaſſed with ſuch difficulties that he knew not what way to take, or courſe to ſteer: and all for Chriſt's ſake; not for any real crime done by him, but for a profeſſion of Chriſt, for preaching his Goſpel, and for the glory of his name; and which made all theſe afflictions ſo delightful to him, having in the midſt of them the love of God to comfort him, the power and ſtrength of Chriſt to ſupport him, and the grace of the Spirit to aſſiſt him, and the preſence of all the three perſons with him; this he ſuggeſts to be the ground and reaſon of his delight and pleaſure, in ſuch otherwiſe diſagreeable circumſtances: for when I am weak, then am I ſtrong; when he was attended with all the abovementioned infirmities, when laden with reproaches, ſurrounded with neceſſities, followed with perſecutions, and brought into the utmoſt ſtraits and difficulties, and was moſt ſenſible of his weakneſs in himſelf to bear and go thro' all theſe things; then was he upheld by the divine arm, and ſtrengthened by the power of Chriſt; ſo that he was not only able to ſuſtain the conflict, but became more than a conqueror, and even to triumph in the midſt of theſe adverſities; he could and did readily take the advice in Joel iii. 10. and expreſs himſelf in the ſame language there directed to, and to which he ſeems to refer, let the weak ſay I am ſtrong; for he that is weak in himſelf, and ſees himſelf to be ſo, is ſtrong in Chriſt, and has a comfortable experience of renewed ſtrength from him, as his day is. The Jews have a ſaying[h] ſomewhat like this, "the righteous even כשהן חלשים מתחזקים, "when they are weak ſtrengthen themſelves; as it is "ſaid, Gen. xlviii. 2. and the wicked, tho' in their "ſtrength, fall, according to Eſther vii. 8."

Ver. 11. I am become a fool in glorying, &c.] This is either to be underſtood conditionally, if he had acted as a fool in commending himſelf, or was to be reckoned and called ſo by others, for glorying of himſelf, his viſions and revelations; or as an ironical conceſſion, allowing himſelf to be a fool for ſo doing, as he knew he ſhould be traduced by his enemies; which conceſſion he makes with a view to remove the blame from himſelf, and caſt it upon the Corinthians: ye have compelled me; they were not only the occaſion of his glorying, but they had forced him to it by their conduct; for he was obliged either to take this method for the vindication of his character, and preſerve his future uſefulneſs, or elſe to ſuffer the falſe Apoſtles to triumph over him, to the great detriment of the Goſpel, and of this church at Corinth particularly; whereas both might have been prevented, had they acted the part that became them: for I ought to have been commended of you; when the falſe Apoſtles reproached him, and inſinuated things among them to his diſadvantage, they ought not only to have turned a deaf ear to them, and to have checked and reproved them, and ſo have put a ſtop to their calumnies; but they ſhould have ſpoke in commendation of him, and have declared how faithfully he had preached the Goſpel to them; how uſeful he had been to their ſouls, for conviction, converſion, edification, and comfort; how laborious and indefatigable he had been in his miniſtry; what ſucceſs attended him, and what wonderful things were done by him in proof of his divine miſſion; all which they were conſcious of, and could with the utmoſt ſafety have affirmed of him: for in nothing, ſays he, am I behind the very chiefeſt Apoſtles; meaning either the falſe Apoſtles, who ſet themſelves upon an equality with the true ones, and above him; or rather the real Apoſtles of Chriſt, and thoſe that were of the greateſt note among them, as Peter, James, and John; for tho' he was behind them in time, yet not in gifts, labour, and uſefulneſs: but leſt this ſhould be thought to ſavour of vain boaſting, he adds, tho' I be nothing; which may be conſidered either as a declaration of his own thoughts of himſelf, and an humble acknowledgment of his own nothingneſs; that he was nothing as a man, as an Hebrew, a Phariſee, with reſpect to his external priviledges and righteouſneſs, not more and better than others; and nothing as an Apoſtle and a chriſtian of himſelf, but was wholly and entirely what he was by the grace of God; or as the judgment and opinion of the falſe Apoſtles concerning him, who ſpoke of him, and treated him as a worthleſs man, of no account, and not to be regarded.

Ver. 12. Truly the ſigns of an Apoſtle were wrought among you, &c.] Not only the doctrine which he preached, the power that attended it, and the ſucceſs it met with among them, were clear ſigns and evident proofs of his being ſent by Chriſt; not only they themſelves who were converted under his miniſtry, were teſtimonials and ſeals of his apoſtleſhip, but alſo the many other wonderful works done by him confirmed the ſame, and ſhewed him to be an Apoſtle, and that he was not a whit behind, but equal to the chiefeſt of them: nor does he refer them to ſigns that were wrought by him, among others, and in other places, which were many; but to thoſe which they themſelves were witneſſes of, and therefore might and ought to have ſpoken of them in defence of him; and in order to ſtop the mouths of the falſe Apoſtles, a particular enumeration of theſe ſigns follows: in all patience; tis one ſign, and what is here mentioned in the firſt place of an Apoſtle and miniſter of Chriſt, that he patiently bears all injuries and indignities, reproaches, perſecutions, and all manner of afflictions for Chriſt's ſake and the Goſpel's; and this the Apoſtle did; and had he not been ſent by Chriſt, it is not reaſonable to imagine that he would have expoſed himſelf to ſo many evils and dangers; or would have bore with ſo much patience the ill uſage of men, and particularly the unkindneſs and ingratitude he met with at Corinth; but he took all patiently, having their good and the glory of Chriſt at heart: in ſigns and wonders, and mighty deeds; meaning preternatural and miraculous performances; ſuch as raiſing the dead, healing the ſick, cleanſing lepers, caſting out devils, ſpeaking with divers tongues, and the like, which were confirming evidences of apoſtleſhip; ſo נסין וגבורין, wonders and powers, or mighty deeds, are mentioned together by the Jews[r], as the ſame things.

Ver. 13. For what is it wherein ye were inferior to other churches, &c.] The Apoſtle here ſuggeſts and appeals to themſelves for the truth of it, that in nothing they came ſhort of other churches; that as he was not behind the very chiefeſt of the Apoſtles, and ſo they had no reaſon to be aſhamed of him and deſpiſe him; neither were they inferior in gifts, grace and knowledge, to other churches, all which were thro' his miniſtry; wherefore they ought to have ſpoken well of him, and not to have taken the part of the falſe Apoſtles againſt him; ſince all the honour and credit they were in as a church, were owing to him as an inſtrument. The Goſpel was firſt preached to them by an Apoſtle; they were converted under the miniſtry of an Apoſtle; they were planted and ſettled as a church by the means of an Apoſtle; and in which reſpects no church could go beyond them, or boaſt of more; they had the ſame Goſpel preached to them, and with as much power and purity as other churches; they had received the ſame ſpirit, the ſame graces, and the ſame gifts of the Spirit, both ordinary and extraordinary; ſo that they came behind others in no gift whatever; ſee 1 Cor. i. 7. and had the ſame miraculous works done among them, as were in other places, for the confirmation of the Goſpel. There was but one thing the Apoſtle could think of, in which they differed from others, and which he mentions; except it be that I myſelf was not burdenſome to you? becauſe he freely preached the Goſpel to them, took no wages of them, but choſe rather to work with his own hands and ſupply his neceſſities, than to be troubleſome to them; in this indeed, they differed from other churches, who liberally contributed to their miniſters, and honourably maintained them: forgive me this wrong; not that the Apoſtle ſeriouſly deſired this, or thought that he had done them any real injury, and ſo acknowledges it; for if any wrong was done hereby, it was to himſelf, and not them; but it is an ironical way of ſpeaking, and was a ſharp rebuke to them, for their ignorance, ingratitude and negligence.

Ver. 14. Behold the third time I am ready to come to you, &c.] Not that he had been twice at Corinth, and was now about to come a third time; for as yet he had been but once there, when he firſt preached to them, was the means of their converſion, and ſettled them in a church-ſtate; he had promiſed them to come a ſecond time, but as yet was prevented; ſee 1 Cor. xvi. 5. 2 Cor. i. 15. and now a third time he had purpoſed it in his mind, and had prepared for it, and was juſt ready to come unto them; when he aſſures them he had not altered his mind, nor ſhould he change his conduct, but ſteer the ſame courſe he had: and I will not be burdenſome to you; he ſignifies he would preach the Goſpel freely to them, and take nothing of them; and this he ſays leſt they ſhould think with themſelves, that tho' he took no ſtipend of them before, yet when he came again he would: for I ſeek not yours; their money and ſubſtance, as did the falſe Apoſtles: but you; them themſelves, their ſpiritual good and welfare, the comfort, edification, inſtruction and ſalvation of their immortal ſouls; like a good and faithful ſhepherd, who ſought not the fleece, but the good of the flock; or rather like a loving tender father, that was affectionately concerned for the good of his children: for the children ought not to lay up for the parents, but the parents for the children; not but that children ought to take care of, and provide for their aged and indigent parents, and churches ought to maintain their faithful miniſters; but the Apoſtle argues from a common fact which nature and affection direct unto, and have formed into a ſort of a law, that parents not only care for their children, bring them up, and provide for them food and raiment; but as they are bleſſed by providence, lay up treaſures for them for time to come, and not children for their parents; this is neither uſual nor neceſſary, for however, as the caſe may be, children may be obliged to maintain their parents when grown old and in want, yet not to lay up ſubſtance for them for futurity; and by it the Apoſtle ſuggeſts, that he was a ſpiritual father to theſe Corinthians, and they were his children; for whoſe ſpiritual welfare he had the higheſt concern, and whatever he did was out of no diſreſpect to them, but from the ſtrongeſt affection for them.

Ver. 15. And I will gladly ſpend, &c.] Meaning all his time, talents, and ſtrength, which God had beſtowed upon him for their ſpiritual profit and advantage; yea, all that ſmall pittance of worldly goods that he enjoyed: he not only determined to take nothing from them, but was willing to communicate his little ſubſtance to them, or ſpend it in their ſervice; and not only ſo, but be ſpent for them; them: and be ſpent for you, or for your ſouls; for the good of them; his ſenſe is, either that he was willing to have his whole ſubſtance expended, if it would be of any uſe to them; or his whole ſtrength exhauſted, in laborious preaching to them; or even his life to be laid down for them, was it neceſſary; which ſenſe is favoured by the Syriac and Arabic verſions; all which expreſſed his tender affection as a ſpiritual father for them: adding, though the more abundantly I love you, the leſs I be loved; though he loved them more than he did other churches, or than the falſe Apoſtles loved them, and yet were loved by them leſs than he was by other churches; or by them, than the falſe Apoſtles were; or rather the meaning is, that though he increaſed in his love, and in the expreſſions of it to them, and they grew colder and more indifferent to him, yet this ſhould not hinder his warmeſt deſires and moſt earneſt endeavours after their ſpiritual and eternal welfare. This way of ſpeaking ſtrongly expreſſes his love to them, and tacitly implies the lukewarmneſs of theirs to him; and yet that it ſhould be no diſcouragement to him, to proceed in doing them all the ſervice he was capable of.

Ver. 16. But be it ſo I did not burthen you, &c.] Theſe words are not ſpoken by the Apoſtle in his own perſon of himſelf, but in the perſon of his adverſaries, and contain a conceſſion and an objection of theirs, but be it ſo; they granted that he had not burdened the Corinthians, that he had took nothing of them himſelf for preaching the Goſpel; they owned that he had preached it freely; this was ſo clear a point, and ſo flagrant a caſe, that they could not deny it; yet they inſinuated to the Corinthians, and objected to the Apoſtle, that though he did not receive any thing from them with his own hands, yet he craftily and cunningly made uſe of others to drain their purſes, and receive it for him; and which is ſuggeſted in the next clauſe: nevertheleſs being crafty, I caught you with guile; ſo ſay the falſe Apoſtles of me; for theſe are not the words of the Apoſtle in his own perſon; nor to be underſtood of any ſpiritual craft, or lawful cunning and prudent artifices uſed by him, to allure and draw the Corinthians into a good liking and opinion of the Goſpel and of his miniſtry, and ſo caught them, and was the happy means of their converſion; but they are ſpoken in the perſon of the falſe Apoſtles, charging him with a wicked and criminal craftineſs, by making uſe of other perſons in a ſly, underhand way, to get this church's money, when he pretended to preach the Goſpel freely; to which he anſwers in the next verſe.

Ver. 17. Did I make a gain of you, &c.] He appeals to the Corinthians againſt ſuch calumnies, and falſe inſinuations, whether ever he had circumvented them in ſuch a manner, or had ever uſed ſuch artful methods to pillage them; or whether ever he had diſcovered any covetous diſpoſition towards any thing of theirs; or had employed any perſons to draw out their ſubſtance from them, and get it for himſelf: he owns he had ſent ſome perſons to them on different errands, and aſks if he had dealt fraudulently with them, by any of them whom, ſays he, I have ſent to you; he deſires them to name one ſingle perſon of the many who came to them from him, that had received any money from them for him; or that they had any reaſon to believe he had employed for ſuch purpoſes; and if they could not pitch on a ſingle inſtance, they ought therefore to look upon this as a downright ſlander and calumny.

Ver. 18. I deſired Titus, and with him I ſent a brother, &c.] The Apoſtle proceeds to mention one or two perſons that he had ſent unto them, and deſires to know whether they could charge them with any ſuch practices. He had deſired, exhorted, and encouraged Titus to go unto them, and collect money from them; but not for either of themſelves, but for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem; and he ſent another brother along with him, who is by ſome ſuppoſed to be Luke, to be a companion of him, and an aſſiſtant to him; and who was a witneſs of what he did, and for what purpoſe he was ſent, and how he behaved: did Titus make a gain of you? did he greedily deſire your ſubſtance? did he ſhew an avaricious temper, or a covetous inclination after your money? did he by any methods extort it from you? ſay if Titus, or the brother with him, received any thing from you, either on their own, or my account? walked we not in the ſame ſpirit? in the ſame ſpirit of God, being directed and influenced by him; or in the ſame diſpoſition of mind, being agreed and determined to preach the Goſpel freely, and receive nothing for it: walked we not in the ſame ſteps? took the ſame methods, lived the ſame courſe of life, working with their own hands to ſupply their wants, rather than be burdenſome to others: the Apoſtle ſuggeſts, that where are the ſame ſpirit, temper, diſpoſition, and principles, there will be the ſame works and actions; and as for covetouſneſs, it is neither agreeable to the Spirit of God, nor to the ſpirit of a chriſtian.

Ver. 19. Again, think you that we excuſe ourſelves to you? &c.] The Apoſtle would not have the Corinthians imagine, that by what he had ſaid once and again in this epiſtle, he meant to excuſe himſelf from coming to them, for he really and ſincerely intended it; or that by this long defence of himſelf againſt the falſe Apoſtles, he deſigned ſo much an apology for himſelf, or that he uſed any feigned words, or artful methods, to exculpate himſelf from any charge againſt him, particularly that of covetouſneſs juſt mentioned; for he had no view to cover himſelf by ſtudied apologies, and ſet orations, and evade any thing exhibited againſt him, and make himſelf look innocent when guilty; it was not with any ſuch intention he had dwelt ſo long on this ſubject: we ſpeak before God in Chriſt; in all ſincerity and uprightneſs of ſoul, without colour, guile, or deceit, calling God and Chriſt to witneſs the truth of what was ſaid; the Apoſtle ſpoke all he did, as in the preſence of the omniſcient God; and as one in Chriſt, and a preacher of his Goſpel, that would not deliver an untruth knowingly, for the whole world: but we do all things dearly beloved for your edification; it was not for himſelf ſo much, for his own credit, reputation and glory, he did what he did; had this been the caſe, he would not have ſaid the half part of what he had; but it was for their ſake, out of love to them, that they might be built up and eſtabliſhed in the faith of the Goſpel, and not be carried away with the error of the wicked.

Ver. 20. For I fear leſt when I come, &c.] This fear aroſe from his fatherly affection for them, and care of them: I ſhall not find you ſuch as I would; truly penitent for former ſins, thoroughly reformed in life and manners, zealous for God, Chriſt, and the Goſpel, and hearty lovers of one another: and that I ſhall be found unto you ſuch as ye would not; ſharp in his reproofs and admonitions, ſevere in his corrections and cenſures, and awfully uſing the authority he had from Chriſt, to puniſh incorrigible offenders: leſt there be debates; or ſtrifes, or contentions among them, about words to no profit, or about their miniſters, as before; one being for Paul, and another for Apollos, and another for Cephas: envyings; at each others gifts, or jealouſies of one another, and evil ſurmizings: wraths; breaking out into words and actions, which diſcover hatred of mind, a malignant ſpirit, quite contrary to that of the Goſpel: ſtrifes; law-ſuits before Heathen magiſtrates; contentions in the church who ſhall be greateſt; or about leſſer matters of religion, or things indifferent, vain and trifling, and kept up merely for the ſake of victory: backbitings; ſpeaking evil of one another, detracting from, hurting, or taking away each others character and good name: whiſperings; ſecretly ſowing diſcords among friends, and privately ſuggeſting evil things of each other: ſwellings; with pride and conceit of themſelves, becauſe of their riches, learning, and eloquence, and looking with diſdain upon others: tumults; at church meetings, interrupting one another, going into parties, and making rents and ſchiſms.

Ver. 21. And leſt when I come again, &c.] Another thing which he feared would be the caſe when he came again to them, that he himſelf ſhould be afflicted and diſtreſſed, ſeeing them in a diſorderly and diſſolute courſe of life, be obliged to puniſh them, which would be an humiliation and matter of grief to him: my God will humble me; inſtead of rejoicing in the fruit of his labours, that they were not in vain, he ſignifies, that he ſhould have great ſorrow of heart; and whereas he had promiſed himſelf much pleaſure and comfort in viſiting them, it would be the reverſe; and inaſmuch as he had boaſted of them to others, he ſhould be aſhamed: and that I ſhall bewail many which have ſinned already, or before; not before converſion, but before the writing of this or the former epiſtle; for nothing was more grieving, and occaſioned ſorrow and humiliation to the Apoſtle, as the unbecoming walk of profeſſors; and nothing more ſenſibly affects a faithful miniſter of the Goſpel: and have not repented of the uncleanneſs and fornication, and laſciviouſneſs, which they have committed. The city of Corinth was famous, or rather infamous, for unclean practices; as fornication, adultery, laſciviouſneſs in words and deeds, and other unnatural luſts; Corinthian whores, was a common proverb; nor was it proper for perſons to go to Corinth, there were ſo many ſnares for luſt and uncleanneſs; there were ſaid to be above a thouſand proſtitutes in the temple of Venus there[k]; hence the very great impurities and wickedneſs, which many of the members of this church were guilty of, may be accounted for; ſome of them had repented, others not, which was the great concern of the Apoſtle: and from hence we may learn, that gracious ſouls may be ſuffered to fall into great ſins; and that when they are truly brought to repentance, they ought to be reſtored to communion with the church; but impenitent ones to be cut off, and remain ſo, till brought to a due ſenſe of their evils.

CHAP. XIII.

IN this chapter, the Apoſtle continues his reſolution to come to the Corinthians, and to threaten with ſeverity the incorrigible among them, giving the reaſons of it; prays to God that they might ſo behave, that there might be no occaſion for the exerciſe of it; and concludes the epiſtle with very uſeful exhortations, and hearty wiſhes of good things to them. He intimates to them again, that he intended this third time to come unto them, when he would not ſpare them, as they might expect he would not; partly becauſe they had ſuch repeated warnings, reproofs, and admonitions from him, ver. 1. and partly becauſe many of them had ſinned before, and were ſtubborn and obſtinate, and had not repented, ver. 2. as alſo becauſe they had tempted him, and demanded a proof of his power and authority, and of Chriſt ſpeaking in him, ver. 3. and whereas this ſprung from the outward appearance of the Apoſtle, whoſe bodily preſence was weak, he obſerves to them, the inſtance of Chriſt himſelf in human nature, who was crucified thro' weakneſs, and yet lives by the power of God; and ſo he and his fellow miniſters were weak like Chriſt, and for his ſake, and yet lived, and ſhould live by the power of God; ſo that their outward appearance, was no proof of their want of the power of Chriſt in them, ver. 4. beſides, he directs them to themſelves for a proof of it; who upon examination would find, that they were in the faith, and Chriſt was in them; which was owing to the miniſtry of the Apoſtle, as a means and inſtrument; and ſo they had a proof in themſelves, of Chriſt's ſpeaking in the Apoſtle, and being mighty in, and towards them, or elſe they muſt be reprobate, injudicious, and diſapproved perſons, ver. 5. but whether they were ſuch perſons or no, he was confident that he would not be found ſuch, but would appear to be in the faith, to have Chriſt in him, and to have power and authority from him, ver. 6. however, the Apoſtle's hearty prayer for them was, that they might be kept from evil; and that they might do that which is good, and ſo be approved of God and men; and there be no occaſion to uſe any ſeverity with them, when he ſhould come among them, ver. 7. otherwiſe he could do nothing againſt the truth, could not connive at error and ſin, but muſt uſe the power and authority he had to cruſh every thing of that kind, and defend truth, ver. 8. and ſo far was he from glorying in his power, and priding himſelf with it, that it was a pleaſure to him to have no occaſion to make uſe of it, by which it might ſeem as if he was without it; and it rejoiced him, when they ſtood faſt in the faith, and walked as became the Goſpel, and ſo needed not the rod of reproof and correction; nay, he could even wiſh, that they were wholly perfect, and free from all blame, and every kind of charge, ver. 9. and the end he had in the writing in the manner he did, being abſent from them was, leſt when he ſhould come among them, he ſhould be obliged to make uſe of his power he had from Chriſt for edification, and not deſtruction; to prevent which, he wrote and admoniſhed them, in order to bring them to repentance, that ſo he might have no occaſion to uſe ſeverity and ſharpneſs, ver. 10. and then he takes his farewel of them, by giving ing them ſome exhortations to harmony, unity, peace, and love among themſelves, ver. 11, 12. gives the ſalutations of all the ſaints unto them, ver. 13. and then his own, with which he concludes the epiſtle, which is a wiſh of all the bleſſings of grace from all the three perſons, Father, Son, and Spirit, ver. 14.

Ver. 1. This is the third time I am coming to you, &c.] Or am ready to come to you, as the Alexandrian copy reads, as in ch. xii. 14. Though he had been as yet but once at Corinth, and is to be reckoned and accounted for, either after this manner; he had been once with them when he firſt preached the Goſpel to them, and was the means of their converſion, and laid the foundation of their church ſtate, of which there is ſome account in Acts xviii. he came to them a ſecond time, by writing his firſt epiſtle, when he deſired to be conſidered by them, as though he was preſent with them, ch. v. 3. and now a third time by this ſecond epiſtle, in which he alſo ſpeaks as if he was among them, ſee the following verſe; or elſe in this way, he had been actually in perſon with them one time, and had been about to come in purpoſe and preparation a ſecond time, but was prevented, and now was juſt ready a third time, to ſet forward in his journey to them; ſee ch. xii. 14. and ſo the Syriac verſion reads it here, this is the third time that I am ready to come to you, and which our verſion alſo favours. The Alexandrian copy and ſome others, the Complutenſian edition, the Vulgate Latin and Ethiopic verſions read, behold this third time, &c. in order to raiſe and fix their attention to what he was ſaying, or about to ſay: in the mouth of two or three witneſſes ſhall every word be eſtabliſhed; referring to Deut. xix. 15. which he applies much in the ſame manner Chriſt does in Matt. xviii. 16. and which it is probable he had in view; ſignifying hereby, that he proceeded in a judicial way, according to due form of law, and in ſuch a manner, as Chriſt had directed; and that they were to look upon his ſeveral comings in the ſenſe now explained, to be as ſo many witneſſes, whereby the ſeveral charges exhibited againſt them were fully atteſted and confirmed, ſo that things were now ripe for judgment, and for a final ſentence to paſs upon them.

Ver. 2. I told you before, and foretel you as if I were preſent a ſecond time, &c.] He means, that he had in his former epiſtle faithfully told them of their evils, and admoniſhed them for them; and now he ſends to them a ſecond time before his coming, and again admoniſhes them, as if he was upon the ſpot with them; ſo that they had as before, three witneſſes, alſo a firſt and ſecond admonition; which ſhould they be without ſucceſs, he muſt proceed farther: and being abſent now, I write to them which heretofore have ſinned; before he wrote his firſt epiſtle, of which he had information, and had faithfully reproved and admoniſhed them; ſee ch. xii. 21. And to all other; that might ſince be drawn into a compliance with ſinful practices, through their example; or as the Arabic verſion renders it, to the reſt of the congregation; who would be witneſſes for him, and againſt them, that he had admoniſhed them a firſt, and a ſecond time: and by his preſent writing declares, that if I come again; for not knowing what might fall out to prevent him, though he was bent upon coming, and ready for it, nor what was the will of God about it, he does not chuſe to be poſitive in the matter; and therefore writes conditionally, and with a guard, and no doubt with a ſubmiſſion to the divine will: I will not ſpare; this was the reaſon why as yet he had not been at Corinth, becauſe he was willing to ſpare them; ſee ch. i. 23. being loth to come to ſeverities, if gentler methods would take effect; but now having uſed all proper means, he is at a point, and determined not to ſpare, but to uſe his Apoſtolical rod, or that power which the Lord had given him in an extraordinary way, as an extraordinary officer, to puniſh incorrigible offenders, in ſuch manner as the inceſtuous perſon, and Hymenæus and Philetus had been uſed by him.

Ver. 3. Since ye ſeek a proof of Chriſt ſpeaking in me, &c.] This is the reaſon why he was determined, that ſhould he come among them, he would not ſpare them, becauſe they called in queſtion his Apoſtleſhip, and demanded a proof of it; which of all men, they had the leaſt reaſon to do; for they themſelves were the ſeals of his Apoſtleſhip, and the ſigns of an Apoſtle had been done among them; they queried whether he was an ambaſſador of Chriſt, and was ſent by him, and in his name; whether the meſſage he came with was from him, and whether the Goſpel he preached was his voice; and particularly whether he had ſuch a power to puniſh delinquents, he threatened them with the exerciſe of; a ſtrange infatuation of the falſe Apoſtles this, ſince Chriſt who ſent him, was with him, and ſpoke in him, and by him: which to you-ward, ſays he, is not weak, but is mighty in you; the Goſpel of Chriſt, at the firſt preaching of it to them by him, was the power of God unto ſalvation to them; and was attended with divers ſigns and wonders, and gifts of the Holy Ghoſt; and beſides, they had inſtances of the power of Chriſt towards them in an awful way, in puniſhing ſinners; as in the delivery of the inceſtuous perſon to ſatan, which was done by his Spirit being with them when aſſembled; and by ſmiting many of them with ſickneſs, diſeaſes, and infirmities, and with death itſelf, who had ſinned, 1 Cor. v. 4, 5. and xi. 30. Wherefore, ſeeing after all theſe inſtances of the voice and power of Chriſt in him, they yet queſtioned his Apoſtolical authority, and ſought proof of it; and eſpecially ſince this was not ſo much a tempting of him, as a tempting of Chriſt in him, he was reſolved not to ſpare them.

Ver. 4. For though he was crucified through weakneſs, &c.] Of the human nature; for the nature which Chriſt aſſumed, was in all things like to ours, excepting ſin; it was ſubject to all ſinleſs infirmities; it was mortal, paſſible, liable to ſufferings, and death, and ſo he came to be crucified; though not againſt his will, or without his previous aſſent; as God, he was able to have prevented his crucifixion if he would; he gave an inſtance of his power over men, at the time of his apprehenſion, by ſtriking them down to the ground; and told Pilate his judge at his trial, that he could have no power to crucify him, if it was not given him from above; and he ſhewed his ſuperiority over devils when upon the croſs, by ſpoiling principalities and powers; ſo that his crucifixion was not owing to want of power as God, but he became capable of it thro' his weakneſs as man: but yet he lives by the power of God; he was raiſed from the dead by a divine power; by his own power as God, as well as by his Father's, and ſo was declared to be the Son of God with power; and he lives at the right-hand of God as man and mediator, veſted with all power in heaven and in earth; though in the days of his fleſh, he appeared ſo weak, mean, and deſpicable: now the Apoſtle mentions this caſe of our Lord's, to deter the Corinthians from deſpiſing him, on account of his outward weakneſs and meanneſs; and from hence buoying themſelves up, and in which they were encouraged by the falſe Apoſtles, that he had not, and could not exerciſe the power he talked of; they had obſerved, what a mean figure he made when he was among them; and whatever weight there might be in his letters, yet his bodily preſence was weak, and his ſpeech contemptible; wherefore he ſets before them the inſtance of Chriſt, who though he appeared very weak in his ſtate of humiliation, yet he now lives in power, to aſſiſt and ſtrengthen his miniſters, in every branch of their work; and ſuggeſts, that as it was with Chriſt, it was, and would be in ſome meaſure with him, and his fellow-miniſters: for we alſo are weak in him; like him, and for his ſake, they were ſubject to infirmities, reproaches, perſecutions, and diſtreſſes; carried about daily the dying of the Lord Jeſus; bore a very great reſemblance to him in his ſtate of humiliation; were very much as he was in this world, and bore much for his name ſake; the Alexandrian copy and the Syriac verſion read, with him; being crucified with him, and dead with him: but we ſhall live with him by the power of God towards you; which is not to be underſtood of being raiſed by Chriſt to an immortal life, and of living with him in glory; though this is a certain truth, that ſuch who ſuffer with Chriſt, ſhall live and reign, and be glorified together with him; but of the life, power, and efficacy of the miniſters of Chriſt, and of Chriſt in and with them, diſplayed in the lively miniſtration of the word and ordinances, in the vigorous diſcharge of all the branches of their office; not only in preaching, but in rebuking, admoniſhing, laying on of cenſures, and puniſhing criminals; and eſpecially regards the powerful exertion and uſe of the Apoſtolic rod; for this life is not only with Chriſt, or through Chriſt being in them, notwithſtanding all their outward weakneſs, and by the power of God, which ſupports them under all, and enables them to perform their work, but is towards you, the Corinthians, to be exerciſed towards them, to be ſeen among them, and felt by them.

Ver. 5. Examine yourſelves whether ye be in the faith, &c.] Theſe words are to be conſidered in connexion with ver. 3. for ſeeing they ſought and demanded a proof of the voice and power of Chriſt in the Apoſtle, he directs them to ſelf-examination, to look within themſelves, to try, prove, and recognize their own ſouls; where if things were right, they would find a proof of Chriſt's ſpeaking in him, to them: he adviſes them to examine the ſtate of their own ſouls, and ſee whether they were in the faith; either in the doctrine of faith, having a ſpiritual and experimental knowledge of it, true love and affection for it, an hearty belief of it, having felt the power of it upon their ſouls, and abode in it; whether as the Syriac verſion reads it, בהימנותא קימין, ye ſtand in the faith, firm and ſtable; or in the grace of faith, either of miracles, or that which is connected with ſalvation; and which if they were in it, and had it, is attended with good works; operates by love to Chriſt and to his people; by which ſouls go out of themſelves to Chriſt, live upon him, receive from him, and give him all the glory of ſalvation: and if this was their caſe, he deſires to know how they came by their faith; and ſuggeſts, that their light in the doctrine of the Goſpel, and their faith in Chriſt Jeſus, as well as the miraculous gifts many of them were poſſeſſed of, were through his miniſtry as the means; and this was a full proof of Chriſt's ſpeaking in him: prove your own ſelves, know ye not your own ſelves, how that Jeſus Chriſt is in you; by which he means, that if they took a ſurvey of things in their own ſouls, it would appear that Chriſt was in them; not as he is in all the world, filling heaven and earth with his preſence; or as he is in every rational creature, as the creator and author of the light of nature; but in a ſpecial and ſpiritual manner, by his Spirit and grace; the Father reveals him in his people, as the foundation of their hope of glory; he himſelf enters and takes poſſeſſion of their hearts in converſion, communicates his grace, and manifeſts himſelf, and is formed there by his Spirit; his graces are implanted, his image is inſtamped, his Spirit is put within them, and he himſelf dwells by faith: and this upon enquiry would be found to be the caſe of the Corinthians, except, ſays the Apoſtle, ye are reprobates; meaning not that they were ſo, as ſuch may ſtand oppoſed to the elect of God; for perſons may as yet neither be in the faith, nor Chriſt in them, and yet both be hereafter, and ſo not be left of God, or conſigned to deſtruction; but that if they were not in the doctrine of faith, then they were reprobate concerning it, or void of judgment in it; and if they had not the grace of faith, and Chriſt was not in them, then they were not genuine, but nominal profeſſors, like reprobate ſilver, counterfeit coin; which when detected, would be diſapproved, not only by God, but man, as this word alſo ſignifies, and ſo ſtands oppoſed to them that are approved, ver. 7. or if they did not make ſuch an examination, probation, and recognition of themſelves, they would be without probation; or as the Arabic verſion, without experiment. The Apoſtle hereby brings them into this dilemma, either that if upon examination they were found to be in the faith, and Chriſt in them, which bleſſings they enjoyed thro' his miniſtry, then they did not want a proof of Chriſt ſpeaking in him; but if theſe things did not appear in them, then they were perſons of no judgment in ſpiritual things, were not real chriſtians, but inſignificant and uſeleſs perſons.

Ver. 6. But I truſt that ye ſhall know, &c.] Whether they were reprobrates or no, the Apoſtle would not pretend to ſay; that he left to themſelves, and of which they were capable of making judgment for themſelves: however, he hoped and believed, that he and his fellow Apoſtles would give ſuch proof of themſelves, as that they ſhould know certainly that we, ſays he, are not reprobates; men void of judgment in the doctrines of the Goſpel, but have light, knowledge, and underſtanding in them; or uſeleſs and unprofitable in the miniſtry, but were the ſavour of life unto life to many; were miniſters by whom others believed; were ſucceſsful labourers in the Lord's vineyard, and builders in his houſe; and were made very uſeful for the converſion, comfort, and edification of many ſouls: or that they were not men diſapproved either by God, or his people; ſince as they faithfully ſerved Chriſt in the miniſtration of the Goſpel, they were acceptable to God, and approved of men: or were not men without a proof of Chriſt ſpeaking in them; they might aſſure themſelves they would have too ſoon, for ſome of them, an evidence of that power and authority which Chriſt had lodged in them, to puniſh ſuch as repented not of their evils.

Ver. 7. Now I pray to God, &c.] A ſtrong mark of the Apoſtle's affection for them. For though they uſed him ſo ill, he took every way and method to do them good; he not only wrote to them, ſent the brethren to them, but put up his ſupplications at the throne of grace for them. The Alexandrian copy, the Vulgate Latin, and Ethiopic verſions, read, we pray, &c. And one of his petitions for them was, that ye do no evil; which, tho' impracticable and impoſſible, conſidering the ſituation of the people of God in this world, yet is deſirable by every good man, both for himſelf and others; and was deſired by the Apoſtle, partly that their conſciences might not be wounded, their ſouls grieved, their peace broke in upon, and their comforts loſt; and partly that the name of God, and his cauſe and truths, might not be blaſphemed; and chiefly, that he might have no opportunity of exerciſing his apoſtolical rod for their correction: not that we ſhould appear approved. This was a clear caſe that he ſought their good, and not his own credit, and the exerciſe of power; if they committed evil, his faithfulneſs would be ſeen in reproving, rebuking, and exhorting them; and if they continued impenitent, his apoſtolical authority would be manifeſt in their puniſhment, ſo that he would appear approved, or with a proof of the power of Chriſt in him; but this he did not deſire, but moſt earneſtly wiſhed there might be no occaſion for any ſuch evidence: but that they ſhould do that which is honeſt; or good, both in the ſight of God and men, that which is according to the will of God, ſprings from love, is done in faith, and with a view to the glory of God; and the Apoſtle's praying, both that they might be kept from evil, and do that which is good, ſhews the impotence of man's free-will, the neceſſity of the grace of God to abſtain from ſin, and perform good works; and this the Apoſtle earneſtly deſired, though, ſays he, we be as reprobates; weak and infirm perſons, uncapable of giving any proof of the power of Chriſt, and appear as ſuch, who have no marks of apoſtolical authority. The Apoſtle choſe rather to be looked upon as a poor, mean, and inſignificant perſon, than that they ſhould ſin, and require the exerciſe of his chaſtizing rod, whereby he would be ſeen to be what they called in queſtion.

Ver. 8. For we can do nothing againſt the truth, &c.] The Apoſtles had no power, nor could they, nor did they deſire to exerciſe any againſt ſuch who received the truth of the Goſpel in the love of it; who continued in it, walked in it, and held it faſt; who worſhipped God in ſpirit and in truth, and who walked uprightly, and as became the truth; for as the law is not made for ſuch perſons, but the reverſe, ſo the authority the Apoſtles had received from Chriſt, was not to be exerciſed upon ſuch: but for the truth; for the ſake of defending the truth againſt thoſe that dropped, denied, and oppoſed it; and for the honour of it, by chaſtiſing, correcting, reproving, cenſuring, and puniſhing ſuch, who either contradicted it, or cauſed it to be blaſphemed and ſpoken evil of.

Ver. 9. For we are glad when we are weak, &c.] Appear to be ſo, look like perſons diſarmed of all power and authority; the Apoſtles rejoiced when they had no occaſion of exerting themſelves, and of exerciſing that high office, and extraordinary commiſſion they had received of Chriſt Jeſus: and ye are ſtrong; ſtand faſt in the doctrine of faith, and are lively and active in the exerciſe of the grace of faith; are ſtrong in Chriſt, and in his grace, and in the power of his might, to withſtand every temptation of ſatan, every corruption of their own hearts, and to perform every duty aright. And this alſo we wiſh even your perfection; or reſtoration, or jointing in again; a metaphor taken from the ſetting of bones that are diſlocated and out of joint; for the church at Corinth was like a disjointed body, and the Apoſtle's wiſh was, that their animoſities might ceaſe, their diviſions be healed, their diſorders rectified, and each member be in its proper place, behaving as became the Goſpel of Chriſt; ſee 1 Cor. i. 10.

Ver. 10. Therefore I write theſe things being abſent, &c.] Aſſuring them of his power and authority, expreſſing his concern for their welfare, earneſtly deſiring that they might be kept from evil, and perform good works; and that they might be in a more honourable, orderly, and comfortable ſituation, whilſt he was abſent from them, and before he came among them: leſt being preſent, I ſhould uſe ſharpneſs; meaning ſevere reproofs and cenſures, or rather the exerciſe of the apoſtolic rod: according to the power the Lord hath given me, to edification, and not to deſtruction; by ſtriking perſons dead, as Ananias and Sapphira were by Peter; or by delivering them up to ſatan to have corporal puniſhment inflicted on them, as were Hymenæus and Philetus, and the inceſtuous perſon by the Apoſtle Paul; which, tho' it was for the deſtruction of the fleſh, yet for the ſalvation of their ſouls, and for the good, uſe, and edification of the reſt of the ſociety, that they might take warning thereby, and ſhun the evils which were the occaſion of ſuch ſeverity.

Ver. 11. Finally, brethren, farewel, &c.] Or rejoice, with ſpiritual joy in Chriſt, their ſaviour and redeemer; in his perſon, in whom they were accepted; in his righteouſneſs, by which they were juſtified; in his blood, by which they were waſhed and cleanſed; and in his fulneſs, from which they were ſupplied; and particularly, that they had ſuch a faithful monitor, ſuch an hearty well-wiſher of their ſouls welfare, and who was ſo naturally and affectionately concerned for their good: be perfect; ſeek after perfection in knowledge, grace, and holineſs, and in the performance of good works: or be reſtored; or jointed and knit together, as before; ſee ver. 9, let every difference ſubſide, all breaches be made up, every member take and fill up his place, and all things be done decently and in order: be of good comfort; or exhort one another, to the diligent diſcharge of duty, to love and good works; or comfort one another in all diſtreſſes, inward and outward, both by words and deeds, according to the ability God has given; or take comfort, be of good heart, don't refuſe to be comforted either by God or men. Be of one mind; in religious ſentiments, in the doctrines and principles of grace, and ordinances of the Goſpel; for as there is but one Lord to be believed in, ſo there is, and ought to be, but one ſyſtem of faith to be received, and one baptiſm to be adminiſtred in one and the ſame way, to one and the ſame ſort of perſons; which ſameneſs of judgment, in faith and worſhip, is very neceſſary to church-communion, and the comfort of it; for how can two, and much leſs more, walk comfortably together, unleſs they are agreed in theſe things? Live in peace; both with them that are without, and them that are within, with all men, and with the members of the church; which to do, is to the credit of religion, the comfort of church-members, and the joy of Chriſt's miniſters: and the God of love and peace ſhall be with you; he who is love itſelf, and has loved his people with an everlaſting love, and who is the author and donor of ſpiritual and eternal peace, and who has called his people to peace, and expects and requires it among themſelves, and all men, will grant to ſuch his gracious preſence; than which nothing can be more grateful and deſirable.

Ver. 12. Greet one another with an holy kiſs.] See the note on Rom. xvi. 16.

Ver. 13. All the ſaints ſalute you.] Being all intereſted in the ſame divine favour, redeemed by the ſame blood, and ſanctified by the ſame grace, they have a common concern for each other's welfare; ſee the note on Rom. xvi. 16.

Ver. 14. The grace of the Lord Jeſus Chriſt, &c.] Meaning either the love of Chriſt; ſee 2 Cor. viii. 9. which is the ſame with that of his Father's, is as early, and of the ſame nature, being a love of complacency and delight; and which, as it is without beginning, will be without end. This is the ground and foundation of all he has done and underwent for his people; of his becoming their ſurety; of his incarnation, obedience, ſufferings, and death in their room and ſtead; and intereſt in which, tho' they always have, yet they have not always an abiding ſenſe of it with them, which is what the Apoſtle here prays for: or elſe by the grace of Chriſt is meant the fulneſs of grace that is in him as mediator; which is deſired to be with the ſaints as the object of their truſt and dependance; to be ſtrong in, draw living water with joy out of, receive and derive daily from; not forſake it, and hew out broken ciſterns, but continually apply to, and make uſe of it, as the fountain of gardens, the well of living waters, and ſtreams from Lebanon; to be with them as a ſupply to their wants, to furniſh them with every thing they ſtand in need of, and to enable them to do his will and work: or elſe the redeeming grace of Chriſt is particularly deſigned, and the intent of the petition is, that they might ſee their intereſt in it, and in all the branches of it; as that they were redeemed by his blood from ſin, law, and wrath, had all their ſins expiated and forgiven thro' his ſacrifice, and were juſtified from all things by his righteouſneſs. And the love of God; the Father, as the Arabic verſion adds very juſtly, as to the ſenſe, though 'tis not in the text; meaning, the love of God to his people; which is eternal, from everlaſting to everlaſting; free and undeſerved, ſpecial and peculiar, is diſpenſed in a ſovereign way, is unchangeable, abides for ever, and is the ſource and ſpring of all the bleſſings both of grace and glory. Now when this is intreated to be with all the ſaints, it does not ſuppoſe that it is ever from them, or that it can it be taken away from them; but whereas they may be without a comfortable ſenſe of it, and a view of intereſt in it, the Apoſtle prays, that in this reſpect it might be with them; that they might be directed into it, have it ſhed abroad in their hearts, and they be rooted and grounded in it, and comprehend for themſelves the heighth, and depth, and length, and breadth of it. And the communion of the Holy Ghoſt; either a larger communication of the gifts and graces of the Spirit of God, called the ſupply of the Spirit, Phil. i. 19. neceſſary to carry on the good work of grace, and perform it to the end; or elſe that communion and fellowſhip which the Spirit of God leads the ſaints into with the Father, by ſhedding abroad his love in their hearts, and with the Son, by taking of the things of Chriſt, and ſhewing them to them; and alſo that nearneſs which the ſpirits of believers have with the Spirit of God, when he witneſſes to their ſpirits that they are the children of God, becomes the earneſt of the inheritance in their hearts, and ſeals them up unto the day of redemption: all which is requeſted by the Apoſtle, to be, ſays he, with you all; or with your company, or congregation, as the Arabic verſion reads it, with all the ſaints; for their intereſt in the love of the Father, in the grace of the Son, and in the favour of the Spirit, is the ſame, whatever different ſenſe and apprehenſions they may have thereof. This paſſage contains no inconſiderable proof of a Trinity of perſons in the Godhead, to whom diſtinct things are here aſcribed, and of them aſked, as equal objects of prayer and worſhip. Amen is added, by way of aſſent and confirmation, and as expreſſive of faith in the petitions, and of earneſt deſire to have them fulfilled.

According to the ſubſcription at the end of this Epiſtle, it was written by the Apoſtle when he was at Philippi, a city of Macedonia, and tranſcribed by Titus and Lucas, and by them ſent or carried to the Corinthians; which ſeems to be agreeable to what is ſuggeſted in the Epiſtle itſelf, tho' theſe ſubſcriptions are not to be depended upon. The Syriac verſion only mentions Luke; and ſome copies read, by Titus, Barnabas, and Luke.

AN EXPOSITION, &c.

The Epiſtle of PAUL the Apoſtle to the GALATIANS.

THE perſons to whom this Epiſtle is written, were not ſuch who made up a ſingle church only, in ſome certain town or city, but were ſuch, of which ſeveral churches conſiſted, in a region or country called Galatia, as is evident from ch. i. 2. and the members of theſe churches ſeem to be chiefly, if not altogether Jews, ſince the Apoſtle includes them with himſelf, as having been under the law, under tutors and governours, and in bondage under the elements of the world, and to whom the law had been a ſchool-maſter, tho' now they were no longer under it as ſuch, ch. iii. 23, 24, 25. and iv. 1, 2, 3. or however, tho' ſome of them might have been originally Gentiles, yet previous to their converſion, had become proſelytes to the Jews, and now were returning to Judaiſm again, as appears from ch. iv. 8, 9, 10. When and from whence this Epiſtle was written, is not very clear and manifeſt: ſome have thought, that it was written about the time of the writing of the Epiſtle to the Romans, and upon a like occaſion; but if it was written about that time, it could not be written from Rome, as the ſubſcription to this Epiſtle atteſts, ſince it is certain, that when the Apoſtle wrote his Epiſtle to the Romans, he had never, as yet, been at Rome. Beza is of opinion, that it was written from Antioch, between the return of Paul and Barnabas thither from their firſt journey, and the troubles which broke out in that church, Acts xiv. 28. But to this it is reaſonably objected, that it is queſtionable whether there were ſo early any churches in Galatia at all; and if there were, it does not ſeem that the defection from the faith, complained of in this Epiſtle, as yet had took place in any of the churches; for it was after this date that the troubles upon this head aroſe at Antioch, which ſeems to have been the firſt place, and the church there the firſt church the judaizing teachers practiſed at and upon. Some Latin exemplars teſtify, that it was written from Epheſus; of which opinion was Eraſmus; but as Dr. Lightfoot obſerves, the ſame reaſon is againſt this as the former, ſeeing the corruption that was got into this church was then but beginning, when the Apoſtle was at Epheſus: it ſeems therefore moſt likely, that it was written from Rome, as the ſubſcription in the Greek copies affirms; and which is ſtrengthened by the Syriac and Arabic verſions, ſeeing it ſeems to have been written after the Apoſtle had made the collections, in ſeveral places, for the poor ſaints at Jeruſalem, ch. ii. 10. and when the apoſtacy from the faith had got to a great pitch; nor is it any objection that there is no expreſs mention made of his bonds in it, as there is in thoſe Epiſtles of his, which were written from Rome; ſince, when he wrote this, he might have been delivered from them, as ſome have thought he was after his firſt defence; and beſides, he does take notice of the marks of the Lord Jeſus he bore in his body, chap. vi. 17. Dr. Lightfoot places the writing of this Epiſtle in the year 59, and in the fifth of Nero; ſome place it in 55, and others in 58. That there were churches in Galatia very early, is certain from Acts xviii. 23. 1 Cor. xvi. 1. but by whom they were planted is not ſo evident; very likely by the Apoſtle, ſince, it is certain, both from this Epiſtle, that he was perſonally in this country, and preached the Goſpel here, ch. iv. 13, 14, 15. and from Acts xvi. 6. and if he was not the inſtrument of the converſion of the firſt of them, which laid the foundation of a Goſpel church-ſtate, yet it is certain, that he was uſeful in ſtrengthening the diſciples and brethren throughout this country, Acts xviii. 23. But after his departure from them, the falſe teachers got among them, and inſinuated, that he was no Apoſtle, at leaſt that he was inferior to Peter, James, and John, the miniſters of the circumciſion; and theſe ſeduced many of the members of the churches in this place, drawing them off from the evangelical doctrine of juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, perſuading them that the obſervation of the ceremonial law, particularly circumciſion, was neceſſary to their acceptance with God, and juſtification in his ſight: wherefore the occaſion and deſign of this Epiſtle were to vindicate the character of the Apoſtle as ſuch; to eſtabliſh the true doctrine of juſtification by faith, in oppoſition to the works of the law; to recover thoſe who were carried away with the other doctrines; to exhort the ſaints to ſtand faſt in the liberty of Chriſt, and to various other duties of religion; and to give a true deſcription of the falſe teachers, and their views, that ſo they might beware of them, and of their principles.

CHAP. I.

THIS chapter contains the inſcription of the Epiſtle, the Apoſtle's uſual ſalutation of the perſons he writes to, and the charge he brought againſt them for their fickleſneſs and inconſtancy, in ſhewing any manner of diſpoſition towards a removal from the Goſpel; the truth, certainty, and authority of the Goſpel, and an account of himſelf, who was a preacher of it; of his life before converſion; of the nature and manner of his converſion; of his travels, labours, and uſefulneſs afterwards. The inſcription is in ver. 1, 2. in which the writer of the Epiſtle is deſcribed by his name Paul, and by his office, an Apoſtle; which office he had not of men, but of God, of the Son of God, Jeſus Chriſt, and of God the Father, who is deſcribed by his power in raiſing Chriſt from the dead. The perſons to whom the Epiſtle is inſcribed are the churches of Galatia, and thoſe that joined the Apoſtle in the ſalutation of them, were the brethren that were with him. The ſalutation follows, ver. 3. in which mention being made of Chriſt, there is a declaration of a ſingular benefit by him, which contains the ſum of the Goſpel, as that he gave himſelf for the ſins of his people, to deliver them from the preſent evil world, according to the will of God, ver. 4. upon which a doxology, or an aſcription of glory is made, either to Chriſt, who gave himſelf, or to the Father, according to whoſe will he did, or to both, ver. 5. After which the Apoſtle proceeds to exhibit a charge of levity againſt the Galatians; and which he expreſſes in a way of admiration, that they ſhould ſo ſoon be carried away from the doctrine of grace, to another doctrine the reverſe of it, ver. 6. tho' he ſomewhat mitigates this reproof by laying the blame on the falſe teachers, who were troublers of them, and perverters of the Goſpel of Chriſt; and corrects himſelf for calling their falſe doctrine by the name of another Goſpel, ver. 7. and delivers out, and pronounces an anathema on all ſuch, whether angels or men, that ſhould preach any other Goſpel than he had preached, and they had received, ver. 8, 9. The excellency of which Goſpel is ſet forth, by the matter of it, being not human but divine, and by the manner of preaching it, with all ſimplicity and honeſty, not ſeeking to pleaſe men, ver. 10. and from the efficient cauſe of it, it being denied to be after man, or received from, or taught by man, but is aſcribed to the revelation of Chriſt Jeſus, ver. 11, 12. And that the Apoſtle had it not from men, he proves by the account of himſelf, and his converſation before converſion, as how that he had been a perſecutor of the church of God, of thoſe that profeſſed the chriſtian religion and doctrine; wherefore he could not have the Goſpel, as not from nature and education, ſo not from the chief-prieſts, Scribes, and elders, who encouraged him to perſecute, ver. 13. And this he further makes to appear by his great proficiency in the religion of the Jews, and his abundant zeal for the traditions of the fathers, which ſet him at the greateſt diſtance from, and oppoſition to, the Goſpel of Chriſt, ver. 14. And, on the other hand, that he received it of God, and by the revelation of Chriſt, he proves by the account he gives of his effectual calling and converſion; the ſource and ſpring of which was the ſovereign will of God in divine predeſtination, and the moving uſe of it, the free grace of God, ver. 15. The manner in which this was done was by a revelation of Chriſt in him; and the end of it was, that he might preach Chriſt to the Gentiles, which he immediately did, without conſulting fleſh and blood, ver. 16. And as it was a clear point that he could never receive the Goſpel from the Jews before his converſion, he and they being enemies to it, and perſecutors of it; ſo it was evident that he did not receive it after his converſion, even from chriſtian men, ſeeing he did not, upon his converſion, go directly to Jeruſalem, and confer with the Apoſtles there, who were the moſt likely perſons to have taught him the Goſpel; but inſtead of this he went into Arabia preaching the Goſpel, and then came back to Damaſcus, where he was converted, ver. 17. And it was three Years after his converſion, that he went to Jeruſalem to viſit Peter; and his ſtay with him was very ſhort, no longer than fifteen days; and he was the only Apoſtle he ſaw there, excepting James, the brother of Chriſt, ver. 18, 19. for the truth of all which he appeals to God the ſearcher of hearts, ver. 20. And then goes on with the account of himſelf, and his travels; how that when he departed from Jeruſalem, he did not go into any other parts of Judea, and viſit the churches there, but went into the countries of Syria and Cilicia; and was not ſo much as known by face, or perſonally, by any of the churches, or members of the churches in Judea, ver. 20, 21. ſo that, as it could not be thought by his ſhort ſtay at Jeruſalem, and the few Apoſtles he ſaw there, that he received the Goſpel he preached from them, ſo neither from any other miniſters, or body of chriſtians, in the land of Judea; for all they knew of him was by hearſay only, as that he who was formerly a perſecutor of them, was now become a preacher of the Goſpel he had ſought to deſtroy, ver. 22, 23. wherefore it was a clear caſe he had not received the Goſpel from them. Beſides, as they had heard that he preached the Goſpel of Chriſt, they glorified God for it, who had revealed it to him, and beſtowed gifts upon him, fitting him for ſuch ſervice, ver. 24.

Ver. 1. Paul an Apoſtle, not of men, neither by man, &c.] The writer of this Epiſtle, Paul, puts his name to it, as to all his Epiſtles, excepting that to the Hebrews, if that be his, being neither afraid nor aſhamed to own what is herein contained. He aſſerts himſelf to be an Apoſtle, which was the higheſt office in the church, to which he was immediately called by Chriſt, and confirmed in it by ſigns and wonders. This he choſe to mention, becauſe of the falſe teachers, who had inſinuated he was no Apoſtle, and not to be regarded; whereas he had received grace and apoſtleſhip from Chriſt, and was an Apoſtle, not of men, as were the Apoſtles or meſſengers of the Sanhedrim[*]; ſee the note on 2 Cor. viii. 23. and as were the falſe Apoſtles, who were ſent out by men, who had no authority to ſend them forth: the Apoſtle, as he did not take this honour to himſelf, did not thruſt himſelf into this office, or run before he was ſent; ſo he was not ſent by men; he did not act upon human authority, or by an human commiſſion: this is ſaid in oppoſition to the falſe Apoſtles, and to an unlawful inveſtiture with the office of apoſtleſhip, and an uſurpation of it, as well as to diſtinguiſh himſelf from the meſſengers and embaſſadors of princes, who are ſent with credentials by them to negotiate civil affairs for them in foreign courts, he being an embaſſador of Chriſt; and from the meſſengers of churches, who were ſometimes ſent with aſſiſtance or advice to other churches: and he moreover ſays, nor by man; by a mere man, but by one that was more than a man; nor by a mortal man, but by Chriſt as raiſed from the dead, immortal and glorious at God's right hand: or rather the ſenſe is, he was not choſen into the office of apoſtleſhip by the ſuffrages of men, as Matthias was; or he was not ordained an Apoſtle in the manner the ordinary miniſters of the Goſpel and paſtors, are by the churches of Chriſt; ſo that as the former clauſe is oppoſed to an unlawful call of men, this is oppoſed to a lawful one; and ſhows him to be not an ordinary miniſter, but an extraordinary one, who was called to this office, not mediately by men, by any of the churches, as common miniſters are: but by Jeſus Chriſt; immediately, without the intervention of men, as appears from Acts xxvi. 16, 17, 18. For what Ananias did upon his converſion, were only putting his hands on him to recover his ſight, and baptizing him; it was Chriſt that appeared to him perſonally, and made him a miniſter; and his ſeparation with Barnabas, by the church, under the direction of the Holy Ghoſt, Acts xiii. 2, 4. was to ſome particular work and ſervice to be done by them, and not to apoſtleſhip, and which was long after Paul was made an Apoſtle by Chriſt. Jeſus Chriſt being here oppoſed to man, does not ſuggeſt that he was not a man, really and truly, for he certainly was; he partook of the ſame fleſh and blood with us, and was in all things made like unto us, ſin excepted; but that he was not a mere man, he was truly God as well as man; for as the raiſing him from the dead, in the next clauſe, ſhews him to be a man, or he could not have died; ſo his being oppoſed to man, and ſet in equality with God the Father, in this verſe, and grace and peace being prayed for from him, as from the Father, ver. 4. and the ſame glory aſcribed to him, as to the Father, ver. 5. prove him to be truly and properly God. The Apoſtle adds, and God the Father; Chriſt and his Father being of the ſame nature and eſſence, power and authority, as they are jointly concerned and work together in the affairs of nature and providence, ſo in thoſe of grace; and particularly in conſtituting and ordaining Apoſtles, and ſetting them in the church. This ſerves the more to confirm the divine authority under which Paul acted as an Apoſtle, being not only made ſo by Chriſt, but alſo by God the Father, who is deſcribed as he, who raiſed him from the dead; which is obſerved, not ſo much to expreſs the divine power of the Father, or the glory of Chriſt, as raiſed from the dead, but to ſtrengthen the validity of the Apoſtle's character and commiſſion as ſuch; to whom it might have been objected, that he had not ſeen Chriſt in the fleſh, nor familiarly converſed with him, as the reſt of the Apoſtles did: to which he was able to reply, that he was not called to be an Apoſtle by Chriſt in his low and mean eſtate of humiliation, but by him after he was raiſed from the dead, and was ſet down at the right hand of God; who perſonally appeared to him in his glory, and was ſeen by him, and who made and appointed him his Apoſtle, to bear his name before Gentiles, and kings, and the people of Iſrael; ſo that his call to apoſtleſhip was rather more grand and illuſtrious than that of any of the other Apoſtles.

Ver. 2. And all the brethren which are with me, &c.] Meaning either the brethren of the church where he was when he wrote this Epiſtle, who were children of the ſame Father, regenerated by the ſame grace, belonged to the ſame family and houſhold of God, and were heirs together of the grace of life; or elſe his fellow-miniſters, who were aſſiſting to him in his work, and were companions with him in his travels, and whom he ſometimes mentions by name, and joins with him in his Epiſtles, as Soſthenes, Sylvanus, and Timothy; and the rather he takes notice of the brethren here, whoever are meant, to ſhew, that they agreed with him in the doctrines of grace he defends, and in the charges he brought againſt this church, and in the reproofs and advice he gave them; which he might ſuppoſe, and hope, would have the greater weight and influence upon them: unto the churches of Galatia; Galatia was a country in the leſſer Aſia, inhabited by the Gauls, who coming thither out of Europe, mixed with the Grecians; whence it was firſt called Gallo-Græcia, and afterwards Galatia; ſee the note on Acts xvi. 6. The metropolis of it, as Pliny [b] ſays, was formerly Gordium, and the chief towns or cities, according to him, were Ancyra, Tavium, and Peſſinus; and in ſome, or all of theſe places, it is very probable, were the churches here mentioned; ſee the note on Acts xviii. 23. It ſeems there were more than one in this country; for the primitive churches were not national nor provincial, but congregational, conſiſting of perſons called out of the world, and joined together in holy fellowſhip, and who walked in the commandments and ordinances of the Lord: and tho' theſe churches had many among them that were diſorderly, and were ſwerving from the faith of the Goſpel, yet were not unchurched, but honoured ſtill with the name of churches, there being no perfection to be expected in this ſtate of things; as not in particular perſons, ſo not in congregated bodies and ſocieties; tho' it is obſerved by ſome, that they are barely called churches, without any additional epithets, as churches of God, beloved of God, called to be ſaints, faithful and ſanctified in Chriſt, which are beſtowed on other churches; whereby the Apoſtle is thought to ſhew his indignation and reſentment at their principles and practices. For quickly after the Goſpel was preached unto them, falſe teachers crept in among them, endeavouring to ſubvert it, by mixing it with the law, and joining Moſes and Chriſt; and in which they very much ſucceeded; and is the reaſon of the Apoſtle's writing this Epiſtle.

Ver. 3. Grace be to you, &c.] After the inſcription above, in which the writer of the Epiſtle, and the perſons joined to him, are deſcribed, and the churches to whom it is written, follows the ſalutation in theſe words, and which is common to all the Epiſtles of this Apoſtle; of the ſenſe of which, ſee the note on Rom. i. 7. The Alexandrian copy reads, from God our Father, and the Lord Jeſus Chriſt; and the Ethiopic verſion reads, our Father.

Ver. 4. Who gave himſelf for our ſins, &c.] The antecedent to the relative who, is our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, ver. 3. and the words are an illuſtration of the good-will of God the Father, and of the grace and love of Chriſt, in the gift of himſelf, for the ſins of his people: he did not merely give, ſua, his own things, what were his properly, but, ſe, himſelf; himſelf; not the world, and the fulneſs of it, gold, ſilver, and ſuch like corruptible things; no, nor men for them, and people for their lives; nor angels, his creatures, and miniſtring ſpirits; but his own ſelf, his life, his fleſh, his blood, his body and ſoul, his whole human nature, and this as in union with himſelf, a divine perſon, the eternal ſon of God. He gave himſelf freely, chearfully, voluntarily, into the hands of men, juſtice, and death itſelf, as a ſacrifice for ſin, to expiate it, make reconciliation and atonement for it, which could not be done by the ſacrifices of the legal diſpenſation; to procure the remiſſion of it, which could not be had without ſhedding of blood; and utterly to take it away, finiſh it, make an end of it, and aboliſh it, ſo as that it might never riſe any more to the condemnation of his people: and this reached to ſins of all ſorts, not only original, but actual, and theſe of thought, word, and deed; and this oblation of himſelf upon the croſs, was not for any ſin of his own, who had none, nor for the ſins of angels, of whom he was no redeemer and ſaviour, but for our ſins; not the ſins of the Apoſtles, or of the Jews only, nor yet of all mankind, but of God's elect, called the friends of Chriſt, his ſheep and church, for whom he gave himſelf: and his end in ſo doing was, that he might deliver us from this preſent evil world; by which is meant, either the Jewiſh world, or church-ſtate, in which were a worldly ſanctuary, and which were ſubject to ceremonies and traditions, called the elements and rudiments of the world; and who were poſſeſs'd of worldly notions, and in expectation of a worldly kingdom to be ſet up by the Meſſiah; and both in principle and in practice, were ſadly degenerated, and were become very evil and wicked: or the preſent age and generation of men, whether of Jews or Gentiles, which was ſo corrupt, as the like was never known; or in general the preſent world, and the men of it, in diſtinction either from the world before the flood, as in 2 Pet. iii. 5, 6, 7. or rather from the new heavens and earth, which will be after the preſent ones, and wherein will dwell righteouſneſs; or, in a word, from the world which is to come, as they are frequently oppoſed in ſcripture: and which is ſaid to be evil, not with reſpect to the matter, that being all very good, as created by God; but with reſpect to the men of it, who lie in wickedneſs, under the power of the wicked one, and of their own ſins; and to the things which are in it, all which are the luſt of the fleſh, the luſt of the eyes, and the pride of life. Now Chriſt gave himſelf a ſacrifice for the ſins of his people, that as in conſequence of this they might be delivered and ſaved from the damning power, ſo from the governing power and influence of all that is evil in this preſent world; as from ſatan, the God of it, who has uſurped a power over it; from the luſts that are predominant in it; from the vain converſation of the men of it; from the general conflagration of it at the laſt day, and from the perdition of ungodly men, and their eternal deſtruction in hell: and all this is according to the will of God, and our Father. It was by the determinate counſel and fore-knowledge of God, that Chriſt was delivered up into the hands of wicked men, and put to death by them; it was his will of purpoſe and decree, to deliver him up into the hands of juſtice and death, and that he ſhould give himſelf a ſacrifice for ſin; yea, it was his will of command, that he ſhould lay down his life for his ſheep, to which he was obedient; it was his pleaſure, it was what was agreeable to him, was to his good liking, that he ſhould die for the ſins of his people; it was owing to the love of God, who is our Father in Chriſt, and by adopting grace, and not to any worth or deſert of ours, that Chriſt gave himſelf for us; as his own love, ſo his Father's will, were what ſolely moved him to it.

Ver. 5. To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.] That is, either to Chriſt, who gave himſelf to expiate the ſins of his people, on the account of which all honour and glory are due to him from them; or to God the Father, according to whoſe will of purpoſe and command Chriſt gave himſelf, for which glory ought to be aſcribed unto him; and it may well be thought, that both are taken into this doxology: the Father is to be glorified, who of his everlaſting love, and free favour, did in his eternal purpoſes and decrees, in his counſel and covenant, ſo wiſely frame and order things, that his own Son ſhould be given to be an offering for ſin; and Chriſt is to be glorified, that he of his free, rich grace and love, agreed to give himſelf, and did give himſelf to be a ranſom for his people, which has been teſtified in due time. This aſcription of glory to both, ſhews the greatneſs of the bleſſing, and the grateful ſenſe, which all intereſted in it ought to bear upon their minds continually, for ever and ever; or to the ages of ages, a Jewiſh phraſe, the ſame with לעלמי עלמין[c]. To which the Apoſtle adds his Amen, as joining with all the ſaints, above or below, in aſcribing ſalvation, and the glory of it to him that ſits upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever.

Ver. 6. I marvel that ye are ſo ſoon removed, &c.] The Apoſtle now enters on the ſubject-matter of this Epiſtle, and opens the occaſion and deſign of it, which were to reprove the Galatians for their inſtability in the Goſpel; and, if poſſible, to reclaim them, who were removed, or removing from the ſimplicity of it; and which was very ſurprizing to the Apoſtle, who had entertained a good opinion of them, looked upon them as perſons called by the grace of God, well eſtabliſhed in the doctrines of the Goſpel, and in no danger of being carried away with the error of the wicked: the perſon from whom he ſays they were removed, is, from him that called you into the grace of Chriſt; by whom is meant, not the Apoſtle himſelf, who had been an inſtrument in the calling of them to the knowledge of Chriſt, and the participation of his grace, and from whoſe Goſpel, or the Goſpel as preached by him, in its clearneſs and purity, they were now departing; but either Chriſt, and ſo the Syriac and Arabic verſions read the words, from Chriſt who called you by his own grace; or rather God the Father, and ſome copies read, into, or by the grace of God; to whom calling is moſt commonly aſcribed in the ſacred writings: and which is to be underſtood, not of a miniſterial call, or a call to preach the Goſpel of Chriſt; tho' there might be ſome in theſe churches who were called both internally and externally to that ſacred office; nor of a mere outward call by the miniſtry: for tho' doubtleſs there might be ſome among them who were only ſo called, yet as much as they were under a profeſſion of Chriſt, and nothing appearing to the contrary, they were all in a judgment of charity looked upon as effectually called by the grace of God; which calling is here meant: for they were called into the grace of Chriſt; ſome read it, in, or by the grace of Chriſt; referring it either to the moving cauſe of vocation, which is not the works and merits of men, but the free grace and favour of God in Chriſt; or to the efficient cauſe of it, which is not the power and will of man, but the efficacious grace of Chriſt, thro' the powerful operations of his Spirit: but the words are well rendered, into the grace of Chriſt; that is, to the enjoyment of the fulneſs of grace which is in Chriſt; of all the bleſſings of grace he has in his hands; ſuch as juſtification, peace, pardon, atonement, wiſdom, ſtrength, joy, comfort, and every ſupply of grace; and particularly fellowſhip with him, into which the ſaints are called, and than which nothing is more deſirable: but the difficulty is, how ſuch perſons can be ſaid to be removed from God, who has thus called them to partake of grace in Chriſt. They are not, nor can they be removed from the everlaſting and unchangeable love of God to them in Chriſt, of which their calling is a fruit, effect, and evidence; nor from their covenant intereſt in him, which is immoveable and inviolable; nor from a ſtate of juſtification, in which they openly are, who in effectual vocation have paſſed from death to life, and ſo ſhall never enter into condemnation; nor from the family and houſhold of God, in which they are; no, nor from the grace of vocation with which they are called by God, and which has eternal ſalvation inſeparably connected with it; but this muſt be underſtood doctrinally of their removal from the Goſpel of Chriſt, tho' not of a total and final one. It is obſerved by ſome, that the word uſed is in the preſent tenſe, and ſhews, that they were not gone off from the Goſpel, but were upon going, ſo that the Apoſtle had ſome hopes, yea, confidence of their being reſtored, ch. v. 10. And beſides, tho' ſuch as are truly called by grace can't be finally and totally deceived by falſe prophets and falſe teachers, yet they may be greatly unhinged by them, and may fall from ſome degree of ſtedfaſtneſs in the doctrine of faith, which was the caſe of theſe Galatians: but what increaſed the Apoſtle's ſurprize, and aggravated their ſin and weakneſs, was, that they were ſo ſoon removed from the ſimplicity of the Goſpel; he having been with them but a few years before, and preached the Goſpel to them, which was the means of their converſion, and of planting churches among them; at leaſt he had lately paid them a viſit, when he afreſh ſtrengthened them in the faith of the Goſpel, Acts xviii. 23. Or this may regard that eaſineſs of mind which appeared in them, who upon the firſt attack of them by the falſe teachers, were weakly and cowardly giving up their faith, and at once giving into the notions of theſe men, as ſoon as they were propoſed unto them. That which they are ſaid to be removed unto, is another Goſpel, different from that, and very unlike to what had been preached to them, and they had received; which had nothing of the grace of Chriſt, of the doctrines and bleſſings of grace that had, by which they were called; very different from the Goſpel of Chriſt, and his Apoſtles, inſomuch that it did not deſerve the name of a Goſpel; and the Apoſtle calls it ſo, not that he thought it to be one, but becauſe it was in the opinion of others, and was ſo ſtiled by the falſe Apoſtles; wherefore, by way of conceſſion, he ſo calls it, tho' he immediately corrects it.

Ver. 7. Which is not another, &c.] It is no Goſpel, no joyful ſound, no good news, and glad tidings; the doctrine which attributes juſtification to the works of the law, or mixes grace and works in the buſineſs of ſalvation, which was the doctrine of theſe falſe teachers, is no Goſpel; not truly ſo, however it may be called; nor does it bring any ſolid peace and joy to diſtreſſed minds. There is but one pure Goſpel of the grace of God, and Chriſt, and his Apoſtles; there is not one and another; there is but one faith, one doctrine and ſcheme of faith; the Goſpel is ſingle and uniform, all of a-piece, has no yea and nay, or contradiction in it; this trumpet gives no uncertain ſound, nor any dreadful, but a joyful one: but there be ſome that trouble you; meaning the falſe Apoſtles, whoſe names he does not think fit to mention, as being unworthy to be named, and to have their names tranſmitted to poſterity. Theſe troubled the churches with their doctrines and principles, by raiſing diſputes and controverſies among them, injecting doubts and ſcruples into their minds, which puzzled and confounded them, and made them uneaſy, and which broke in upon that peace of ſoul which the Goſpel brings and eſtabliſhes; for no true ſolid peace is attained to, and enjoyed, but by the doctrine of juſtification by the righteouſneſs of Chriſt, pardon by his blood, and atonement by his ſacrifice, which the doctrine of juſtification by works, &c. tends to deſtroy. And would pervert the Goſpel of Chriſt; which has Chriſt for its author, ſubject, and preacher; and particularly the doctrine of juſtification by his righteouſneſs, which they ſought to tranſvert, to throw into a different ſhape and form, to adulterate by mixing it with the works of the law, and ſo, if poſſible, deſtroy it: to this they ſhewed a good will, but were not able to effect, for the Goſpel is an everlaſting one; it is immoveable, and ſo is that particular doctrine of it; it remains, and will remain in ſpight of all oppoſition to it. Thus the Apoſtle prudently lays the blame of the Galatians removing from the Goſpel to another, upon the falſe teachers, hoping he ſhould be able to reclaim them by ſolid arguments, and gentle methods.

Ver. 8. But though we, or an angel from heaven, &c.] The Apoſtle, in order to aſſert the more ſtrongly the truth, purity, and perfection of the Goſpel, as preached by him; and to deter perſons from preaching another Goſpel, and others from receiving it, ſuppoſes a caſe impoſſible; and in ſuch a caſe, denounces his anathema's. It was not poſſible, that he, or any of his fellow Apoſtles, who had been ſo clearly led, and ſo fully eſtabliſhed in the Goſpel of Chriſt, and of which they had had ſuch a powerful and comfortable experience in their ſouls, could ever preach one different from it; nor was it poſſible, that a good angel, one that is in heaven, that always beholds the face of God there, is ever ready to do his will, as he never could be employed by God in publiſhing another, ſo he never would; and yet was it poſſible for ſuch a thing to be done by ſuch men, or ſuch an angel, he or they would deſerve the curſe of God and men; their having the higheſt names, or being of the higheſt character, and in the higheſt office and claſs of beings, would not ſcreen them; and therefore how ſhould the falſe Apoſtles, and thoſe who followed them, ever think to eſcape, ſince even theſe would not, ſhould they preach any other Goſpel unto you, than that which we have preached unto you; that is, not only any one that is contrary to it, but any one beſides it; for ſuch was the perfection of the Goſpel, as preached by the Apoſtle, who declared the whole counſel of God, and kept back nothing that was profitable to the churches, that no addition could, or might be made unto it: let him be accurſed, or anathema; ſee 1 Cor. xvi. 22. which may reſpect his excommunication out of the church, and his ſentence of condemnation by Chriſt at the laſt day; and the ſenſe be this, let him be ejected from the miniſtry of the word, degraded from his office, and caſt out of the church; let him be no more a miniſter, nor a member of it; and let him be abhorred of men, and accurſed of Chriſt; let him him hear the awful ſentence, go ye curſed, &c.

Ver. 9. As we have ſaid before, ſo ſay I now again, &c.] Either when he firſt preached the Goſpel among them; or rather referring to what he had juſt now ſaid, which he repeats with ſome little alteration; as if any, men, or angels, be they of what name, figure, rank, or office whatever, preach any other Goſpel unto you, than that ye have received; and as the Apoſtle thought, readily, willingly, ſincerely, and heartily, in the love of it; aſſenting to the truth, feeling the power of it, and openly profeſſing it: let him be accurſed; which he repeats, for the more ſolemn aſſeveration and confirmation of it; and to ſhew, that this did not drop from his lips haſtily and inadvertently; nor did it proceed from any irregular paſſions, or was ſpoken by him in heat, and in an angry mood, his mind being ruffled, diſturbed, and diſcompoſed; but was ſaid by him in the moſt ſerious and ſolemn manner, upon the moſt thoughtful and mature conſideration of the affair.

Ver. 10. For do I now perſuade men, or God? &c.] To perſuade, is to teach; ſee Acts xviii. 4. 2 Cor. v. 11. the ſenſe of which with reſpect to men, is eaſy, but with regard to God, difficult; and indeed can't be applied to him, conſiſtent with his divine perfections; and therefore ſomething muſt be underſtood, and which may be ſupplied either thus, do I now perſuade, you or others, that men or God are to be hearkened to? not men, but God; the Apoſtle did not teach them to hearken either to himſelf, or any of the other Apoſtles, Peter, James, and John, any further than as he and they, preached the pure Goſpel of Chriſt; but ſhould they do otherwiſe, they were not to be attended to, but God, who ſpake by his Son; or Chriſt, who is God as well as man; who is the great prophet in the church, a ſon in his own houſe, whoſe voice is to be hearkened to in all matters of doctrine, worſhip, and duty: or thus, do I now perſuade you, to obey men or God; not men, but God; he did not teach them to regard the traditions of the elders, or to obey the commandments of men, but on the contrary, the ordinances of Chriſt, who is the one Lord, and only maſter, whoſe orders are to be obſerved: or thus, do I now perſuade, to truſt in men or God? to believe in the one or the other; not in men, in the wiſdom, ſtrength, riches, and righteouſneſs of men, but in the living God; in the grace of God, and in the blood, righteouſneſs, and ſacrifice of Chriſt: or thus, do I perſuade for the ſake of men, or God? not for the ſake of gaining honour, glory, and applauſe from men, as the Phariſees and falſe Apoſtles did, but for the glory of God, the honour of Chriſt, and the good of immortal ſouls: or elſe not perſons, but things are meant, by men and God; and the ſenſe is, that the Apoſtle taught and perſuaded men to believe, not things human, but divine; he did not preach himſelf, or ſeek to ſet up his own power and authority over men; or ſet forth his eloquence, learning, parts, and abilities; or to gain either applauſe, or riches to himſelf; he did not teach human wiſdom, the vain philoſophy of the Gentiles, and oppoſitions of ſcience falſly ſo called; nor the traditions of the elders, nor the commandments of men; nor the power and purity of human nature, or the righteouſneſs of man: but he delivered things divine; he perſuaded things concerning God, and the kingdom of God; ſee Acts xix. 8. he taught, that without the regenerating grace of the Spirit of God, no man ſhould ſee, and without the juſtifying righteouſneſs of Chriſt, no man ſhould enter into, the kingdom of heaven, as his Lord had done before him; he preached the things concerning the grace and love of God, the perſon and offices of Chriſt, and the Spirit's work of regeneration and ſanctification: the word now, refers to all the time ſince his converſion, to the preſent; before his call by grace, he perſuaded perſons to hearken to men, to obey the traditions of the elders, to truſt in their own righteouſneſs for juſtification before God; but now he ſaw otherwiſe, and taught them to lay aſide every thing that was human, and to believe in God, truſt in Chriſt, and depend on his juſtifying righteouſneſs; and this he did, without any regard to the favour and affection of men, as appears from what follows: or do I ſeek to pleaſe men; no, he neither pleaſed, nor ſought to pleaſe them; neither in the matter of his miniſtry, which was the grace of God, ſalvation by a crucified Chriſt, and the things of the Spirit of God; for theſe were very diſtaſteful to, and accounted fooliſhneſs by the men of the world; nor in the manner of it, which was not with excellency of ſpeech, or the enticing words of man's wiſdom, with the flowers of rhetoric, but in a plain and ſimple ſtile. There is indeed a pleaſing of men, which is right, and which the Apoſtle elſewhere recommends, and was in the practice of, himſelf; ſee Rom. xv. 2. 1 Cor. x. 33. This proceeds from right principles, by proper ways and means, and to right ends, the glory of God, the good, profit, edification, and ſalvation of men; and there is a pleaſing of men that is wrong, which is done by dropping, concealing, or corrupting the doctrines of the Goſpel, to gain the affection and applauſe of men, and amaſs wealth to themſelves, as the falſe Apoſtles did, and who are here tacitly ſtruck at; a practice the Apoſtle could by no means come into, and aſſigns this reaſon for it: for if I yet pleaſed men, I ſhould not be the ſervant of Chriſt; formerly he had ſtudied to pleaſe men, when he held the cloaths of thoſe that ſtoned Stephen, made havock of the church, haling men and women to priſon; and went to the high-prieſt, and aſked letters of him to go to Damaſcus, and perſecute the followers of Chriſt, thereby currying favour with him; but now it was otherwiſe, and he ſuggeſts, that was this his preſent temper and conduct, he ſhould have continued a Phariſee ſtill, and have never entered into the ſervice of Chriſt; for to pleaſe men, and be a ſervant of Chriſt, are things inconſiſtent, incompatible, and impracticable; no man-pleaſer can be a true faithful ſervant of Chriſt, or deſerve the name of one: the Apoſtle here refers to his office as an Apoſtle of Chriſt, and miniſter of the Goſpel, and not to his character as a private believer, in which ſenſe every chriſtian is a ſervant of Chriſt; though to pleaſe men, is even contrary to this; for no man can ſerve two maſters, God and the world, Chriſt and men. The Septuagint verſion of Pſal. liii. 5. is, for God hath ſcattered the bones, ἀνθρωπαρέσκων of men-pleaſers, to which agree the Syriac and Arabic verſions.

Ver. 11. But I certify you, brethren, &c.] Tho' the Galatians had gone ſuch lengths with their falſe teachers, yet the Apoſtle ſtill calls them brethren; as hoping well of them, that they were born of God, did belong to his family, and were heirs of the grace of life; and this he the rather makes uſe of, to ſhew his affection to them, and to engage their attention to the aſſurance he gives, of the divine original and authority of the Goſpel preached by him; which though they formerly knew and believed, yet through the inſinuations of the falſe Apoſtles, were drawn into ſome doubts about it: wherefore he declares in the moſt ſolemn and affectionate manner, that the Goſpel which was preached of me, is not after man. Their guides that were leading them wrong, did not preſume to ſay, that the Goſpel was after man, for they themſelves pretended to preach the Goſpel; but that the Goſpel preached by the Apoſtle, had no other authority than human, or than his own to ſupport it: wherefore he denies that it was after man; after the wiſdom of man, an human invention and contrivance, a device and fiction of man's brain; nor was it after the mind of man, or agreeable to his carnal reaſon, it was diſapproved of by him, and beyond his capacity to reach it; nor was it of his revealing, a diſcovery of his, fleſh and blood, human nature, could never have revealed it; nor is it in the power of one man, to make another a miniſter of the Goſpel, or to give him or himſelf ſucceſs in the miniſtration of it, but the whole is of God.

Ver. 12. For I neither received it of man, &c.] Not from Gamaliel, at whoſe feet he was brought up; he received the law from him, and knowledge in the Jews religion, and in the traditions of the elders, but not a whit of the Goſpel; on the contrary, he received prejudices againſt it from him, or were ſtrengthened in them by him; no, nor from the Apoſtles of Chriſt neither, whom he ſaw not, had no converſation with for ſome years, after he was a preacher of the Goſpel, and therefore did not receive it at their hands; no, nor from Ananias, nor any other man: neither was I taught it; that is, by man; he did not learn it of men, as men learn law, phyſic, logic, rhetoric, natural philoſophy, and other things at ſchool: but by the revelation of Jeſus Chriſt; meaning, not through Chriſt being revealed to him by the Father, as in ver. 16. though 'tis a ſenſe not to be overlooked; but by Chriſt, the revealer of it to him; and regards either the time of his rapture into the third heaven, when he heard words not to be uttered; or rather ſince that is not ſo certain when it was, the time of his converſion, when Chriſt perſonally appeared unto him, and made him a miniſter of his Goſpel; and immediately from himſelf, without the interpoſition, or uſe of any man, or means, gave him ſuch light into it, and ſuch a furniture of mind for the preaching of it, that he directly, as ſoon as ever he was baptized, ſet about the miniſtration of it, to the admiration of the ſaints, and confuſion of the enemies of Chriſt. Theſe words furniſh out another proof of the deity of Chriſt; for if the Goſpel is not after man, nor received of, or taught by man, but by Chriſt, then Chriſt cannot be a mere man, or elſe being by him, it would be by man; and which alſo confirms the authority and validity of the Goſpel, and carries in it a ſtrong reaſon, for the Apoſtle's anathematizing all ſuch as preach any other.

Ver. 13. For ye have heard of my converſation in time paſt, &c.] His manner and courſe of life, in his ſtate of unregeneracy, how diametrically oppoſite his education and behaviour, his principles and practices, were to the Goſpel; which ſhew, that he had not received it, nor was he taught it of men. This they might have heard of, either from himſelf, when he firſt preached among them, who was very free to acknowledge his former ſins and errors; or from the Jews, who were ſcattered abroad in the ſeveral countries; and it may be, from them, who were forced to fly to ſtrange cities, and perhaps to ſome in Galatia, on account of his perſecution: now his life and converſation before his converſion, were ſpent in the Jews religion; or in Judaiſm. He was born of Jewiſh parents, had a Jewiſh education, was brought up under a Jewiſh doctor, in all the peculiarities of the Jewiſh religion, and ſo could have received no hints, not in a notional way, of the truths of the Goſpel; which he might have done, had he been born of chriſtian parents, and had had a chriſtian education: beſides, he was brought up in the religion of the Jews, not as it was founded and eſtabliſhed by God, but as it was corrupted by them; who had loſt the true ſenſe of the oracles of God committed to them, the true uſe of ſacrifices, and the end of the law; had added to it a load of human traditions; placed all religion in bare doing, and taught that juſtification and ſalvation lay in the obſervance of the law of Moſes, and the traditions of the elders: add to this, that he was brought up in the ſect of the Jewiſh religion, Phariſaiſm, which was the ſtraiteſt ſect of it, and the moſt averſe to Chriſt and his Goſpel; ſo that he could never receive it, or have any diſpoſition to it from hence; ſo far from it, that he appeals to the Galatians, as what they muſt have heard, how that beyond meaſure I perſecuted the church of God; which he now knew, and believed to be the church of God; though then he did not, but rather a ſynagogue of ſatan; and this he mentions, as an aggravation of his ſin, under a ſenſe of which he was humbled all his days: when he is ſaid to perſecute it beyond meaſure, the meaning is not, as if there were any lawful meaſure, or due bounds of perſecution, but that he perſecuted the ſaints in a moſt violent and outrageous manner, beyond all others that were concerned with him: the church of God at Jeruſalem is particularly deſigned, and the members of it, the diſciples of Chriſt; whom he hated, and committed to priſon, and breathed out threatenings and ſlaughter againſt, and deſtroyed: wherefore it follows, and waſted it; or deſtroyed it; as much as in him lay, he ſought to do it, though he was not able to effect it entirely; he made havock of it, diſperſed its members, cauſed them to flee to ſtrange cities, perſecuted them to death, gave his voice againſt them to have them puniſhed and put to death: ſuch an averſion had he to the followers of Chriſt, and the chriſtian doctrine.

Ver. 14. And profited in the Jews religion, &c.] Or in Judaiſm; and the more he did ſo, or was verſed in, and wedded to their principles, the more violent a perſecutor he was. He was under a very conſiderable maſter, Gamaliel, a Rabbi of great note among the Jews; and he himſelf a youth of uncommon natural abilities, ſo that his proficiency in Jewiſh learning was very great; even as he ſays, above many my equals in mine own nation: not proſelytes in other nations, but ſuch as were natives of his own country; or were in his own kindred, his near relations, who were his cotemporaries, of the ſame age with him; and very modeſtly he ſays many, not all: being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my fathers; he had a zeal, but not according to knowledge; and a greater degree of it, than the reſt of his countrymen; and that not ſo much for the written law delivered to his fathers, as for the oral law, the traditions and cuſtoms of his anceſtors; which had been handed down, as they pretended, from one to another, and were now ſwelled to an almoſt infinite bulk; and mean the traditions of the elders, condemned by Chriſt, as making void the commandments of God: now his cloſe attachment to, and eager zeal for theſe traditions, put him upon uſing more violent meaſures in perſecuting the ſaints, and further off from the Goſpel of Chriſt: and now from this account of himſelf 'tis a clear point, that during this period of his life, he could never have received the Goſpel from men, which is his view in giving it.

Ver. 15. But when it pleaſed God, &c.] Here begins his account of his converſion, and call to the miniſtry; all which he aſcribes entirely to the ſovereign good-pleaſure, and free-grace of God: who ſeparated me from my mother's womb. By his mother is meant, not in an improper and figurative ſenſe, the Jewiſh church, or the old ſynagogue, the mother of all its members; the Jeruſalem which then was, and was in bondage with her children; from which bondage, blindneſs, ignorance, ſuperſtition and bigotry, he was delivered, when called by grace: nor the church at Antioch, which is never called a mother church; and though he was by that church with Barnabas, ſeparated for the work of the miniſtry, yet not from it: but by his mother, without a figure is meant, his real natural mother, whoſe name is ſaid to be Theocrita; and this ſeparation from her womb, is to be underſtood either of that diſtinction made of him in providence, as ſoon as born; which not only took him, and ſafely brought him out of his mother's womb, but ever ſince took ſpecial care of him, and ſaved and preſerved him to be called; for all the choſen veſſels of ſalvation, are diſtinguiſhed from others, in a providential way; they are more under the ſpecial care of providence than others are, even whilſt in a ſtate of unregeneracy; God's eye of providence is upon them, his heart is towards them, he waits upon them to be gracious to them, and many are the remarkable appearances of providence for them; ſee Pſal. xxii. 9, 10. Or rather this deſigns divine predeſtination, which is a ſeparation, a ſetting apart of perſons, for ſuch and ſuch purpoſes, as here of the Apoſtle; and the eternity of it, it being very early done, from his mother's womb; whilſt he was in it, before he was born, and had done either good or evil; from the begining of time, from the foundation of the world, and before it, even from eternity: all which phraſes expreſs the ſame thing, and intend either his predeſtination to grace and glory, to holineſs and happineſs, to ſanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth, and to the obtaining the glory of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt; or his predeſtination to Apoſtleſhip, to the work of the miniſtry, to the Goſpel of Chriſt, to which he was ſeparated in eternity, and in time; reference ſeems to be had to Jer. i. 5. or indeed both, and his ſeparation or predeſtination to both, was owing to the ſovereign will and good pleaſure of God, as was alſo his after call: and called me by his grace; which follows upon ſeparation, as it does on predeſtination, in Rom. viii. 30. and is to be interpreted either of his call at converſion, by powerful and efficacious grace; when he was called out of Jewiſh darkneſs, blindeſs, and ignorance, into Goſpel light and knowledge; out of the bondage of ſin, ſatan, the law, and traditions of the fathers, into the liberty of Chriſt; from converſation with the men of the world, among whom before he had it, into the fellowſhip of Father, Son, and Spirit, angels and ſaints; out of himſelf, and off of a dependance on his own righteouſneſs, to truſt in Chriſt: in a word, he was called into the grace of Chriſt here, into a participation of all the bleſſings of grace, and to eternal glory by him hereafter; which call was not of men, but of God, as the efficient cauſe of it; and by his grace, as the moving and procuring cauſe of it, and without the uſe of means, the word, which is the ordinary way in which God calls his people; ſo that its plain, his firſt light into the Goſpel, was not of man, nor ſo much as by the means of man: or this call may reſpect his call to the miniſtry, which was at the ſame time he was effectually called by grace; and which alſo was not of man, nor of himſelf; he did not thruſt himſelf into this work, but God called him; and that of his mere grace and good-will, without any reſpect to any merits, deſerts, or qualifications in him.

Ver. 16. To reveal his Son in me, &c.] This clauſe ſtands in connexion with that in the preceding verſe, but when it pleaſed God; the revelation of Chriſt in the Apoſtle, being the mere fruit and effect of God's will and pleaſure: ſome verſions read it by me, making the Apoſtle to be the inſtrument and means, by whom God revealed his Son Jeſus Chriſt to others, which is a certain truth, but this is rather contained in the following clauſe: others read it to me, and which alſo is true; for Chriſt was revealed to him in the glory of his perſon, the fulneſs of his grace, the neceſſity, ſuitableneſs, and compleatneſs of his ſalvation; not objectively in the Goſpel, or merely notionally, ſpeculatively in the theory of things, but ſpiritually, experimentally, and ſavingly; and which is better expreſſed, and nearer the original, by in him; for he had an internal diſcovery of him as God's ſalvation, and of his intereſt in him as ſuch; Chriſt was formed in him, his Spirit was put within him, his grace was implanted in him; he lived and dwelt in his heart by faith, as the Son in his own houſe; he was made known unto him, as Chriſt in him the hope of glory: now the end of all this, of his ſeparation from his mother's womb, of his call by the grace of God, and of the large revelation of Chriſt to him, and in him, was, that, ſays he, I might preach him among the Heathen; as he did: Chriſt was the ſubject of his miniſtry; the things reſpecting his perſon, as that he was very God, the Son of God, God and man in one perſon; the things reſpecting his office, as that he is the only mediator between God and man, the prophet of the church, the high-prieſt over the houſe of God, and king of ſaints; the doctrines of his grace, and which concern his obedience, ſufferings, and death; as that peace and pardon are by his blood, juſtification by his righteouſneſs, reconciliation and ſatiſfaction by his ſacrifice, and eternal life and compleat ſalvation alone by him; all which is evangelizing, or preaching good news and glad tidings, to ſenſible ſinners: the perſons to whom he was to preach theſe things, and did, were the Heathen, or Gentiles; he was a choſen veſſel for this purpoſe; Chriſt when he called him, ſent him to them; the work he was to do, and did, lay chiefly among them; hence he is called an Apoſtle, and teacher of them: immediately I conferred not with fleſh and blood; which ſome underſtand of carnal reaſon, and that he did not ſtand reaſoning and debating the matter with himſelf, whether it would be for his credit and reputation, for his worldly intereſt and advantage, to enter upon the miniſtry of the word; whether it would be adviſeable to expoſe himſelf by ſo doing, to reproach and perſecution; but immediately as ſoon as he was called by grace, and Chriſt was revealed in him, he ſet about it: others by fleſh and blood, underſtand carnal men; and others his countrymen the Jews, and thoſe of them that were his relations, his own fleſh; but rather men in general are intended, any whatever, and eſpecially the Apoſtles; whom he afterwards ſays, he had no converſation with, upon his firſt ſetting out in the miniſtry. It is uſual with the Jews, to call men in diſtinction and oppoſition to God, בשר ודם, fleſh and blood. Infinite almoſt are the examples that might be given thereof out of their writings. Compare with this Matt. xvi. 17. Eph. vi. 12. and the notes there.

Ver. 17. Neither went I up to Jeruſalem, &c.] That is, immediately, as ſoon as he was converted, not till three years after, as follows; tho' by the account which Luke gives of him, Acts ix. 23, 26. and by that which the Apoſtle gives of himſelf, Acts xxii. 17, 18. it looks as if he went to Jeruſalem ſome little time after his converſion, and before the date here given: and therefore ſome have thought that he did go up to Jeruſalem pretty quickly, when, praying in the temple, he fell into a trance, and was ordered to make haſte from thence, and go far hence unto the Gentiles; and accordingly he made no ſtay, did not go to any of the Apoſtles, and neither ſaw nor converſed with any of them, which is what he here ſays, to them which were Apoſtles before me. The twelve, who were called, ordained, and ſent forth as Apoſtles before he was; for laſt of all Chriſt appeared to him, and was ſeen by him as one born out of due time: his meaning is, not that he was a ſucceſſor of the Apoſtle's, but that they were inſtated in the office of Apoſtleſhip before him; and this he mentions to ſhew that he did not receive the Goſpel from men, no not from the Apoſtles themſelves; ſince, upon his converſion, he did not go up to Jeruſalem to ſee any of them, and talk with them; nor did he ſtand in need of any inſtructions from them, being immediately furniſhed ſufficiently by Chriſt himſelf; nor did his work lie at Jeruſalem, nor ſo much among the Jews as among the Gentiles, and therefore to them he went: but I went into Arabia. This journey of the Apoſtle is wholly omitted by Luke, nor ſhould we have known any thing of it, had it not been for this account: how long he ſtaid there, what he did, and what ſucceſs he met with among the Arabs are no where related; no doubt but he preached the Goſpel to them, and as his miniſtry every where was owned and bleſſed by God, it may be very reaſonably thought it was here at his firſt ſetting out in it. The Arabic verſion reads it, I went to Balcam, which was a city in Syria; but without any foundation for it; for it was not Syria, but Arabia to which he went. There are three countries which bear the name of Arabia, and which are called to diſtinguiſh them from one another, Arabia Petræa, Arabia Deſerta, and Arabia Felix; of which ſee the note on Acts ii. 11. It is very likely it was the former of theſe which the Apoſtle went to, as being neareſt to Syria, ſince from Damaſcus, the metropolis of Syria, he went thither; and Damaſcus itſelf was at this time under the government of an Arabian king, ſee 2 Cor. xi. 32. So Pliny frequently ſpeaks of Arabia as near to Syria, Paleſtine, and Judea: in one place he ſays [l], Arabia divides Judea from Egypt; and elſewhere [m] obſerves, that Syria is diſtinguiſhed by many names; for it is called Paleſtina, where it touches the Arabians, and Judea, and Cœle, and Phenice; and Peræa, or the country beyond Jordan, he ſays, is next to Arabia and Egypt; and on the eaſt of the lake of Aſphaltites, he places Arabia, that belongs to the Nomades; ſo likewiſe Joſephus [n] places Arabia at the eaſt of Peræa, or the country beyond Jordan; and ſays [o] in another place, that Arabia borders on Judea, the metropolis of which was Petra, where Aretas the king had his royal palace: Jerom [p] likewiſe obſerves, that the river Jordan divides Judea and Arabia; ſo that this country into which the Apoſtle went, was not a great way off of Syria and Judea, whither he returned again after ſome time; which ſeems to be about the ſpace of three years, by what follows in the next verſe, and when he had done the work and will of God in thoſe parts; where doubtleſs he was the inſtrument of converting ſouls, and planting churches, and here 'tis certain were churches in ages following: in the third century were churches in Arabia, mentioned along with the churches in Syria, by Euſebius [q]; in which age lived two famous Arabian biſhops, Beryllus and Maximus; and the ſame hiſtorian [r] reports, that in the times of Diocleſian, there were ſome wonderful martyrs in Arabia, who ſuffered the moſt cruel tortures and death, for the ſake of Chriſt: and in the fourth century, there were Arabian biſhops in the Nicene council, and in other ſynods, as at Jeruſalem and Sardica; and in the ſame century there were biſhops of Arabia Petræa, at the ſynod in Antioch, whoſe names were Nicomachus and Cyrion: and alſo in the fifth century, there were churches and biſhops in the ſame country [s], not to trace them any further: and returned again unto Damaſcus; and then it was, that being increaſed in ſpiritual ſtrength and knowledge, he proved that Jeſus of Nazareth was the true Meſſiah, to the confuſion of the Jews there; which drew upon him their reſentment and indignation, ſo that they took counſel and lay in wait to kill him; but the diſciples let him down through a window, by the wall of the city in a baſket, and ſo he eſcaped them.

Ver. 18. Then after three years I went up to Jeruſalem, &c.] Not three years after his return to Damaſcus, but after his converſion; and now it was, that he moved to become a member of the church at Jeruſalem; but they did not care to admit him, fearing that he was not a diſciple, till ſuch time that Barnabas took him, and brought him to the Apoſtles Peter and James, and related his converſion and his boldneſs in preaching the Goſpel at Damaſcus: his view in going up to Jeruſalem at this time, was partly his own ſafety, being obliged to fly from Damaſcus, but chiefly to ſee Peter. The Alexandrian copy, and another, read Cephas, and ſo does the Ethiopic verſion, the ſame with Peter: not to ſee what a ſort of a man he was, but to pay him a chriſtian viſit; to converſe with him about ſpiritual things; to know how the work of God went on under him, as the miniſter of the circumciſion; and to relate to him, what ſucceſs he had met with as the miniſter of the uncircumciſion; but not to receive the Goſpel from him, or to be ordained a preacher of it by him; for he had been three years already in the work of the miniſtry, before he made him this viſit; and beſides, his ſtay with him was very ſhort, nor could he have received much from him, in ſo ſhort a time, in an ordinary way: and abode with him fifteen days; and even all this time, was not wholly ſpent in converſation with him; for he was during this time, coming in and going out at Jeruſalem, where he preached boldly in the name of Chriſt, and diſputed againſt the Grecians.

Ver. 19. But other of the Apoſtles ſaw I none, &c.] This is obſerved to ſhew, that as he did not receive the Goſpel from Peter, ſo neither from any of the other Apoſtles, whom he did not ſo much as ſee, much leſs converſe with; ſave James the Lord's brother; not James the ſon of Zebedee, the brother of John, whom Herod ſlew with the ſword; but James the ſon of Alpheus, he who made the ſpeech in the ſynod at Jeruſalem, Acts xv. 13. was the writer of the epiſtle which bears his name, and was the brother of Joſes, Simon, and Judas, who are called the brethren of Chriſt, Matt. xiii. 55. and that becauſe they were the kinſmen and relations of Chriſt according to the fleſh, it being uſual with the Jews to call ſuch brethren. The relation came in and ſtood thus; this James was James the leſs, the ſon of Mary the wife of Cleophas, Mark xv. 40, 47. which Cleophas was the brother of Joſeph, the huſband of Mary the mother of our Lord, as Euſebius from Hegeſippus relates; and ſo our Lord and this James were brothers children, as was ſuppoſed; or elſe the wife of Cleophas the mother of James, was ſiſter to Mary the mother of Chriſt, as ſhe is called, John xix. 25. and ſo they were ſiſters children, or own couſins; and thus Jerom[t] after much diſcourſe on this ſubject, concludes that Mary the mother of James the leſs was the wife of Alpheus, (or Cleophas which is the ſame) and the ſiſter of Mary the mother of the Lord, whom the evangeliſt John ſirnames Mary of Cleophas; and perſons in ſuch a relation, and even uncles and nephews, were called brethren by the Jews; ſee Gen. xii. 5. and xiii. 8. and xxix. 12, 15. Lev. x. 4. nor is James one of our Lord's diſciples being called his brother, any contradiction to John vii. 5. as the Jew[u] affirms, where it is ſaid, neither did his brethren believe in him; ſince they might not believe in him then, and yet believe in him afterwards: beſides, Chriſt had brethren or relations according to the fleſh, diſtinct from his diſciples and Apoſtles, and his brethren among them; ſee Matt. x. 1. and xii. 46, 49. ſuch as were James, Judas, and Simon; nor does the evangeliſt John ſay, that none of Chriſt's brethren believed in him, only that they that came to him and bid him go into Judea did not. Some have been of opinion that a third James, diſtinct from James the ſon of Zebedee, and James the ſon of Alpheus is here meant; who was not of the twelve Apoſtles, and was ſurnamed James the juſt, and called the brother of Chriſt becauſe of his faith, wiſdom, and becoming converſation; but certain it is, that this James was of the number of the Apoſtles, as appears from the exceptive clauſe, other of the Apoſtles ſaw I none ſave James, &c. and from his being put with Cephas and John, who were pillars and the chief among the Apoſtles; and beſides it was James the ſon of Alpheus, who was ſurnamed the juſt, and Oblias[w], and preſided over the church at Jeruſalem, and was a man of great eſteem among the Jews; and is by[x] Joſephus, as here, called the brother of Jeſus.

Ver. 20. Now the things which I write unto you, &c.] Concerning his education, his religion, his principles and practices before converſion; concerning his call by the grace of God, the revelation of Chriſt in him, and his preaching of him among the heathen; concerning his travels to ſeveral places for this purpoſe, and eſpecially concerning his not receiving the Goſpel from men, not from any of the Apoſtles; and how that upon his converſion he did not go up to Jeruſalem to any of them, to be taught and ſent forth by them; and that it was not till three years after that he went thither to ſee Peter, with whom he ſtayed but fifteen days, and ſaw no other Apoſtle but James the Lord's brother. Now this being a matter of moment, and what he had been charged with by the falſe teachers, that the Goſpel he preached he had received from men, in order to diſqualify him and bring him into contempt as an Apoſtle, and which they had inſinuated to the Galatians; he therefore not only wrote theſe things, but for the confirmation of them ſolemnly appeals to God the ſearcher of hearts, for the truth of them; behold, before God I lye not; which is not only a ſtrong aſſeveration, but a formal oath; it is ſwearing by the God of truth, calling him to be witneſs of the things that he had written; whence it is manifeſt that an oath upon proper occaſions, where there is a neceſſity for it, and a good end to be anſwered by it, may be lawfully made.

Ver. 21. Afterwards I came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia.] For having diſputed againſt the Grecians at Jeruſalem, and being too hard for them, it ſo irritated them, that they were going to murder him; which being known to the brethren there, they got him out of the way, and had him down to Ceſarea, and ſo to Tarſus a city in Cilicia, where he was born; in which places and in the countries about he preached the Goſpel of Chriſt; to Tarſus, Barnabas went for him ſeeking him, and finding him brought him to Antioch in Syria; and both in Syria and Cilicia he preached, no doubt with ſucceſs, ſince we read of believing Gentiles and churches in thoſe parts he afterwards viſited; being ſent along with others, with the letter and decrees of the ſynod at Jeruſalem to them, and whom he confirmed; ſee Acts xv. 23, 41. and the notes there: in the Greek text theſe countries are called climates; a climate in geography is ſaid[y] to be a part of the ſurface of the earth, bounded by two circles parallel to the equator, and of ſuch a breadth as that the longeſt day in the parallel nearer the pole, exceeds the longeſt day in that next the equator, by ſome certain ſpace, viz. half an hour.—The beginning of the climate is the parallel circle wherein the day is the ſhorteſt, the end of the climate is that wherein the day is the longeſt;—each climate only differs from its contiguous ones, in that the longeſt day in ſummer, is longer or ſhorter by half an hour in the one place than in the other: ——vulgarly the term climate is beſtowed on any country or region differing from another, either in reſpect of the ſeaſons, the quality of the ſoil, or even the manners of the inhabitants, without any regard to the length of the longeſt day; in which ſenſe it ſeems to be uſed here, as alſo in Rom. xv. 23. 2 Cor. xi. 10. Of the country of Syria, ſee the note on Matt. iv. 24. Cilicia is a country of Aſia Minor, now called Caramania; it had its name of Cilicia, as Herodotus ſays [z], from Cilix, the ſon of Agenor, a Phenician; tho' Bochart [a] derives it from Challekim or Challukim, which ſignifies ſtones, it being a ſtony country; and ſo Herodotus [b] calls it mountainous Cilicia; it is ſaid to have Pamphilia on the weſt, the tops of mount Taurus on the north, mount Amanus on the eaſt, and the Cilician ſea on the ſouth; Jerom ſays [c], Cilicia is a province of Aſia, which the river Cydnus cuts in the middle, and mount Amanus, of which Solomon makes mention, ſeparates it from Syria-Cœle.

Ver. 22. And was unknown by face, &c.] Or in perſon. This is ſaid to prevent what might be objected, that tho' the Apoſtle had not received the Goſpel he preached from any of the Apoſtles at Jeruſalem; yet he might have had it from the churches that were in the land of Judea, and from ſome of the principal men in them; but this was ſo far from being truth, that he was not ſo much as known unto the churches of Judea which were in Chriſt; for there was not only a famous church of believers in Chriſt at Jeruſalem, the metropolis of the land, but there were ſeveral congregated churches in the ſeveral parts of that country: by Judea we are to underſtand that part of the land of Iſrael ſo called, which was diſtinct not only from Samaria, but from Galilee and Perea, or the country beyond Jordan; for, according to the Jews [d], the land of Iſrael was divided into three parts, Judea, Perea, and Galilee——Judea again was divided into three parts, the hill country, the plain, and the valley; and the plain of Lydda is as the plain of the ſouth, and its mountainous part as the king's mountain; from Bethhoron to the ſea is one province: and elſewhere [e] it is ſaid, that the hill country of Judea, is the king's mountain, the plain of it is the plain of the ſouth, and the valley is from Engedi to Jericho—from Bethoron to Emmaus is mountainous, from Emmaus to Lydda is a plain, and from Lydda to the ſea a valley; from which may be collected where this country lay, and where were theſe churches here ſpoken of; the foundation of which might be laid in the converſion of ſome in thoſe parts, thro' the miniſtry of the diſciples of Chriſt, who were appointed witneſſes of him not only in Jeruſalem, but in all Judea and Samaria, Acts i. 8. and about the time of the Apoſtle Paul's converſion, and his being at Jeruſalem, there were churches gathered in Judea, as diſtinct from Galilee and Samaria, Acts ix. 31. particularly at Ceſarea, Lydda, Saron, and Joppa. It is very likely that all the Apoſtles when they firſt ſet out to preach the Goſpel after the aſcenſion of Chriſt and the effuſion of the Spirit, began in Judea; tho' ſome might make a very ſhort ſtay, and others a longer. The Apoſtle and evangeliſt Matthew is generally thought to have exerciſed his miniſtry chiefly in Judea, and to have continued there long; here he wrote his Goſpel for the ſake of the Jews that believed [f]; and that as a very ancient writer ſays [g], when Peter and Paul preached at Rome, and founded the church there. Judas Thaddæus is alſo ſaid [h] to go thro' Judea, Galilee, Samaria, Arabia, Syria, and Meſopotamia; and certain it is, that Philip after he had baptized the Eunuch preached in all the cities from Azotus to Cæſarea, where he ſeems to have ſtayed a while and preached, Acts viii. 40. and where afterwards was a Goſpel-church-ſtate, of which ſee the note on Acts x. 48. and at Lydda and Saron, which were both in Judea, there were ſaints who were viſited by the Apoſtle Peter, and others converted by him, about the time that our Apoſtle here refers to; of the church at Lydda ſee the note on Acts ix. 32. at Joppa alſo which was in the tribe of Dan, there were diſciples at the ſame time, and very likely a church there; of which ſee the note on Acts ix. 38. and it may be obſerved that the Apoſtle Peter was the miniſter of the circumciſion, he had the Goſpel of the circumciſion committed to him, and he continued with and preached much to the circumciſed Jews; and ſo in all likelihood was the inſtrument of planting the churches in Judea here ſpoken of. Theſe are ſaid to be in Chriſt, as the church at Theſſalonica, and that at Corinth are elſewhere ſaid to be; becauſe they profeſſed to believe in Chriſt, were called by his name, and called upon his name; and tho' every individual member of them might not be in Chriſt, really united to him, and have communion with him; yet ſince they were all under a profeſſion of him, they are conſidered as in him. The Arabic verſion reads it, the churches of Judea which believe in Chriſt; which tho' not a literal tranſlation, gives the true ſenſe of the paſſage, and diſtinguiſhes thoſe churches from the ſynagogues or aſſemblies of the Jews which did not believe in Chriſt.

Ver. 23. But they had heard only, &c.] What they knew of the Apoſtle was only by hearſay; they had never ſeen him, nor heard him preach, nor converſed with him, only had it reported to them; that he which perſecuted us in times paſt; ſome few years ago, and not them perſonally, but ſuch as were of the ſame faith with them, the church at Jeruſalem and the members of it; which he made havock of, committing men and women to priſon, and cauſing others to fly to ſtrange cities; now preacheth the faith which once he deſtroyed; all as in him lay he endeavoured to deſtroy it, tho' he could not entirely root it up; he deſtroyed many of the diſciples that held it, and did all he could to diſcourage others from embracing and profeſſing it; he made uſe of the ſtrongeſt arguments he was maſter of to confute it, and of the ſecular arm to cruſh and extirpate it, but now was become a preacher of it: by faith is meant not ſo much the grace of faith, tho' to ſhew the nature, neceſſity, and uſefulneſs of faith in Chriſt, and to direct and encourage ſenſible ſinners, as he did the goaler, to believe in him, was a principal part of his miniſtry; but rather the doctrine of faith which is always deſigned, when it is ſaid, as here, to be preached or to be obeyed, ſtood faſt in and contended for, or to be departed and erred from, to be made ſhipwreck of and denied. The Goſpel is called the word of faith, the myſtery of faith, the faith of the Goſpel, common faith, moſt holy faith, the faith once delivered to the ſaints; it contains things to be believed; it propoſes and directs to the great object of faith; and is the means of implanting and increaſing that grace, and without which the miniſtry of it is of no uſe: it takes in all articles of faith, reſpecting the divine Being, the unity of God, the Trinity of perſons in the Godhead, the equal and proper deity of each perſon, their perſonal diſtinctions from each other, the attribution of all divine works, worſhip and honour to them; it relates to every thing concerning man, in his original creation, in his ſtate of innocence and integrity; concerning the fall of Adam, the imputation of his ſin to all his poſterity, the corruption of human nature, and the impotence of man to all that is ſpiritually good; it regards all the acts of grace, of the Father, Son, and Spirit, in and towards any of the Sons of men: it includes all the doctrines of it, as of the free, ſovereign, everlaſting, and unchangeable love of God; of eternal, perſonal, and irreſpective election of ſome to grace and glory, by which both are ſecured; of the everlaſting, abſolute, unconditional, and ſure covenant of grace; of particular redemption by Chriſt, proceeding on a full ſatisfaction to divine juſtice; of juſtification by the imputed righteouſneſs of Chriſt; of reconciliation and pardon by his blood; of regeneration and ſanctification by the Spirit; of the perſeverance of the ſaints in faith and holineſs, the reſurrection of the dead, and eternal glory: now this faith in the ſeveral momentous branches of it, the Apoſtle preached, publiſhed, declared, ſpoke out openly and publickly; fully and compleatly, without dropping, concealing, or keeping back any thing; clearly and plainly, without uſing ambiguous phraſes, or words of double meaning, with all faithfulneſs and integrity, boldneſs and conſtancy.

Ver. 24. And they glorified God in me.] Or for me; on his account; for the wonderful grace beſtowed on him and wrought in him; for the ſurprizing change that was made in him, that of a perſecutor he ſhould become a preacher, which they aſcribed, as he himſelf did, to the abundant grace of God; they were greatly thankful and bleſſed God, who had given him ſuch large gifts, and made him ſo greatly uſeful in the cauſe, and among the churches of Chriſt. And by obſerving this, how much the churches in Judea were affected with the grace of God vouchſafed to him, tho' they had never ſeen him nor heard him, he tacitly ſtrikes at and rebukes the falſe teachers, and the Galatians that adhered to them, for their different treatment of him; to whom he was not only known by face, but had preached among them ſo fully, clearly, and powerfully, the Goſpel of the grace of God.

CHAP. II.

IN this chapter the Apoſtle proceeds with the narrative of himſelf, and gives an account of another journey of his to Jeruſalem, where he had a converſation with the chief of the Apoſtles; in which they approved of his miniſtry, allowed of his commiſſion, and took him into fellowſhip with them, but gave him no new inſtructions, nor added to his ſpiritual light and knowledge; from whence it appeared that the Goſpel he preached was not after men, or received from men, as he had aſſerted in the preceding chapter; and he alſo gives an account of his meeting with Peter at Antioch, and how he reproved him for ſome judaizing practices; which leads him to aſſert the doctrine of juſtification by faith, in oppoſition to the works of the law; which is the grand point he had in view to eſtabliſh in this epiſtle, and which he vindicates from the charge of licentiouſneſs. He begins with an account of another journey of his to Jeruſalem, the circumſtances of which he relates as the time when, fourteen years ago; the perſons he took with him as his companions, Barnabas and Titus, ver. 1. what moved him to it, a revelation from God; and the buſineſs he did when come thither, he communicated the Goſpel, and that not to any but to ſuch that were of reputation, and not publickly but privately; his end was that it might appear how ſucceſsful he had been in his miniſtry, and had not laboured in vain, ver. 2. then follows a narrative of a particular event relating to Titus, who is deſcribed as one of his companions, and by his nation a Greek; and who tho' an uncircumciſed perſon, yet the Apoſtles and elders at Jeruſalem did not oblige him to be circumciſed, which ſhewed that they were of the ſame mind with the Apoſtle in this point, ver. 3. and the reaſon of it was becauſe of the falſe teachers, that they might not give them any handle; who are deſcribed by their character, falſe brethren, by their private manner of getting in among the ſaints, and by their ends and views, which were to ſpie out their chriſtian liberty and bring them into bondage, ver. 4. to whom the Apoſtle oppoſed himſelf, and would not give way for the leaſt ſpace of time; for this end that the truth of the Goſpel might continue with the Gentiles, ver. 5. and as for the Apoſtles, tho' they were men of great character and reputation, nor would the Apoſtle detract from it; yet they added nothing to him, he received nothing from them, ver. 6. but on the other hand, partly becauſe they ſaw that as the Goſpel to be preached to the Jews, was committed to Peter, ſo the ſame Goſpel to be preached to the Gentiles, was committed to Paul; and partly becauſe of the ſame efficacy and ſucceſs in the miniſtry of the one as in the miniſtry of the other; as alſo becauſe they perceived what gifts of grace were beſtowed on the Apoſtle; they gave to him and Barnabas the right hand of fellowſhip, as a token of their mutual agreement, and as being of the ſame ſociety, ver. 7, 8, 9. nor did they give him and Barnabas any thing in charge, but only to remember the poor, to which he was forward enough of himſelf, ver. 10. after which follows an account of an oppoſition made by the Apoſtle to Peter, which was done at Antioch, and to his face, and not without reaſon, ver. 11. for whereas he had ſome time before eat with the Gentiles, which was commendable in him, he afterwards declined converſation with them, moved to it by fear of the converted Jews, ver. 12. and ſuch was the force of his example, that other Jews who before did not ſcruple eating with the Gentiles, ſeparated likewiſe, and even Barnabas himſelf, Paul's companion, ver. 13. wherefore ſeeing this was not walking according to the Goſpel of Chriſt, and with that integrity and uprightneſs which became ſuch perſons, the Apoſtle publickly reproved Peter, and expoſtulated with him; partly on account of his former converſation with the Gentiles, tho' he himſelf was a Jew, and therefore it was abſurd and contradictory in him, to oblige the Gentiles to live as the Jews did, ver. 14. and partly on account of the knowledge which he and Peter and others who were Jews, and not ſinners of the Gentiles, had of the doctrine of juſtification; that it was not by the works of the law, but by faith in Chriſt; for to this end they had believed in Chriſt that they might be juſtified, not by the one, but by the other; which doctrine is confirmed by a paſſage referred to in Pſal. cxliii. 2. ver. 15, 16. and whereas it might be objected that this doctrine of free juſtification opened a door to licentiouſneſs, the Apoſtle anſwers to it by an abhorrence of it, ver. 17. and by obſerving that this would build up what he had deſtroyed, ver. 18. beſides, he argues the contrary from his being dead to the law, that he might live unto God, ver. 19. and from his crucifixion with Chriſt, and of the old man with his deeds; and from Chriſt's living in him, and his living by faith upon him, ver. 20. and for the further confirmation of the doctrine of juſtification being by faith, and not by works, he ſuggeſts, were it otherwiſe, both the grace of God would be fruſtrated and made void, and the death of Chriſt be in vain, ver. 21.
